Fifteen years ago there seemed few events less probable than that the daughter of the Duke of Schleswig Holstein should enter the German royal family. Prussian troops had overrun the territories of the Duke and fierce war was being waged between Prussia and Denmark over these identical duchies. Finally they were absorbed into the German Empire and the duke took his place in the ranks of "sovereigns out of business." He died at Baden last year, but his wife still lives and has the gratification of seeing her daughter become by her marriage heiress to a far loftier throne than that of Schleswig-Holstein, and thus peacefully regain the inheritance of her ancestors lost in the fortune of war.

It is an interesting fact that the firmest friends in 1866 of the bride's father were the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia. They advocated the establishment of an independent Dukedom under the Augustenburgers, while Prince Bismarck insisted on their annexation to Prussia. The then Minister-President, however, prevailed.

STATE ENTRY INTO BERLIN.

On Saturday, February 26th, the royal bride entered Berlin in state, and the necessary civil contract was on that day signed in the presence of the Registrar of the House of Hohenzollern. The capital was in gala dress. The magnificent thoroughfare—one of the finest in Europe—called Unter den Linden was quite gay with Venetian masts and triumphal arches, and despite the season of the year was made brilliant with innumerable garlands of flowers. Flags floated from every window, and the main streets for miles were enlivened by artistic designs of gas-jets, which at night were lighted with splendid effect.

The bride was met at the gate of the imperial city by a guard of honor, commanded by the bridegroom himself, and the demonstrations of welcome were most affecting. The Princess rode in an old gilded coach only used on occasions of solemn state, and entering by the Brandenburg Gate passed along the Unter den Linden to the Grand Schloss, where she was received in a most affectionate manner by the Empress. The troops and uniforms added greatly to the general effect along the whole line of route.

THE WEDDING.

On Sunday, February 27th, the wedding was solemnized in the chapel of the Schloss. The old Protestant churches of Berlin are architecturally peculiar. They are simply round, or with four walls, roofed over with a large dome—the dome apparently being the principal part of the structure. The chapel of the Schloss, although constructed within the building, is simply an octagonal wall, of very large dimensions, covered with the usual dome. There is a great deal of marble in the interior, and on it are painted pictures of evangelists, patriarchs, prophets, and saints. The altar is on the eastern side, and is made of alabaster. On it is a gold cross, with a candle on each side, and in front of it a Bible. This is surmounted by a canopy of Greek architecture, supported by Corinthian columns. The whole is surrounded with a marble enclosure, with reading-desks at each corner for the Gospel and the Epistle, and three marble steps lead down to the floor of the chapel.

Before these steps, in front of the altar, the bride and bridegroom stood during the marriage ceremony. In a large semicircle behind them were ranged the whole of the imperial and royal personages, including the Emperor and Empress of Germany, the King and Queen of Saxony, the mother of the bride, the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Prince and Princess Christian, and others—comprising in all about sixty personages. There were sixteen bridesmaids, dressed in white cashmere costumes, the back of the skirt being richly draped, and having a long round train with a white satin ruche. Behind this circle of royal rank were all the high civil and military dignitaries of the empire, including Prince Bismarck, Field-Marshal Moltke, etc. On one side were the members of the Diplomatic Corps, and the rest of the chapel was filled up with persons of rank and officials of State. The officiating clergyman was Hofprediger Kœgel, and the ceremony took place in the evening about half-past six o'clock.

The imperial and royal personages then adjourned to the White Saloon, which is close at hand, and when they were seated, the remainder of the wedding spectators passed through, and made their obeisances to the newly-married couple. This piece of etiquette discharged, a grand banquet was given in the Rittersaal of the Schloss, at which none but members of imperial and royal families sat down, and were served according to ancient custom by the young princes. The bride and bridegroom were placed between the emperor and empress during the dinner. The hall was richly decorated, and was full of massive and costly plate.

A QUAINT CEREMONY

was observed at a ball given in honor of the newly married couple. This was the famous torch dance, conducted according to rules which have been observed at German royal marriages from the most remote times.

The royal personages having disposed themselves on and around the throne, twelve Cabinet Ministers, carrying lighted torches, preceded by Gold and Silver Stick, stepped up to the bridal pair to the notes of a polonaise. Bowing deferentially, and being bowed to, they moved on with the bride and bridegroom behind them. Thus they walked round the hall solemnly and silently, with stately gait.

On their return to the throne the bride, approaching the emperor, bowed to him deeply, by way of invitation to dance, and again the procession made the circuit of the hall, this time accompanied by his majesty. Next the bridegroom made the tour of the hall with the Queen of Saxony, and the bride with the King of Saxony. In the remaining stages of the elaborate dance the princess performs each of her many circuits between two of the princes present, the young husband following her with two of the princesses. All the while the Silver Sticks and Cabinet Ministers march in front torch in hand, while the polonaise resounds from the orchestral gallery.

THE ROYAL HOME AT POTSDAM.

After two days of fêtes in Berlin the newly married pair made a grand entry into Potsdam accompanied by the Emperor, the Crown Prince and Princess and all the royal personages. A suite of apartments have been prepared in the Schloss at Potsdam for Prince William and his bride. They will occupy these till the Marble Palace, which is also at Potsdam, has been thoroughly repaired, when it will become their permanent residence. It was built at the end of the last century by Frederick William II., King of Prussia. It is a small but pretty building, constructed of white marble and red brick, decorated with sculptures and works of art around it, as well as within.

It is interesting to learn that the marriage is not one of those to which in past days royal heirs were forced to enter for reasons of state. The bridegroom has been permitted to make his own choice, and if the good word of all men and women is any criterion, the young prince has chosen wisely. They are said to have been drawn to each other by the bonds of mutual affection, and the young prince wooed and won his bride in the fashion that obtains in the lives of less-distinguished mortals.

They will occupy a position in which, though spared from the troubles and anxieties that mar the lives of many couples, they must endure trials incidental to their station in life. Brilliant as is their lot, it cannot be free from the ills of our common humanity, and when they come to the final close of their career, if they pass from an earthly to a shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him. Even so, Amen."* "And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east; and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north and half of it toward the south."†

The Son of man now comes as the Stone which Daniel saw in vision, cut out without hands, and falls upon the image, which represents civil governments, and breaks it to pieces, so that it becomes like the chaff of the summer threshing floor; and the stone that smites the image becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth."‡ This is the end of all that which is called civil government on the earth, governments which so many Christians are trying to build up and make better—the Lord utterly destroys them. "And the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day shall there be one Lord, and His name one."§

the end of man's daring machinations when he madly raises his puny hand against God. "And I saw the beast and the kings of the earth, and their armies gathered together to make war against Him that sat on the horse and against His army."‖

Man dares to defy God now; but how fearful the arrogance to which his pride will reach, when he goes forth to make war against Him that sitteth on the horse!" Yet "these are the true sayings of God" (ver. 9). This is what men surely will do. But how speedy and terrible will be the end! The armies of the beast are slain and given to the fowls of heaven. The slaughter is to be so great that it will take seven months to bury the dead and cleanse the land.¶

"And this shall be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite all the people that have fought against Jerusalem; their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon their feet, and their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongues shall consume away in their mouth. And it shall come to pass in that day that a great tumult from the Lord shall be among them; and they shall lay hold every one on the hand of his neighbor, and his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbor." "The great winepress of the wrath of God was trodden without the city, and blood came out of the winepress, even unto the horse bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs."††

But a more awful fate awaits the beast and the false prophet. "And the beast was taken and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him: with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone."‡‡

Enoch and Elijah were taken to heaven alive; and these two men will be "cast alive in a lake of fire, burning with brimstone." A thousand years are to pass before the wicked dead are to be judged, and a thousand years before Satan is finally punished; thus the leaders of man's guilt and blasphemy are to be cast alive into the lake of fire. "And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years shall be fulfilled; and after that he must be loosed a little season."§§

Satan is "the god of this world," "the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." He has infused his poisonous corruptions into Christianity, and will at last bring in that iniquity and blasphemy which occasion so dreadful a doom on the beast, false prophet, and all who love not the Lord Jesus Christ. At the establishment of Christ's reign on the earth he is bound and allowed to deceive the nations no more during the thousand years. The enemies of God being all overcome, Christ will establish His kingdom, and He, with His saints, will reign over the earth.

Then all those promises recorded in Isaiah and elsewhere will be fulfilled. It is to be

A REIGN OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Peace on earth will be again established. "After those days, saith the Lord, I will put My law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be My people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know Me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more."*

Believers are said to be "heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ." When Christ reigns, therefore, He will not be alone, but in company with His fellow-heirs. This is the feature of the reign brought before us: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them . . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years." †

The ferocity of the wild beasts will be restrained and man's supremacy established. Hence "the wolf also shall dwell with the lamb and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den."‡

The sterility of the soil shall be removed. "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off."§ So too, "the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." "Then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our own God, shall bless us."‖ "This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden."¶ And Amos speaks of the days when "the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed; and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt." Joel also prophecies of the days when God "will cause to come down for you the rain, the former rain and the latter rain etc."††

Again, longevity will be restored; and death, save as the punishment of sin, seems to be abolished, and the age of man prolonged to the full period of Christ's reign. "I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in My people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed."‡‡ Now that the Lamb of God has borne the sin of the world, God can remove the curse, and reconcile the disordered creation to Himself. This He does however only partially in the kingdom of glory and blessedness of his anointed Son.

And the Lord Jesus Christ "shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth."§§ "And they shall bring all your brethren—the Jews —for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to My holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the Lord."*

"And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which come against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the king, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. And it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain. And if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, that have no rain; there shall be the plague, wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen that come not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. This shall be the punishment of Egypt, and the punishment of all nations that come not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses 'Holiness unto the Lord.'"†

This reign of righteousness is to last one thousand years; and still there will be much feigned obedience.‡ "When the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle; the number of whom is as the sands of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever."§ So many being deceived by Satan shows that unless a man is born of God he is not safe.

After this a great white throne appears (Rev. 20 : 11), and that of the wicked, takes place, and they stand before God to be judged. "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire."‖ Following this, there are to be "a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea."¶ "We, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Such, as we have traced out in the Word of the living God, are the prospects and events of the world. All these changes and dreadful judgments are before the world. Amid all the talk of modern progress and civilization, all the straining after improvements and education, all the efforts to Christianize the world, all the boast of the bright future in store for the nations of the earth, have unbelievers grasped the truth that God's judgments are even now hovering over the whole scene? Are they conscious that "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ."†† In the intoxication of this world's banquet do they discern the fingers of the hand tracing on the wall the fateful words, "in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh?"‡‡

Soon, we know not how soon, the trumpet will sound, the shout will be heard by all true believers, and they shall be caught up together in the air and be "for ever with the Lord." The world, bereft of believers, will be nothing save a mere profession, given up to "strong delusion, that they should believe a lie;"§§ and to be destroyed "with the brightness of His coming." The coming of Christ to the child of God is his present hope. He longs to go and to be with Him who loves him and died for him and has washed him in His own blood. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come." And the Lord says, "Surely, I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Attempt to Effect a Compromise in the organization of the Senate committees, mentioned last week, proved abortive. Rumors were current early in the week that Senator Mahone, of Virginia, whose vote was the only one about which there was any doubt, would act with the Republicans; and when Senator Hill, of Georgia, boldly challenged the Republican party on the question of numbers, Senator Mahone stepped down to the area in front of the Vice-President's desk, and, amid breathless silence, broken at last by cheers from the floor and galleries, defined his position. Mr. Mahone described himself as "a readjuster," and said he owed nothing to the Democratic party. "I came here," he said, "without being required to state to my people what I am. They were all willing to trust me. I was elected by the people, not by the Legislature; for it was an issue in the canvass, and no man was elected to the Legislature by the party with which I am identified who was not instructed to vote for me for the Senate." The vote of the Virginia senator tied the Senate, and the casting vote of the Vice-President carried through the Republican committee list. The Senate has thus again passed into the hands of the Republicans, so far as the composition of its committees, the most important feature of its organization, is concerned. This result was not reached by means of a solid phalanx of Republican votes, but, in view of Senator Mahone's action, it is thought improbable that an effort to disturb the arrangement will be made.

The Washington Government, in Conjunction with the governments of several European nations, will, during the coming season, engage actively in Arctic exploration. Two expeditions are to be fitted out and sent north under the direction of General Hazen, the chief signal officer, for purely scientific purposes; the one to Lady Franklin Bay is to be under the command of Lieutenant Greeley, one of the most trusted officers of the Signal Corps; the other will sail from San Francisco, and will establish itself at Point Burrow, on the north coast of Alaska.

Lieutenant Greeley's expedition will consist of three officers of the army and twenty-one enlisted men. It will be assembled at Washington, not later than the 15th of May, and in St. John's, Newfoundland, about one month later. It is expected that the expedition will leave St. John's about the 1st of July, and, touching at Disco, will take on board Dr. Pavey, the naturalist of the expedition, who has been in Greenland during the last winter collecting dogs, sledges, and other material for the expedition. The vessel is expected to reach Lady Franklin Bay by the last of August, when, disembarking the party, it will return to the United States.

In addition to the scientific observations to be made by the permanent party, the northern coast of Greenland probably will be explored; and it is believed that the question as to whether Greenland is an island or a continent can be settled, and also whether land exists to the northward of Cape Britannia, the farthest point seen by the English expedition of 1865. The station is to be visited annually by vessels which will bring fresh supplies and a number of new recruits, in order that those unfitted for the work by reason of disease or otherwise may return to the United States. The steam whaler Mary and Helen has also been purchased by the government for $100,000, and will be refitted immediately, laden with supplies, and sent out to search for the missing Jeannette.

The Question of an Extra Session of Congress is anxiously debated. Mr. Blaine is said to be decidedly in favor of a spring session, and other members of the Cabinet are on the same side. Should it be summoned, it will probably be for about the middle of May, and its special business will be to pass a refunding bill. The opinion is now generally expressed in political circles that Mr. Hayes took an unwise course in vetoing the bill passed by the last Congress. The reasons alleged for this opinion are that, as the bill was passed by a democratic Congress, there would have been no harm in allowing it to be submitted to a practical test; its failure would not have injured the Republican party, who were notoriously opposed to some of its provisions, and if it succeeded, the country would have been satisfied. Its veto by a Republican President lays the party open to the charge that it forced the country to pay a higher rate of interest than was necessary. That charge may be baseless, and many of the best financiers of both parties believe that it is, and that the loan could not have been negotiated at par at the three per cent rate, but in the heat of a contested election such a charge, true or untrue would have a damaging effect on party interests.

A Meeting of Socialists was Held at Steuben Hall, New York, on Tuesday, March 15th, to consider the news received of the assassination of the Emperor of Russia. If any proof were needed of the assertion that the principles of Socialists are in harmony with those of the Nihilists, and that a spirit of lawlessness characterizes both, that proof would be furnished by the following, among other resolutions unanimously passed at the meeting:

"Resolved, That the following address be forwarded to our fellow workingmen in Russia, to our best friends and most active partisans, the Nihilists:

Fellow Workingmen of Russia:

"Brothers! your cause is that of tne oppressed against the oppressor. That cause is a holy cause; the cause not only of Russia, but of all countries. It is universal.

"Brothers! we approve your actions, we approve your methods. Between you and your oppressors there can be no truce. Kill, destroy, assassinate, annihilate, even to its very germ, your aristocracy."

There are no emperors or kings in the United States to fear the operations of these approvers of assassination, but as one of the city daily journals has pointed out, there are many millionaires here who have sufficient reason to dread the development of societies such as this. At present, while wages are high, the discontent is not dangerous; but if a season of depression came, and workingmen had nothing to do and nothing to eat, the presence in our midst of men holding these revolutionary doctrines would constitute an element of danger which might effect an overturn of society such as is predicted Jer. 25 : 32, 33.

A Meeting of the Citizens of New York, held in Cooper Union on March 18th, appointed an influential committee to consider the question of street cleaning. The subject has been forced on public attention by the unprecedented mortality of the past two months. New York, on account of its insular position, ought to be among the most healthy of the great cities of the world, yet its death-rate exceeds that of Paris, London, Vienna, or Berlin. Dr. Alfred L. Loomis attended the meeting as a delegate of the New York Academy of Medicine, and reported that the academy had passed the following resolution, and had instructed him to read it to the meeting at Cooper Union:

"Whereas, It is our opinion that the uncleanly condition of the streets of this city is an efficient factor in increasing the malignancy of many diseases, and thus contributes to the present alarming death-rate; therefore

"Resolved, That acting under a deep sense of our responsibility as members of a profession whose chief duty is to check the development of disease, we earnestly warn the public against the danger of allowing this state of things to continue."

To this solemn warning Dr. Loomis added, "We, as medical counsellors, have told you, over and over again, of these defects and the result they produce. Now we warn you again, publicly. If you allow the filth to remain in the present state, when next summer comes, a pestilence will walk in the streets, and a death-rate will follow that will arouse from their slumbers those who have slept over this matter of sanitary violations."

Several other physicians, clergymen, and citizens of eminence spoke on the subject, admitting that they had incurred a serious responsibility in keeping silence so long, while men, women, and children were dying around them from the effects of the poisonous gases exhaled from the heaps of filthy refuse in the streets. One of the most hopeful characteristics of the meeting was the unanimity prevailing as to the point at which the exertions of the committee in effecting a thorough cleansing of the city should commence. The speakers and the audience agreed that the first nuisance to be removed, that being the most dangerous, was the street-cleaning bureau itself, which has drawn the liberal appropriation New York annually makes to have its streets cleaned, but has demonstrated its incapacity, or worse, to perform the work.

The Proposed Exposition of Machinery at Atlanta in connection with the cotton industry has occasioned a spirited discussion in the Southern States. In the course of the inquiry, facts have been elicited which disprove the charge of want of enterprise so frequently brought against Southern men. Mr. Robert N. Gourdin, a prominent merchant of Charleston, S. C., furnishes the following facts, which also show the improved prospects of the Southern States: "It has been repeatedly said by Northern speakers that we do not encourage industry and improved methods of agriculture. It is a profound mistake. Before the war from 100 to 150 pounds of sea island cotton per acre were considered a good crop. At the close of the war and under radical rule the crops were very poor, because negro labor was inefficient; now, under a reform in government and improvements in agriculture originating with ourselves, we are raising from 250 to 300 pounds, and on some plantations 400 pounds, of sea island cotton per acre, and that on land which formerly produced only 150 pounds per acre as a large crop. We have introduced improved machinery, the negroes are prosperous and contented, and there is abundant evidence to show that we are not the idle, shiftless people which we have been written down to be by agitators of the North, and that we are not regardless of the interests and welfare of the freedmen."

A Serious Impediment to Mr. Moody's Work in San Francisco has been the infidelity and scepticism of the people. Large numbers there were who knew nothing of the Bible, but who, under the influence of the writings of Paine, Ingersoll, and others, had avowed themselves unbelievers. A San Francisco correspondent of the Advance says that some weeks ago Mr. Moody commenced a series of Bible readings. He did not attempt to meet any of the arguments of infidelity, but simply presented the Bible; what it claims for itself and the proof it gave of its authority: such as its harmony, prophecies fulfilled, &c. From this he went on opening the Bible, and day after day the people came, filling to overflow the largest churches. The book-stores have sold more Bibles than they have sold in years before. Many avowed infidels have been converted.

The American Missionary Association has received from Mr. Robert Arthington, of Leeds, England, a donation of fifteen thousand dollars, to be applied to a new mission to Central Africa. The English Church Missionary Society has received $25,000 from the same gentleman, also for missionary work in Africa.

An Important Evangelistic Movement is progressing in New York under the charge of Rev. F. Von Schlumenback, who is laboring successfully among German immigrants and residents, many of whom are infidels or sceptics. He belongs to a noble family and is a man of education. He came to this country from Germany about twenty years ago. He served in the war, where he won a reputation for courage, but he was a violent atheist and of dissipated habits. In Philadelphia he was president of an infidel German society. Some twelve years ago, going up to Mauch Chunk to spend the Sabbath with General Albright, under whom he served in the army, through the personal influence of the General's wife he was spiritually awakened and was subsequently converted. He has been earnest since his change of heart in conversing with his friends who knew him as an infidel, and has been so blessed of God that he has now devoted himself exclusively to the work.

The Words of a Prayer were sent by Telegram to Ocean Grove, N. J., on March 12th. Dr. Stokes, the pastor of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church at that place, was absent at conference, and his pulpit was to be occupied on Sunday, the 13th, by Dr. Wythe. So Dr. Stokes telegraphed, praying that the preached word might reach some soul. The next day a man was converted at the service. During the millennium, when Christ is on the earth again, and the centre of worship is at Jerusalem, there will daily be intercommunication of religious matters over all the globe. The praise of God will be the absorbing topic of thought and speech, and as much money will be spent on telegraphic and telephonic messages of a religious character as there is now spent on messages about commerce and politics.

A Reader of the "Christian Herald" in Raleigh, N. C., writes: "The great temperance wave which is sweeping over our country has reached North Carolina, and is now the all-absorbing topic of conversation. There has never been any such excitement here on any subject since the memorable days of 1860. Notwithstanding that the movement was set on foot only about three months ago, the Legislature which has just adjourned was so persistently and unremittingly besieged by petitions from every section that they were induced to pass an act submitting the question of Prohibition or No Prohibition to the voters of the State at an election to be held in August next. Upon actual count it was ascertained that one hundred and thirty-three thousand persons had petitioned the General Assembly to pass a law to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the State. The friends of prohibition believe that this sudden uprising of the people is the work of an overruling Providence, and they are encouraged. The liquor men, however, are organizing and will make a desperate effort to defeat the measure. And just here we desire to ask the earnest prayers of the thousands of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that the Lord will give us the victory and that this monster evil shall be expelled from our State."

A Broken Meerschaum Pipe has Testified to the sincerity of a Christian's desire for a higher degree of spiritual life. A minister in western New York had been preaching a sermon in which he denounced the habit of smoking, and at the close of his service a man approached him with the remark, uttered in trembling, tearful tones, "You have struck the nail on the head," "You have struck the nail on the head." he said again, in a loud voice, and sobbed like a broken-hearted child. "Tell me, brother," said the preacher, "what you mean!" After a while he replied, "I have been praying for sanctification for five or six years; there has always been an ache in my soul—always something in the way—and you are the first man that has ever told me what it is. It is my pipe. When I have been praying in my closet for the blessing, something has raised me suddenly from my knees, and I have hurried to the mantelpiece for my pipe. Oh, my pipe has been stronger than God!" Then drawing his meerschaum from his pocket, dashing it in pieces on the steps of the church, straightening up with the dignity of a man and a Christian, he wiped the tears from his eyes, emancipated once for all.

We are told that Satan has power to blind the eyes of men so that they shall not perceive the truth (2 Cor. 4 : 4), and this smoker's experience forcibly illustrates the fact. When a man had become so infatuated by a habit that he was impelled to hurry through his devotions that he might indulge in it, he must have been blinded indeed to need a sermon to show him why he had "an ache" in his soul.

An Amusing Incident in which a Band of thieving Indians were sufferers, is related in the Boston Post. It appears that an Idaho mining-camp, intending to celebrate the Fourth of July, ordered a heap of fireworks to be sent to them. A whole wagon-load was forwarded, and while on its way, was captured one night by a band of Indians. The Indians did not know the nature of their booty, but the chief struck on the original idea that the fireworks were cigars, and distributing them around, the thieves sat down to enjoy a smoke. The result may be imagined. Burned and frightened almost out of their senses, the Indians learned a lesson they will probably never forget. A surprise more terrible, and a punishment infinitely more severe will one day fall on sinners who think that pleasure only will be the fruit of their sins (1 Thess. 5 : 3).

An Appeal from the South for Sunday-school books is published in a contemporary. It comes from Glenmore, Ga., and states that a large number of Northern people are in that section, and are pleased with its prospects. The writer reports that it is just the region "for all God's poor, it is so easy to make a living." He adds: "We need Sabbath-school books. If some good brother would help us to them, we will be most thankful."

The Work of the Rev. E. Payson Hammond at Peterboro, Canada, met with large success; the editor of the chief newspaper of the place observing, in review of what had been done, "No one dreamed that there would be such an extraordinary work of grace." He adds: "A gentleman from Belleville, who addressed one of the meetings a few days ago, stated that some of the worst characters in that city, who professed conversion when Mr. Hammond was there during a former year, were now consistent members of the churches."

Rev. A. B. Easle, of Massachusetts, has been conducting a series of very successful revival meetings in the First Baptist Church of Raleigh, N. C. (Dr. Skinner pastor). More than fifty souls professed faith in Christ and were baptized. Several of the converts were men whom the world would call "hard cases," and some were men of wealth, a class who, it is popularly supposed, never think of their soul's salvation. One of the converts, between fifty and sixty years of age, is the sole owner of a railroad in the State of Florida. Truly, as it was proved in the case of the Apostle Paul, there are no "hard cases" with God. He can change any heart.

An Infidel's Dying Child Recently Made a request which led to her father's conversion. A correspondent of the New York Observer writes: "A circumstance has occurred here that has left a marked impression upon this community. A family which had lived in close proximity to a church, but had never suffered themselves to be brought under the power of the Gospel, recently suffered the loss of one of their number by death. The father was an avowed atheist. The child, just prior to her departure from this world, called her father to her bedside, and, taking his hand in hers, said: 'Father, I want you to pray with me.' The man's hands fell to his side as if powerless and paralyzed, and, looking into the face of his child, he said: 'I cannot pray—I do not know how to pray.' He left her bedside to search for one who could come and perform this service for her and satisfy his child's desire. A few hours after that, she died.

"That father could not shake off the conviction produced by his child's request. His son, on hearing of the death of his sister, hastened home, and was met at the door by the grief-stricken and convicted father with the exclamation: 'Joe, there is a God—I know now there is a God!' His atheism was rebuked. 'And a little child shall lead them.'"

HOLY LONGINGS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, delivered on Sunday Morning, February 27th, 1881.

"My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments at all times."—PSALM 119 : 20.

Heart-Longings a Test of Character—Prophecies of the Future—Shadows of Coming Blessings—I. The Absorbing Object—The Decisions of God—The Bible to be Reverenced—Studied—The Old Testament not to be Depreciated—The Bible as Spiritual Food—As a Rule to be Obeyed—As a Power Heart-felt—II. Ardent Longings—A Living Experience—Imply Conscious Imperfection—A Perfect Man who did not Need Prayer—Advanced Experience—A Bitter Sweet—III. Cheering Reflections—God at Work in the Soul—The Result very Precious—Leading to Something More Precious Still—Present Benefit—It Makes Christ Precious.

ONE of the best tests of a man's character will be found in his deepest and heartiest longings. You cannot always judge a man by what he is doing at any one time, for he may be under constraints which compel him to act contrary to his true self, or he may be under a transient impulse from which he will soon be free. He may for awhile be held back from that which is evil, and yet he may be radically bad; or he may be constrained by force of temptation to that which is wrong, and yet his real self may rejoice in righteousness. A man may not certainly be pronounced to be good because for the moment he is doing good, nor may he be condemned as evil because under certain constraints he may be committing sin. A man's longings are more inward, and more near to his real self than his outward acts; they are more natural, in that they are entirely free, and beyond compulsion or restraint. As a man longeth in his heart, so is he. I mean not every idle wish, as I now speak, but strong desires of the heart: these are the true life-blood of a man's nature.

You shall know whether you yourself be good or evil by answering this question, To which have you the greatest desire? Do you continually long after selfish pleasures? then are you evil, beyond all question. Do you sigh to be, and feel, and do that which is good?—is this the great aim of your life? Then in the core of your being there is some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel. So then, dear hearers, your heart-longings may furnish you with excellent helps for self-examination, and I beg you to apply them at once.

Moreover, heart-longings are prophecies of what a man will be. It is not always capacity, if we could ascertain it, which will certify us as to what a man will do; for many men of large abilities achieve next to nothing for want of inclination: their talents lie hidden in the earth, and, albeit they might have succeeded marvellously well in certain pursuits, they do nothing at all remarkable because they have no tendencies in that direction. An individual may have the means to relieve the poor, and yet never perform a charitable act from want of liberality; or he may have great mental powers, and yet never produce a line of useful literature, because he is eaten up with idleness. But other things being equal, the longings of a man are a pretty sure index of what he will be: they cannot create capacity, but they develop it, they lead to the use of means for its increase, and they make the mind keen to seize on opportunities.

By some means or other, a man usually becomes what he intensely longs to be, especially if those desires are formed in early youth while yet the world is all before him where to choose. Hence our proverb: "The child is father to the man." Even in little children tastes and pursuits have been prophetic—the young artist sketches his sister in the cradle, the youthful engineer is busy with his boyish inventions. If his longings deepen, strengthen, and become vehement with the increase of his years, the young man's character is being surely moulded from within, and this is often a greater force than that of circumstances acting from without. Thus is it in spiritual things: we may form forecasts as to what we shall be from our burning and pressing desires. Desires are the buds out of which words and deeds will ultimately be developed.

Spiritual desires are

THE SHADOWS OF COMING BLESSINGS.

What God intends to give us He first sets us longing for. Hence the wonderful efficacy of prayer, because prayer is the embodiment of a longing inspired of God because He intends to bestow the blessing. What are thy longings, then, my hearer? Dost thou long to be holy? The Lord will make thee holy. Dost thou long to conquer sin? Thou shalt overcome it by faith in Jesus. Art thou pining after fellowship with Christ? He will come and make His abode with thee. Does thy soul thirst, yea, even pant after God as the hart for the waterbrooks? Then thou shalt be filled with all His fulness; for all these longings are prophetic of that which is to be, even as the snowdrop and crocus and anemone foretell the approach of spring.

I say not that it is so with all human wishes; for "the sluggard desireth and hath nothing," and many a man hath such evil cravings within his heart that it were contrary to the purity of God for him to grant them; but where there are intense, heart-breaking yearnings of a holy order, depend upon it they are tokens of good things to come.

In order that we may be helped to the right use of this text we shall handle it thus: first, we shall notice the saint's absorbing object—"Thy judgments;" secondly, we shall reflect upon the saint's ardent longing;"—"my soul breaketh for the longing that it hath:" and, thirdly, we shall mention the saint's cheering reflections, which he may readily draw from the fact that he does experience such inward heart-break. Of these we will speak as the divine Spirit shall enable us, for without Him we know nothing.

I. First, then, let us think of

THE SAINTS' ABSORBING OBJECT.

They long after God's judgments. The words "judgments" is here used as synonymous with the "Word of God." It does not mean those judgments of God with which He smites sinners and executes the sentence of His law, but it refers to the revealed will or declared judgments of God. All through this long psalm the writer is speaking of the Word of God, the law of God, the testimonies, the precepts, the statutes of God; and here the word "judgments" is used in the same sense. Perhaps I shall give you the meaning pretty readily if I remind you that the commandments and doctrines of the Word are God's judgments about moral and spiritual things, His decisions as to what is right and what is wrong, and His solutions of the great problems of the universe.

God's revealed plan of salvation is God's decision upon man's destiny, God's judgment of condemnation against human sin, and yet His judgment of justification on behalf of believing sinners, whom He regards as righteous through faith in Jesus Christ. The Bible may be rightly regarded as the book of divine judgments, the recorded sentences of the High Court of Heaven, the infallible decision of perfect holiness upon questions which concern our souls.

"This is the Judge that ends the strife
Where wit and reason fail;
Our guide through devious paths of life,
Our shield when doubts assail."

You may come to the Scriptures as men came to the throne of Solomon, where hard cases were at once met; yea, a greater than Solomon is here. Search God's Word, and you will have before your eyes the ultimate judgment of unerring truth, the last decree from the supreme authority, from which there is no appeal. The Bible contains the verdicts of the Judge of all the earth, the judgments of God, who cannot lie and cannot err. Thus God's Word is rightly called His "judgments." It is a book not to be judged by us, but to be our judge: not a word of it may be altered or questioned, but to it we may constantly refer as to a court of appeal whose sentence is decisive.

David in our text tells us how he desired the Lord's judgments, or His Word; by which we understand, first, that he greatly reverenced the Word. He was not among those who regard the Bible as a very important portion of human literature, but as being no more inspired than the works of Shakespeare or Bacon. Little as David had of the Scriptures, he had a solemn reverence for what he had, and stood in awe of it. I have no objection to honest criticism of the keenest kind, but I am shocked at certain divines who cut and carve the blessed Word as if it were some vile carcase given over to their butchery. When learned men handle the words of this book, let them not forget whose book it is, and whose words they are that they are examining.

There is a near approach to blasphemy against God Himself in irreverence to His Word. There is no book like this for authority and majesty; it is hedged about with solemn sanctions, so that it hath both a wall of fire round about it and a glory in its midst to make it distinct from all other writings. All other books might be heaped together in one pile and burned, as the Mohammedans burned the Alexandrian library, with less loss to the world than would be occasioned by the total obliteration of a single page of the sacred volume.

Oh sirs! the thoughts of men are vanity, the conceptions of men are low and grovelling at their best; and He who has given us this book has said, "My thoughts are not your thoughts; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My thoughts higher than your thoughts." Let it be to you and to me a settled matter that the Word of the Lord shall be honored in our minds and enshrined in our hearts. Let others speak as they may, "our soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto the Lord's judgments." We could sooner part with all that is sublime and beautiful, cheering or profitable, in human literature than lose a single syllable from the mouth of God.

But more: inasmuch as the Psalmist greatly reverenced God's Word, he intensely desired to know its contents. He had not much of it, probably only the five books of Moses; but the Pentateuch was enough to fill his whole soul with delight. Never depreciate, I pray you, the Old Testament. Remember that the great things that are said in the Psalms about the Word of God were not spoken concerning the New Testament, which was not then written: although they may most fitly be applied by us to the entire series of inspired books, yet they were originally spoken only concerning the first five of them, so that the first part of the Bible, according to the Holy Spirit's own testimony, is to be valued beyond all price.

The various books of Scripture do not increase in real value, they only advance in their adaptation to us; the light is the same, but the lantern is clearer, and we see more. The treasure of the Gospel is contained in the mines of the books of Moses, and I do not wonder therefore that David, instinctively knowing it to be there, but not being able to reach it, felt a great longing after it. He was not so well able to get at the truth as we are, since he had not the life of Christ to explain the types, nor apostolic explanations to open up the symbols of the law; therefore he sighed inwardly, and felt a killing heartbreak of desire to reach that which he knew was laid up in store for him.

HE SAW THE CASKET,

but could not find the key. If he had not been sure that the treasure was there, he would not have cried, "Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law;" but he was like a voyager on the verge of a discovery, who nevertheless cannot quite reach it. He was like Columbus out at sea with the fruits of an unknown continent floating beneath his keel; but the wind did not favor his reaching the shore. He was like a miner whose pick has struck upon a lump of metal, and he is sure that gold is there; but he cannot get it away from the quartz in which it is embedded. The more certain he is that it is there, and the harder it is to reach, the more insatiable does his desire become to possess himself of the treasure. Hence I see the reasonableness of the Psalmist's vehement passion, and I marvel not that he cried, "My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto Thy judgments at all times."

But I am sure that David did not merely want to know as a matter of intellectual pleasure, but he wished to feed upon God's Word; and what a very different thing that is, that feeding upon the Word, from the bare knowledge of it. You can teach a child many chapters out of the Bible, and yet it may not have fed on a word of it. I have known persons to be so foolish as to set it as a task to a child to learn a portion of Scripture. I call this foolish, and surely it is also wicked to make the Word of God into a punishment.

Our judgment must be daily more and more conformed to the judgments of God, which are laid down in Scripture, and there must, at any rate, be in our spirit a longing after holiness until we delight in the law of the Lord, and meditate therein both day and night. We shall grow to the likeness of that which we feed upon; will make us heavenly minded. The word received into the heart changes us into its own nature, and by rejoicing in the decisions of the Lord we learn to judge after his judgment and to delight ourselves in that which pleases Him. This sense, I think, comes nearer to the explanation of David's intense longing.

Doubtless, David longed to obey God's Word—he wished in everything to do the will of God without fault either of omission or of commission. He prays in another place, "Teach me Thy law perfectly." Do you, my hearer, long after perfection in that same fashion? for all that truly know God must have a mighty yearning to run in the way of the Lord's commandments. He does not live before God who does not crave to live like God. There is no regeneration where there are no aspirations after holiness. The actual practice of obedience is necessary as a proof of the possession of true grace, for the rule is invariable, "By their fruits ye shall know them." No man knows the Word of God till he obeys it: "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine."

The Psalmist also longed to feel the power of God's judgments in his own heart. You know something about this, my friend, if the Spirit of God has had dealings with you. Have you not felt the Lord judging you in the chamber of your conscience? The Spirit comes by the Word, and sets our iniquities before us, our secret sins in the light of His countenance.

David desires that God's Word would come right into him, and hold its court and judge and try him; and he came to feel this process to be so necessary and so salutary, that his soul broke with the longing which he had to be dealt with by God after this fashion. This is wisdom and prudence when a man so desires sanctification that he is straitened till painful processes are being carried on by which his purity is to be produced. It is a wise child that will, for the sake of health, ever long to take the appointed medicine; God's children are not far from being well when they have reached such a point of sacred judgment.

This is the wish of all true believers—to be perfectly conformed to the judgments of God. Some of us can honestly say that we would not have a second wish for ourselves if our heavenly Father would grant us this one—that we might be perfect even as He is. We would leave all matters else with Him as to wealth or poverty, health or sickness, honor or shame, life or death, if He would but give us complete conformity to His own will. This is the object of the craving, yearning, and sighing of our souls. We hunger to be holy.

Here I must correct myself as to our one desire; for surely if the Lord would make us holy, we should then desire that all other men would be the same. Oh that the world were converted to God! Oh that the truth of God would go forth like the brightness of the morning! Would God that every error and superstition might be chased away like bats and owls before the rising of the sun! O God, Thy servants long for this. We ask for nothing save these two things: first reign, O Lord, in the triple kingdom of our nature, and then reign over all nature. Let the whole earth be filled with Thy glory, and our prayers are ended.

I hope that in this sense our soul breaketh for the longing which it hath toward God's judgments.

II. And now, secondly, let us think of

THE SAINTS' ARDENT LONGINGS.

First, let me say of these longings, that they constitute a living experience, for dead things have no aspirations or cravings. You shall visit the graveyard, and exhume all the bodies you please, but you shall find neither desire nor craving. Longing lingers not within a lifeless corpse. Where the heart is breaking with desire, there is life. This may comfort some of you: you have not attained as yet to the holiness you admire, but you long for it: ah, then, you are a living soul, the life of God is in you. You have not yet come to be conformed to the precept, but oh! how you wish you were: that wish proves that a spark of the divine life is in your soul. The stronger that longing becomes, the stronger is the life from which it springs: a feeble life hath feeble desires, but a vigorous life hath vehement desires.

Next, recollect the expression used in our text represents a humble sense of imperfection. David had not yet come to be completely conformed to God's judgments, nor yet to know them perfectly, or else he would not have said that he longed for them. So it is with us. We have not reached perfection, but do not let us, therefore, be discouraged; for the apostle of the Gentiles said, "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect;" and the man after God's own heart, even David, when he was at his best, and I think he was so when he was writing this blessed psalm, says not so much that he had obtained anything, as that he longed after it, not so much that he had yet grasped it, but sighed for it: "my soul breaketh for the longing that it hath."

I do not envy

THOSE WHO HAVE NO MORE LONGINGS,

who have reached so divine a height that henceforth they can climb no higher. I heard of one who said his will was so perfectly resigned to the will of God that in fact he had no will, and so he had given up prayer, having nothing to seek. This is fine talk. When a man gets so full of life that he no longer breathes, I should say that he is dead. Prayer is the breath of the soul, and he that can do without it is dead in sin.

When a man thinks himself so good that he cannot be better, he is probably so bad that he could not be worse. That is the judgment which caution will pronounce upon him; for all good men long to be better, and better men desire to be best of all, that they may dwell in heaven. The more grace the saints have, the more they desire: sacred greed is begotten by the possession of the love of God: "My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto Thy judgments."

Furthermore, the expression of the text indicates an advanced experience. Augustine dwells upon this idea; for he rightly says, at first there is an aversion in the heart to God's Word, and desire after it is a matter of growth. After aversion is removed, there often comes an indifference in the heart; it is no longer opposed to godliness, but it does not care to possess it. Then, through divine grace, there springs up in the soul a sense of the beauty of God's Word and will, and an admiration of holiness; this leads on to a measure of desire after the good thing, and a degree of appetite for it; but it shows a considerable growth in grace when we ardently long after it, and a still larger growth when the soul breaks because of these longings.

The text represents the agonizing of an earnest soul. Such a state of things shows a considerable advancement in the divine life; but when a believer has those desires "at all times," then is he not far from being a full-grown Christian. "Oh!" say you, "he thinks so little of what he has that he is crushed under the burden of desire for more." Yes, and he is the very man who has most of spiritual wealth. The more full a man is of grace, the more he hungers for grace. Strange it is to say so, but the paradox is true, the more he drinks, and the more he is satisfied and ceases to thirst in one sense, the more is he devoured with thirst after the living God. It is an advanced experience, then.

And it is an experience which I cannot quite describe to you, except by saying that it is a bitter sweet; or, rather, a sweet bitter, if the adjective is to be stronger than the noun. There is a bitterness about being crushed with desire; it is inevitable that there should be, but the aroma of this bitter herb is inexpressibly sweet, no perfume can excel it. After all, a bruised heart knows more peace and rest than a heart filled with the world's delights. How safe such a soul is. "Oh!" said one, "I cannot go to hell, it is impossible, because I must love Jesus Christ and long after Him. It is not possible for Him to forbid me the privilege of loving Him, and to love Him and long for Him is happiness." Better to feel a heavenly hunger than a worldly fulness. Heart-break for God is a sweeter thing than content in sinful pleasures.

Still, those longings after God's Word may become very wearing to a man's soul. The sense of our text in the Hebrew is that of attrition or wearing down. Keble reads it—

> "My soul is worn and wasted quite > Thy laws desiring day and night."

They wear out the man when they become so fervent as those confessed in the text. I believe that some of the Lord's holy ones have been worn down to sickness and depression by the passion of their hearts after God: their souls have become like sharp swords which eat through their scabbards, for they have destroyed the body by intense inner desires. At times holy men draw so near to God, and pine so greatly after His glory, that for half a word they would pass the frontier and enter into heaven. They are so fully in accord with God that the shell which shuts in their soul is almost broken, and the new-born spirit is ready for its fullest life and liberty.

How blessed to shake off the last fragment of that which holds us back from the freedom of an immortal life in perfect agreement with God. Oh to attain to this! One saint cried, "Let me see the face of God," and another answered, "Thou canst not see God's face and live;" to which he replied, "Then let me see my God and die." So do we feel that our soul comes near to dying with her longings after her God; little would we tremble even if we knew that the joy of realization would be killing, and would pass us over the border into Immanuel's land, where we shall see the King in His beauty.

But I must not linger, though there is much to tempt me to speak on. Are you searching yourselves, brethren, to see whether you have such longings? If so, do you have them "at all times"? We are not to long for God's Word and will by fits and starts; we are not to have desires awakened by novelty or by excitement; nor are we to long for divine things because for awhile temporal things fail us, and we are sick and sorry, and weary of the world, and so in disgust turn to God. Brethren, I trust you long after God when all is bright in providence, and that you love His Word when all is pleasant in family affairs. It is well to desire the Lord's will when He is permitting you to have your own will as well as when He is thwarting you. God is to be always our delight.

III. And now I am going to close with a few

CHEERING REFLECTIONS.

Methinks this morning some heart has been saying, "There are comforting thoughts for me in all this. I am a poor thing, I have not grown much, I have not done much, I wish I had; but I have strong longings, I am very dissatisfied, and I am almost ready to die with desire after Christ." My dear soul, listen—let this encourage you.

First, God is at work in your soul. Never did a longing after God's judgments grow up in the soul of itself. Weeds come up of themselves, but the rarer kind of plant I warrant you will never be found where there has been no sowing: and this flower, called love-lies-bleeding, this plant of intense eagerness after God, never sprang up in the human breast of itself. God alone has placed it there. Friend, there was a time when you had no such longing. Ah! and if you were left to yourself, you would never have such longing again: you would decline till you became as content with the world as others are; you know you would.

Come, then, beloved, God is at work in your soul—let this comfort you. The great Potter has you yet upon the wheel—He has not cast you away as worthless: His work may pain you, but it is honorable and glorious. Your heart may swell with unutterable longings, and it may be torn by throes of desire, but life thus proves its presence, and reaches forth to something yet beyond. These pains of desire are the Lord's doings, and they should be perceived with gratitude.

The result of God's work is very precious. Come, though it be only a gracious desire, thank God for it. Though thou canst get no further than holy longing, be grateful for that longing. I would have thee strive for the highest gifts, but I would not have thee despise what God hath already given thee. I have known times when I thought myself in a very strange case, and I judged ill of myself, and yet a month or two afterward I have looked back upon that condition which I condemned, and I have wished that I could return to it. Has it not been so with you? You have been racked with sighs, groans, cravings, and other forms of unrest, and you have said, "O God, deliver me from this sore travail;" but when within a week you have had to lament insensibility and lukewarmness, you have cried, "Lord, put me back again into my state of desire! Lord, set me hungering and thirsting again, a fierce appetite is better than this deadness."

Hearken once again: not only is the desire precious, but it is leading on to something more precious. Hear ye that which is written:

"THE DESIRE OF THE RIGHTEOUS SHALL BE GRANTED."

What sayest thou to such words as these? "He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer." "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them." Do you think that God prompts us to desire a thing which He does not mean to bestow upon us? Is that the way you treat your children?

Meanwhile, the desire itself is doing you good. It is driving you out of yourself, it is making you feel what a poor creature you are; for you can dig no well in your own nature, and find no supplies within your own spirit. It is compelling you to look alone to God. Do not need much compelling. Come readily to your Lord. Be one of those vessels which can sail with a capful of wind. Come by faith to Jesus, even though you fear that your desires are by no means so vivid and intense as those of my text. Believe, and you shall be established. Rest assured of this, that there is in God whatever your soul wants. In Christ Jesus dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and in that divine fulness there must of necessity be more than a creature can require.

Oh, this is the blessedness of this longing after God's judgments, that it makes Christ precious; and, with that remark, I have done. We see all God's word in Christ; we see all God's decisions against sin and for righteousness embodied in our Saviour; we see that if we can get Christ, we have then found the wisdom of God, and the power of God, and, in fact, the all-sufficiency of God. If we can become like Christ, we shall be like unto God Himself. This, I say, makes Christ so precious, and makes us long to get more fully to know Him and to call Him ours. Come, ye longing ones, come to my Lord Jesus even now! Come, ye that are bursting with wishes and desires, come and trust the Saviour, and rest in Him now; and may this be the hour in which you shall find how true it is, "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled" May you yet sing the Virgin's song, "He hath filled the hungry with good things. My soul doth magnify the Lord."

"LEFT ALONE."

By Dr. Barnardo.

"LOOK 'ere, sir, just look at 'er—I say it's a sight to make anybody that has feelin's pity her."

"The poor dear 'as bin left alone this long while."

"If it worn't for Old Magg I dunno what she'd a' done."

It is not possible or perhaps necessary that I should recall every vociferation which came from the group of squalid men and draggled women who sought, after a very earnest fashion of their own, to draw my attention to a small lone figure sitting on a distant settle near the fire, to which, with pitying eyes and outstretched hands, they pointed; but what I have quoted were among the most distinct of all the statements which reached my ears amid the mingled din of assertion, explanation, and description with which I was favored.

I had only just entered the kitchen of a lodging-house in Bethnal-green, London, when I was "pounced upon" by a dreadful-looking—I suppose I must call her a woman, but, alack-a-day! there was but little of womanliness to distinguish her from the woe-begone creatures, the other occupants of the den, whose voices uttered in divers keys the aforesaid appeals.

One thing was unmistakable—none present were in ignorance as to the nature of my errand, and although seemingly aware that I could not assist them, were clamorously solicitous that such help as I could afford might be given to another, more eligible if not more necessitous.

And to any person not entirely case-hardened by intercourse with such people, this was in itself an aspect of the question which had no little pathos in it. It was as if they themselves—poor souls!—having at some time or other fallen over the edge of a dreadful precipice adown which they had since been rolling, and recognizing the terrible fact that they were hopelessly ruined, all mangled as they lay (really as well as metaphorically), yet could not view with indifference that feeble mite of humanity, sitting forlorn and alone on the distant bench, who seemed, to their eyes, in imminent danger of a like fate unless rescued now.

But WHO could do it? What hand could rescue her? And whose strong grasp could reach the little one, and save her from so sad a fate? The answer to the social problem appeared written in the look of expectancy seen in every face, as they glanced from me, and pointed to the girl. Instinctively those looks declared that they felt help was near. And if ever, in my inmost soul, a tide of gratitude rose to heaven for the mercies and opportunities of my office, it was at that moment, when I beheld this forlorn and shipwrecked group of humanity forget, as it seemed, their own abject misery in the hopes newly awakened that struggled for expression in the scarred and battered visages turned to mine—which seemed to plead with confidence that this poor stray lamb might be gathered into some safe fold ere it could wander as they had wandered, and suffer as they had suffered.

"Left alone!" exclaimed the woman called "Old Magg," when describing the child's condition. But could that indeed be true? And my eyes wandered inquiringly over the group, in which not one face seemed to justify the hopes expressed by perhaps our most gifted poetess—

> "Trust me, 'tis a clay above your scorning, > With God's image stamped upon it, and God's kindling breath within."

On the distant settle, raised some eighteen inches from the floor, and near the fire, sat a frail and delicate child, gazing intently into the glowing embers. She was a tiny girl, clad only in a few worn-out oddments, dark-haired, dark-eyed, with a face so pallid and wan that her eyes appeared larger and darker and more deeply sunk by contrast. I felt, as I looked at her, and noticed her curious abstraction, that she was thinking of things far away, and I too wondered what her thoughts were, and how long she had been sitting there gazing into the fire.

So there I stood, at some distance from her, still watching her; and she, seemingly unconscious of the presence of those who were so busy in discussing her fate, was, as it appeared to me, living for the time in some brighter world of her own creation, far removed from the squalid misery and wretchedness of the place in which she sat. Wherever her thoughts may have wandered, anyone who could understand the glow and flush that flitted over her face at times, must have gathered that, for a while at least, cold, hunger, cruel blows, and sad neglect were things forgotten.

The fragments of her brief history, as known to the inmates of the house, were quickly put together. The miserable child had been deserted by a still more miserable mother some time before, and but for the kindness of the poor creatures in this common lodging-house must have starved. A bit of broken victuals from one, a morsel of bread from another, a drink of cold tea from a third, kept body and soul together, and the "deputy," a coarse-looking fellow, who could have passed muster as a retired prize-fighter of not very creditable antecedents, had, with a rough feeling of mercy, which did him honor, kept the little waif for days in the house, not altogether without some risk to himself should his employer hear of it.

A curious fact is illustrated by this case. Not one inmate of the lodging-house—and there were some ninety-three individuals sheltered under this particular roof—had, it seems, ever thought of sending the deserted child to the poorhouse. An unreasoning dread stifled such an idea in the very birth, if it had ever risen in any mind. No! they would have gone on feeding her with scraps, the best they could spare, and giving her, for the present at all events, the run of the kitchen and of the streets. They would have sheltered her till she was bigger and older, as had been done, alas! in many other cases, until at length the girl, no longer a child, would somehow or other—one need hardly pause to inquire more particularly how—have gained a living for herself.

How can we account for this feeling, so widespread as all workers among the poor know it to be? Can it be that a popular writer and powerful delineator of things as they are, was right when he declared: "When we have got things to the pass that with an enormous treasure at disposal to relieve the poor, the best of the poor detest our mercies, hide their heads from us, and shame us by starving to death in the midst of us, it is a pass impossible of prosperity, impossible of continuance. It may not be so written in the Gospel according to Podsnappery; you may not 'find these words' for the text of a sermon in the returns of the Board of Trade; but they have been the truth since the foundations of the universe were laid, and they will be the truth until the foundations of the universe are shaken by the Builder. This boastful handiwork of ours, which fails in its terrors for the professional pauper, the sturdy breaker of windows, and the rampant tearer of clothes, strikes with a cruel and a wicked stab at the stricken sufferer, and is a horror to the deserving and unfortunate. We must mend it, lords and gentlemen and honorable boards, or in its own evil hour it will mar everyone of us."

I cannot attempt to discuss here the pros and cons of the vast problems suggested by these words, but need only briefly state that, as regards the one forlorn little girl I have described, the dwellers in this lodging-house were eagerly willing to commit her immediately to my care. Although regarded as the common property of all the inmates, the child seemed to be more particularly under the control of the woman who first spoke to me, and she gladly and at once surrendered the poor "waif" to me.

In the Village Home to which she was taken there are now not many less than five hundred other little girls happily sheltered, and although many of these have come to us from out of very different circumstances to those I have referred to in this paper, yet it may truly be said that orphanhood or destitution were the chief factors in the sorrows of their lives' histories.

What fate awaits the poor waif whose rescue I have described, when, after years of tender care and Christian instruction, she shall at length leave our Village Home to go out into the world, an industrious, respectable domestic servant, I need not anticipate, but I am sure no one who reads these pages will feel otherwise than glad that between midnight and 1 A.M., on a night in the early part of January, in the present year of grace, the writer met in a lodging-house in Bethnal-green this little maiden, eight years of age, who had been, in the words of "Old Magg," "left alone."

A MISSIONARY PARABLE.

By Mrs. H. Grattan Guinness.

A WEALTHY farmer, who cultivated some thousands of acres, had by his benevolence endeared himself greatly to his large staff of laborers. He had occasion to leave the country, in which his property was situated, for some years, but, before doing so, he gave his people clearly to understand that he wished the whole of the cultivated land to be kept in hand, and all the unreclaimed moor and marsh lands to be enclosed and drained and brought into cultivation; that even the hills were to be terraced, and the poor mountain pastures manured, so that no single corner of the estate should remain neglected and barren. Ample resources were left for the execution of these works, and there were sufficient hands to have accomplished the whole within the first few years of the proprietor's absence.

He was detained in the country to which he had been called very many years. Those whom he left children were men and women when he came back, and so the number of his tenantry and laborers was vastly multiplied. Was the task he had given them to do accomplished? Alas, no! Bog and moor and mountain waste were only wilder and more desolate than ever. Fine rich virgin soil by thousands of acres was bearing only briers and thistles. Meadow after meadow was utterly barren for want of culture. Nay, by far the larger part of the farm seemed never to have been even visited by his servants.

Had they then been idle? Some had. But large numbers had been industrious enough. They had expended a vast amount of labor, and skilled labor too, but they had bestowed it all on the park immediately around the house. This had been cultivated to such a pitch of perfection that the workmen had scores of times quarrelled with each other because the operations of one interfered with those of his neighbor.

And a vast amount of labor had been lost in sowing the very same patch, for instance, with corn fifty times over in one season, so that the seed never had time to germinate and grow and bear fruit; in caring for the forest trees, as if they had been tender saplings; in manuring soils already too fat, and watering pastures already too wet.

The farmer was positively astonished at the misplaced ingenuity with which labor and seed and manure, skill and time and strength, had been wasted for no result. The very same amount of toil and capital, expended according to his directions, would have brought the whole demesne into culture, and yielded a noble revenue. But season after season had rolled away in sad succession, leaving those unbounded acres of various, but all reclaimable, soils barren and useless; and, as to the park, it would have been far more productive and perfect had it been relieved of the extraordinary and unaccountable amount of energy expended on it.

Why did these laborers act so absurdly? Did they wish to labor in vain? On the contrary! They were forever craving for fruit, coveting good crops, longing for great results.

Did they not wish to carry out the farmer's views about his property? Well, they seemed to have that desire, for they were always reading the directions he wrote, and said continually to each other, "You know we have to bring the whole property into order." But they did not do it.

Some few tried, and ploughed up a little plot here and there, and sowed corn and other crops. Perhaps these failed, and so the rest got discouraged? Oh, no! they saw that the yield was magnificent; far richer in proportion than they got themselves. They clearly perceived that, but yet they failed to follow a good example. Nay, when the labors of a few in some distant valley had resulted in a crop they were all unable to gather in by themselves, the others would not even go and help them to bring home the sheaves! They preferred watching for weeds among the roses in the overcrowded garden, and counting the blades of grass in the park, and the leaves on the trees.

Then they were fools surely, not wise men? Traitors, not true servants to their Lord!

Ah! I can't tell! You must ask Him that! I only know their Master said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," and that 1880 years afterward they had not even mentioned that there was a Gospel to one half of the world!

THE SONG OF THE ANGELS.

A Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken, M.A.

"Glory to God in the highest'; on earth peace, goodwill toward men."—Luke 2 : 14.

The angels beheld the marvellous process in operation, which was to have its issue in the redemption of man from the dominion of sin, and the exaltation of poor frail and fallen creatures to a participation in the Divine nature (2 Peter 1 : 4). Perhaps even then they looked forward to the moment when should be attained, and the Bride of the Lamb should be presented by her Heavenly Bridegroom before His Father's throne, and as the wondrous vision rose before their eyes their hearts were filled to overflowing, and they made the welkin ring again with the cry, "Glory to God in the highest."

Wherever the Gospel message goes, and whenever the blessed truths which the Gospel was designed to convey are actually accepted by the human heart, there the same blessed results will follow, and the echo of that song will be heard when each of us personally fixes his gaze upon that which Christ has undertaken and achieved, and we taste in our own happy experience the peace which God's love through Christ has brought within our reach. We ourselves become His trophies, and while the sons of light are again constrained to sing for joy of heart, we too must blend our voices with theirs, and sing "Glory to God in the highest."

Have we yet learned the angels' song? If we know not how to sing it, is it not because we have not yet fixed our gaze on that object which provoked this outburst of holy exultation, "A Saviour, Christ the Lord?" Is He this to you? Have you grasped Him as your Saviour? Has your heart found its rest in the thought that a Saviour has been provided, my brother, for thee?

Let us talk reasonably on the matter. To what purpose is a saviour if he does not save? To what purpose is a physician if he does not heal? To what purpose is a governor who does not govern? We give people titles according to the occupations in which they are engaged. When we speak of the Saviour we speak of one who saves. Let us, then, press upon our hearts this inquiry, before we go any further.

It may be perfectly true that unto us there is born a Saviour, and it may be equally true that on yonder cross has died a Saviour by whose death salvation is brought within our reach; but has He saved you? Has that salvation been appropriated to your heart? It would be but little benefit to me if I were drowning in yonder canal, were a man with his breast decorated with to be there, and were I to be assured that he had saved many a dozen lives, while all the while I was drowning? But if that man plunged into the water beside me and offered his strong arm to stay me up, and I declined the offer—if, having such salvation quite within my reach, I failed to avail myself of it, he would be a saviour still, but my blood would surely be upon my own head.

Ah, my friends, the illustration but faintly depicts the folly of too many nominal Christians. The fact which made the angels sing for joy, that "unto you was born a Saviour," has been declared over and over again in your ears; has it made you sing for joy? How many are there here now to whom the Gospel of God's grace is the glad tidings of great joy? Have you cast yourselves at the feet of the new-born Saviour, and, carried away by a holy enthusiasm, exclaimed, "Unto me, the vilest of the vile, the least deserving of the undeserving, is born a Saviour, Christ the Lord?" If you have not gone so far as that, no wonder you have failed to join in the inspiring chorus of the angels, "Glory to God in the highest."

God designed that His glory should, if I may use such an expression, be augmented by the conquest of His love over the rebellious human heart. He designs to glorify Himself by bringing those, who without Him would sink into darkness and death, within the reach of His own omnipotent power, and lifting them from their degradation, and from the very chains of darkness and death, into the new and glorious liberty of the children of God. That is how God purposes to glorify Himself. Has He thus glorified Himself in you?

Observe, He might glorify Himself without you. He might turn us all into so many machines, and whether we would or would not, might insist on lifting us up from the low level of sin and pollution into the high level of purity and holiness; but, while this would have shown His sovereign power, it would not have exhibited His other attributes; for example, His sovereign wisdom—nay, it would have argued that there had been on His part defects in His original design, and weakness and vacillation in His purposes, which belong to poor frail man, but never to the Omnipotent, thrice holy and ever-blessed God.

But, while I speak of God's receiving glory from you and from me after this fashion, let us understand that, while it depends upon ourselves how that glory shall be given Him, in one way or other glorified He will be by each of us. Let us clearly keep in mind this tremendous fact, that in one way or other God will be glorified in every living creature that He has made—glorified as well by the loss of those who sink to perdition as by the salvation and exaltation of His saints.

THE PUNISHMENT OF THE LOST IN HELL, brought upon them by their own perversity, the legitimate result of their own folly, will glorify the eternal justice of God. But, at the same time, His desire is that He should be glorified in our salvation. In this way He is most fully glorified, for as we yield ourselves to Him, His glory in all its completeness falls on us, and is, as it were, reflected back again.

Now, my friends, I want to ask you and that is, have you yet begun to glorify God? How much glory has God got out of your lives? Understand, God is not glorified by hollow conventional formality, which often passes for religion. I tell you God is no more glorified by the barren routine of going to church once or twice a week than He would be by an Indian praying machine. There is as much blind superstition in many Protestant churches as there is in any pagan temple of China or India. People fancy that God is pleased by the process of saying prayers. I tell you that God can be mocked, and therefore displeased, by prayers that come from the false and hypocritical heart; God can only be worshipped when He is worshipped in spirit and in truth. We can only sing "glory to God" when we have received Christ as our Saviour, and when our spirits are rejoicing in His abundant and abiding salvation.

Let me ask you, When do we begin to glorify God? And I will answer, that we first begin to glorify God when we trust Him to do what none but Himself can undertake, much less accomplish. If I were dying, and all the doctors in this town had given me up as hopeless, and it happened to be known that in London, or somewhere else, there was one single physician, and that physician were to communicate to me that he was able to cure me, I should contribute my little to glorify that physician if I were to place myself entirely into his hands. I could do no greater credit to that physician than by that act.

HOW SHALL I GLORIFY GOD?

I glorify Him for the first time when, finding myself utterly unable to save myself, I cast all my self-reliance to the winds, and leave myself in all helplessness entirely to Him. Begone, self-righteousness! Begone, all ye efforts of my own will to improve my own position! Begone, all trust in my own performances, or even in my own faith! Now, Thou great Saviour of humanity, Thou Redeemer of a fallen world, I put myself into Thy hands. Thou art "a Saviour, Christ the Lord," and I trust Thee to do what none but Thyself can do—to save my soul. Ah! then I begin to glorify God. Have you begun to give unto the Lord the honor due unto His name? Let Him have that meed of honor, the glory of saving your perishing soul. And when this first great end, the glory of God, is insured, others follow in its train.

II. "PEACE ON EARTH."

It seemed a great thing that even for angels to anticipate, for this world of ours was a home of unrest and strife, a discord amidst universal harmony, a jarring wire in the vast harp of a well-strung universe. Were they wrong in their anticipations, those sons of light? Eighteen centuries have passed away, and still fields are drenched with human gore, and fierce debates and dissensions divide party from party, and man from man. Did their hopes outrun their prophetic vision, and is Peace still too shy and timid a guest to adventure her presence in this world of woe?

Nay, they were right, despite all appearances to the contrary; for Peace began her reign when Christ appeared, and even now she enters every heart that welcomes her Prince. Where He is received the inward tumult is stilled, and there is a great calm, and the more His presence is felt and cherished, the deeper and fuller the peace becomes; and by and by the angels' song shall be fulfilled altogether, when the Prince of Peace shall take His right, and reign without a rival in a ransomed world.

III. "GOODWILL TOWARD MEN."

So ends the wondrous song, and here begins the happy period of filial confidence and love. Man need no longer doubt the attitude of God toward him. The invisible is revealed in the person of the new-born Child, the disposition and will of the Father is to be read in the life and death of the Son. The vast storehouse of Divine benevolence is to be opened to mankind by that mystic key, the Cross. And the sons of men are to learn not that there is an indignant God to be propitiated and appeased, whom they well might regard with fear and suspicion, but that a benignant Father has given to them, not in passing over their sins—for that might have done them harm—but in providing from His own bosom One who should Himself make satisfaction for them, and bring the blessed results of that satisfaction within reach of all. "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, to the end that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Brethren, have you in your experience felt the truth of the angels' song? Do you know what it is to give glory to God, or is it charged against you, as against Belshazzar of old, "The God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified?" Have you tasted of that inward peace, the heavenly element that Jesus brought to earth with Him, and which He introduces into each heart that receiveth Him? Are you rejoicing in God's manifested goodwill, and trusting to it for every present and future blessing?

Oh, what are earth's fairest pleasures without this true celestial joy of which the angels sung? What but a mockery of the needs of your soul? "Unto you" who sit in darkness and the shadow of death, who have lived for a hollow, fleeting world, only to find it vain—"unto you is born a Saviour, Christ the Lord." Take Him as your Saviour, claim Him of God as God's best and loftiest gift to your own empty heart; and then, with all the company of heaven, you, too, will be able to sing, "Glory to God in the highest; and on earth peace, goodwill toward men."

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Lady Isabel's Inquiry—An Offer of Books—An Invitation to a Coffee Tavern—A Visit to Lucy's Home—The Burden of Love—Lucy's Father.

JUST as Albert was wondering what he could answer to a speech so incomprehensible, and at the same time not wishing to seem unsympathizing in the man's unknown difficulties, and at the first moment of his confidence too, they reached by a turn in the road two lines of shady trees, the first beginning of a pavement, and some straggling houses, which told the beginning of the town. Here, also, an open lodge gate, by which its keeper was standing, revealed a long avenue skirted by some fine old shrubs.

Down the avenue, at a rapid pace, came a low victoria, drawn by a couple of spirited ponies, and driven by a lady. Half turning, she said to her groom, "Who is that?" indicating by her whip that she had caught sight of Albert, his two companions, and the remainder of the working gang who had already almost reached them.

"Young Mr. Eldridge, my lady," answered the groom.

"A son of the builder?" she asked.

"Yes, my lady."

"I thought so," she said to herself, and, touching her ponies with the ivory-handled whip that she held so lightly, she drove up to the young man, saying, "Mr. Eldridge, may I speak to you for a moment?"

"Certainly," said Albert, knowing well the carriage, but not quite certain for the moment whether it was Lady Isabel who was speaking to him. It was Lady Isabel. She saw him leaving the men he had been walking with, to come to her side, so in her gentle, silvery voice she said, "Oh, no! don't let me take you away from them. I want to see them too;" and she drove on a pace or two.

"I have been wanting to see you very much," she said to the men rather more than to him, and then, turning to him again, "I am so glad I have met you. Don't you," she said to Hal, "go by the gate every day, and good many other men—all these perhaps!" she added, smiling, "to the large brick house that is being built? About a couple of miles off, isn't it?"

"Yes! my lady," said Hal, "we're all a-workin' up there."

"Then do you come in and out every day?"

"We does," said Curly; "'tain't much of a walk, not for us, miss—beg your pardon—my lady," he corrected himself, touching his hat.

"I was just thinking how tired you must be!" said Lady Isabel, smiling again. "I want to know if you would accept a little parcel of tracts and books and picture papers from me sometimes."

"That we should!" said many voices, "and like 'em very well too."

"Thank 'ee kindly," said one.

"I am so glad you would like them!" said Lady Isabel. A lovely, gentle woman she was, fair to look upon. Lady Isabel had with the simplest, though ever-graceful, attire the beauty of a true lady. But more than this, in herself she was lovely, in character and feature alike; and lately that added sweetness of refinement that is thrown like a halo about the heart wholly consecrated to the Saviour Himself, and a life truly enlisted in His most sacred service, had shone about her. This reality made all that she said thoroughly natural, simple, and genuine, as from her heart, while it gave a force and power to words that from other lips would oftentimes have sounded tame, and have proved ineffective.

"If you like to ask next Saturday and every Saturday at the lodge, you will find the parcel waiting for you when you pass. How many men are there of you, who go by this way every day to the works?"

A rapid counting up took place, and some one replied, "Ten on us there is goes by this way."

As they once more continued on their homeward journey, many were the smiles, nods, and "Thank 'ee kindlies" that testified to the gratitude and pleasure felt by these rough sons of the soil, at the young lady's announcement, and the kind interest, as a friend, that she had just shown in them. They were surprised too, for this sort of incident was not one that occurred every day. Indeed, such an interview, at this picturesque part of the road, which to them was prosaic and monotonous enough, had never cheered their lives before. And the uneventfulness of a workingman's life makes every little variety precious.

In this fact lies one of the strongest elements of temptation. The bait clothed in ever so coarse a gilding is a bait to him, because it is a change from the prose of daily life. Moneyed pleasures he cannot indulge in, therefore a certain round of enticements—very limited, it is true, but none the less real—have been provided for him by the Arch-enemy of souls. They have been cheapened, and thus put within his reach. But for this reason it is easy to give him pleasure. Like all evils, this can be overruled for good. A kind word, a pleasant smile, a trifling gift, a look of love, is of double the value to him that it would be to many another who is more favored, as far as the world's fortunes go.

"The men are gone," she said, "and I only accomplished half of what I wanted to say to them. And then I have been keeping you waiting all the time too."

"Is there any message that I could give them, my lady?" inquired Albert. "I should be happy to do it for you."

Lady Isabel hesitated. Then, as she looked into Albert's honest, pleasant face, she suddenly said, "Perhaps you would help me! I was going to have invited them to come to the new coffee-house in the town some evening. Perhaps you would meet them, too; and then, if you were to promise them that, they would like to go; for I expect you are their friend. Are you not?" she added, with a sudden sympathy in her eye that showed that strong feeling lay somewhere in the direction of the simple word she had spoken.

"I want to be their friend," said Albert responsively. "But ——" and there he paused.

Then he added, "Would it be too much to ask you to meet the men here to-morrow at this hour, and invite them yourself? I would try to come too at the same time. And if I might suggest that they could be allowed to meet yourself at the coffee-room, I don't doubt that a good number of them would come in the evening—any evening you liked to mention."

"I will," said Lady Isabel, another gleam of sweetness flashing in her bright eye. "I will. Good evening! Many thanks to you for having had this talk with me;" and she was gone. Driving swiftly along the little street, up by a turn that led on to the common, and off into a narrow lane, where honeysuckles twined and wild rose tendrils now presented nothing but their wintry aspect of a series of dry, brown sticks.

At the farther end of the lane stood a cottage, rambling and gabled. Its thin wisps of curling blue smoke, generally so conspicuous on the horizon from the foot of the little ascent, were now lost in the deepening fog, but a pale light glimmered out from the latticed pane. At the little wooden gate Lady Isabel alighted from her low carriage, and disappeared within the creeper-covered walls. Here she found a kitchen-parlor, broad and square, its floor unevenly tiled but intensely clean, and its large chimney-corner, within which the fire glowed and burned and glowed again, presenting an aspect of homely comfort that could not but welcome the incomer.

"Lucy!" said Lady Isabel, "where are you? I can't see you to-night at all!"

"Oh! is it you, my lady?" replied Lucy. "I am here lying down. I was tired, so I am not in my corner to-night. But I hope you will come in and sit down."

Lady Isabel was soon in her accustomed place, and in her cheery voice lightening the shadows of a very tired life. Lucy had suffered long from painful and wearing disease. Unable, except in the brightest summer evening when the air was at its softest, to leave her cozy nook; deprived of every outer help, and many an inner solace, that those of superior means, education, and resource can so easily enjoy, she counted, with an intensity difficult to describe, on the precious visits from her friend.

"Lucy!" said Lady Isabel, "I have been thinking that you and I might 'agree' to pray for our neighbors. I feel so differently about them now from what I used to. It constantly weighs upon my mind that I owe them a debt! Such an uncomfortable feeling, you would think. But no! it is not exactly that to me; only solemn, and a responsibility. I don't quite know how to describe it; for I think the feeling rather gives me pleasure, and adds an interest to my life.

"I will try to explain what I mean. I do not, when I speak of debt, mean the feeling that one would have if one had not paid any of one's bills in the town. It is something quite different from that. But suppose I had got into a great scrape, and owed a quantity of money, and knew that I could not possibly pay it now, or at any future time. At this juncture a great, noble friend steps in and pays it all for me, and leaves the next day for another country, saying he does not know when we can meet again; and saying I need not think of paying him, for that he knows it is impossible I ever can. The burden on me of gratitude and overwhelming unworthiness, after having been thus benefited by his friendship, and having received so priceless a boon, would be so great, that I should be almost unconsciously trying to live out the payment of my debt, seeking, striving, yearning to do anything that would be an equivalent to one-hundredth part of what I owed him."

"I know what you mean, my lady," eagerly interrupted Lucy. "I have felt it often. It is just the burden and debt of love. Jesus did so much for me—He is so much to me—what can I DO for Him?—what can I BE to Him? Isn't that it, my dear lady?"

Her visitor replied with streaming eyes. Her silence spoke. One word on that hallowed theme, one mention of that Name, to her so precious, was quite sufficient at any time to bring a rush of tears to those soft, blue eyes; and such an exact rendering of her heart's meaning, from lips that had brought her so many pure teachings, was indeed the unloosing of the tenderest fountain of her being.

Lady Isabel had feasted on the Divine Word alone in that room with the girl the neighbors called "poor Lucy." Lady Isabel could not call her so. She felt that this suffering one was rich—far richer than most of the gayly-adorned and sumptuously fed ladies of her acquaintance. She felt that the emptiness of their conversation and the hollowness of their lives proved a poverty of existence that surpassed words. Poor in mind, but too often, alas! not poor in spirit!

Lady Isabel sometimes shuddered as she went from a season of sweet, helpful communion with the inmate of the farm cottage, into an evening drawing-room, to hear the volume of vapid talk, polite scurrility, and senseless songs that could flow so ceaselessly from pretty mouths, lips formed for divine praise and fashioned by Love—that name by which the mighty Creator has announced Himself to His children.

When she recovered herself, Lady Isabel said, "Will you pray for our new coffee-house, Lucy? I want your prayers. Let us agree to pray twice a week, every Tuesday and Friday—alone or together, as the case may be—for our neighbors, rich and poor, and especially for the coffee-house. I want it to be made a centre of very great blessing in the place—a blessing to us all, you know!" she added brightly, as, after a few kind words, she gathered up her skirt, with her bag and gloves, and prepared to leave.

"Where is your mother?" she asked, as by an after-thought, just as her hand was upon the door handle.

"Mother has gone to help in some washing to-day, but father will be in directly. I heard his step just now."

So saying, "father" appeared at the door. A burly-looking man he was, clothed in his working costume, his hair ruffled, hot, and hands none of he cleanest. Confronting Lady Isabel thus suddenly, whom he could see less as she stood with her back to the fire-light than she could see him, as they met in the doorway. Not very long ago Lady Isabel would have shunned such an encounter, but to-day her heart had been opened by her prayers and thoughts for the coffee-room, her kind reception by the gang at her own gate, and by her soul-stirring conference with Lucy. Instead of shrinking back from the stranger, she accepted with her sweetest smiles, and pleasantest offer of her hand, his rough and startled apology.

"How fortunate I am!" she said; and then added, "Everything happens right to-day. I was just thinking of you and wishing to see you, and—here you are!"

"Me! mum," said the man. "Beg yer pardon—my hand isn't clean. I've only just come off my job. Where's your mother, Luce?"

Something was not "straight" in the cottage when "the missus" was not there; and bluff though he was, and hard of speech, Jem leant upon his "better half," and missed her if she was absent, as many another strong man does in similar and unsimilar circumstances.

FOLLOWING JESUS.

S.S. Lesson for April 3d. Luke 9 : 49–62. Golden Text, ver. 57. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

FOLLOWING Jesus! this is our subject for to-day, and this is our life's vocation. "My sheep hear My voice, and I know them, and they follow Me," says our blessed Lord (John 10 : 27). It is the characteristic of His sheep, and the indispensable requisite of His disciples that they should follow Him. In the very commencement of His ministry, before He had chosen the twelve to "be with Him and that He might send them forth to preach" (Mark 3 : 14), He called Simon and Andrew and "saith unto them, Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men;" just afterwards, He called James and John, "and they immediately left the ship and their father and followed Him" (Matt. 4 : 18–22); so with Philip (John 1 : 43) and Matthew (Matt. 9 : 9), the Lord called them personally and they obeyed Him.

But following Jesus must always be at a cost; Andrew and Peter "left their nets," James and John "left the ship and their father," Matthew (also called Levi) "left all, rose up, and followed Him" (Luke 5 : 28); and Jesus says, "Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be My disciple" (i.e. My follower). Jesus left all, forsook all that He had during the time of His sojourn upon earth, and to follow Him we must do likewise. That which He left for us was infinitely more than we can leave for Him. Thus the Lord Jesus says, "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me" (Matt. 16 : 24). The Lord Jesus put Himself out of the question when He was upon earth; His will, His convenience, His honor were not considered, and in denying ourselves we must learn to do likewise; for to deny ourselves is to put ourselves out of the question in all circumstances, and then instead of avoiding we can take up as our vocation every cross which is presented to us. This is a lesson which human nature rebels against, and self pronounces exaggerated and impossible, but this is the very meaning of being crucified with Christ, of living, not unto ourselves, but unto Him which died for us and rose again.

But to follow Jesus we must accept Him as our Leader, never forming our own plans, but waiting upon His directions. "He leadeth me beside the still waters," but not always, for sometimes His leading is "through the valley of the shadow of death;" but nevertheless this testimony is true of all those who have yielded to His leading: "He led them forth by the right way that they might go to a city of habitation" (Ps. 107 : 7). He led Joseph into slavery and prison, Moses into the wilderness, Elijah by the brook Cherith, Daniel into captivity, in order to fit them for the great work to which He called them afterwards. Bless God, it was the right way. How many more of such men there might have been if children of God who have met with trials and humiliations had denied themselves, taken up their cross and followed after Jesus! It is a Bible word but little understood, "Behold we count them happy which endure" (James 5 : 11). The majority even of believers are in a continued war and strife with circumstances; they are their own pioneers and have not learned to see God in all things, and they have not confidence enough in Jesus to follow Him without reserve.

Immediately preceding the verses chosen for our subject we read that there arose a reasoning among the disciples which of them should be the greatest. Jesus "took a child and set him by Him and said unto them, Whosoever shall receive this child in My name receiveth Me: and whosoever shall receive Me receiveth Him that sent Me: for he that is least among you all the same shall be great." The disciples were slow to learn that they were nothing in themselves, and that their only power and only worth was for His name's sake. Whosoever received either the disciples who were working miracles or a simple little child in His name equally received Him, and because He came in His Father's name whosoever received Him received Him that sent Him. The disciples naturally looked at the usefulness of their lives, at the marvellous things they were enabled to do, and they forgot that they were servants and instruments of the name of Jesus instead of being lords over and employers of that name of power.

The words of our Lord seem to have created a misgiving in the heart of John as to whether he had done rightly: "Master," he said, "we saw one casting out devils in Thy name: and we forbad him because he followeth not with us." O that this spirit had died with John! How many ministers there are in all Christian lands who condemn, and even forbid when they have the power, all lay work because the doers of it are not ministers! How many churchmen condemn the work of dissenters because they follow not with them, and dissenters equally condemn churchmen. How many baptized believers condemn the work of all who have not received adult baptism. State churches condemn free churches and free churches condemn State churches with even greater bitterness, and all this is among the so-called followers of Christ! O the grief of His heart: "They parted My garments among them and upon My vesture did they cast lots" (Matt. 27 : 35).

What said the Lord Jesus? "Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a miracle in My name that can lightly speak evil of Me. For he that is not against us is on our part" (Mark 9 : 39, 40). The party feeling of the disciples was wounded, they wanted to have a monopoly of the name of Jesus, and of the works of power which were done by it. This could not, and must not be. "He followeth not with us" was no sign that he did not follow Jesus. The test of a Christian worker is this: "Does he do miracles, does he win souls from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, and does he do them in the name of Jesus?" Eloquence, natural influence, latent learning are not powers which can work miracles.

We next see our blessed Lord "when the time was come that He should be received up," steadfastly setting His face to go to Jerusalem. "I have set My face like a flint" (Isa. 50 : 7). He knew all things that should happen unto Him, but He did not draw back. When He sent messengers into a village of the Samaritans that they should make ready for Him they "did not receive Him, because His face was as though He would go to Jerusalem." His heart was full of the fearful encounter with sin and death which He was going up to face, and here on the way He must meet with the miserableness of party spirit. If He would hold with the Samaritans, well, but His face was turned towards those who condemned them. James and John, full of party spirit on their side, and proud perhaps of the exercise of divine power which was entrusted them for healing, said, "Lord, wilt Thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them even as Elias did?" But he turned, and rebuked them, and said, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. And they went unto another village."

Retaliation, this is man's way, but Solomon says, "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city" (Prov. 16 : 32). But how few there are who know how to endure! "This is thankworthy if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully." Our blessed Lord's life was one long endurance; here and there we get a glimpse of the burden of His heart: "O faithless and perverse generation! how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you?" (Matt. 16 : 17). "Ye will not come unto Me that ye might have life" (John 5 : 40). O how little did James and John know of their Master's spirit, how little did they know of their own! Christ came, not to destroy but to save, His followers must under all circumstances seek the salvation and the blessing of all whom they meet with, whether friends or would-be-enemies. "The servants of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves" (2 Tim. 2 : 24, 25).

The Master did not force His presence upon those who were unwilling to receive Him; "they went unto another village." But on the way "a certain man said unto Him, Lord, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest." So said Peter before God taught him to know his own heart, so say many who are full of natural zeal and energy. But the Lord said unto him, "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay His head." The real follower of Jesus must make no stipulation as to what amount of earthly comfort and convenience may be his. And although we may always be truly grateful for every temporal blessing which we are given by the Lord, yet as followers of Christ we can claim none as our right, and therefore if for Christ's sake we are put to inconvenience, and humanly speaking our health is endangered by cold or damp rooms, by want of air or food, etc., let us remember that this is part of our vocation in following Him who had "not where to lay His head."

To another the Lord said, "Follow Me. But he said, Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. Jesus said unto him, Let the dead bury their dead; but go thou and preach the kingdom of God." The man said, "Lord suffer me first to go and bury my father," my father first, the kingdom of God second. But Jesus had already taught His disciples, "He that loveth father or mother more than Me, is not worthy of Me" (Matt. 10 : 37). God does not teach us in His Word that we should neglect our family duties; on the contrary, it is written, "If any man provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." But all must be in its own order. If, for instance, the attendance at a funeral, where no good can be done to the dead, hinders some real service to the living, all care as to what may be expected of us must be set aside; the living God has the first claim upon us whether we are in office or not. This man, although he was neither one of the twelve (chap. 6 : 1, 2), nor yet one of the seventy (chap 10 : 1, 9), yet as being a follower of Christ, was charged to preach the Gospel.

Another said, "Lord, I will follow Thee; but let me first go bid them farewell which are at home at my house. And Jesus said unto him, No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." Many think, I will have one more dance, and then I will follow Jesus fully; I will have one more game at billiards, and then I will consecrate myself fully to the Lord; when our family gathering at Christmas is over, and I shall not be so subject to other influences, then I will give up all for Jesus; when I have finished the novel I am reading, then I will be fully decided—and it never comes to pass! If the following of Jesus is right, if it is worth our while, then the more abruptly we break from all other habits and all other influences the better. Reader, are you following Jesus?

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Engrossing Topic of the Week in all Foreign capitals has been the assassination of the Czar. The accounts of the crime received from St. Petersburg are disjointed, and in some particulars contradictory. It was at first asserted that both the men who threw the bombs were arrested; subsequently it was stated that only one was in custody, and that the other was slain in the explosion which killed the Czar. Another report has it that the thrower of the second bomb escaped. The plot seems to have originated at Geneva, and appears to have been more carefully and elaborately arranged than any which has heretofore been made. Assassins furnished with bombs were placed along the second route which the Czar might have taken on his return from the riding school, and a secret mine was prepared on another route, in case he should escape the bomb-throwers.

M. Rochefort, the Parisian communist, has gone to Geneva to obtain information about the plot, and asserts that the man captured could not have been one of the assassins, who, he says, were persons of high position. The Nihilist correspondent of an American journal relates that, three weeks before the assassination, the Czar had an interview with a deputation of the Nihilists, when an appeal was made to him to grant a constitution to Russia. The Czar emphatically and finally refused, and the correspondent says that arrangements for his murder were then promptly completed. The commission of such crimes is usually assigned to men selected from the Society by lot, but on this occasion more than thirty persons volunteered to undertake it, and a selection was made from the volunteers. It appears that the Czarevitch was to have been blown up with his father, and was only saved by the providential circumstance of having returned to his palace alone on the fatal day. A Nihilist manifesto issued since the assassination intimates that other startling crimes are contemplated.

The Funeral of the Late Emperor of Russia is arranged to take place on March 27th. Members of all the reigning families of Europe are expected to be present. The eldest son of the Emperor of Germany, the Crown Prince of Denmark, the brother of the Emperor of Austria, and two near relatives of the King of Italy are already on their way to St. Petersburg. The Prince of Wales will represent Queen Victoria at the obsequies, although he has been notified that he will do so at his peril. It is feared that, unless extraordinary precautions are taken, the Nihilists will take the opportunity of so many royal personages being in one place at the same time, to inflict a crushing blow which will be felt throughout Europe. The Princess of Wales, with the devotion which has always characterized her, has begged to be allowed to accompany her husband, and to share whatever danger may attend the journey. She is also anxious to express by her presence, her sympathy with her sister-in-law the Duchess of Edinburgh, the daughter of the late Czar, and to see her sister, who has now become Empress of Russia.

The Negotiations Between the British General and the Boers were still proceeding at last accounts. The reported disagreements are understood to relate to the form of government the Transvaal shall adopt. Great Britain insists, in the interest of her South African subjects, that she shall have the power to maintain order in the Transvaal, and to interfere in case of disturbances breaking out in that country, and to punish depredations on Cape Colony. The Boer leaders, on the other hand, demand complete independence. The British cabinet profess to entertain well-grounded hopes of a peaceful settlement being effected.

The Conference of Ambassadors at Constantinople has not at present arrived at a solution of the difficulty between Greece and Turkey. The London Pall Mall Gazette, a journal usually well informed on foreign affairs, says: "The news from the East is ominous of war. Crete is the maximum which the Turks offer to cede. The cession of Crete and Thessaly is the minimum which the Powers will accept. Unless means can be found to bring the minimum nearer the maximum, the Greeks will cross the frontier, and a war will begin which may not close until it has spread far beyond the limits of the Ottoman empire." The London correspondent of the New York World telegraphs: "The ambassadors at the Constantinople conference are doing their utmost to bring about a peaceable settlement. Mr. Goschen, the British ambassador, has used all his influence with the Porte to induce it to make the concessions demanded by the other powers, but the Ottoman Ministry is stubborn to a degree, and it is believed in official circles that war is inevitable. The accession of the new Czar has greatly increased the difficulty of arriving at a satisfactory settlement."

A Lull in Irish Affairs has Followed the Enactment of the coercion measures. An attempt has been made to convey the impression that the U. S. Government are in sympathy with Mr. Parnell. The American embassy in London, as a matter of courtesy, forwarded to Mr. Parnell a telegram received from a society at St. Louis, expressing sympathy and confidence in that person. It has been made to appear that our Minister, by forwarding the message, endorsed its contents, but a prompt explanation from Mr. Lowell has dissipated the impression.

A serious riot broke out on St. Patrick's day at Aldershot, England, where several regiments are stationed, largely composed of Irish soldiers. The Irishmen of two regiments who had been celebrating St. Patrick's day by liberal potations raised national cries, and were soon joined by their countrymen belonging to other regiments. The guard were unable to quell the disturbance, and two regiments were called out who charged the rioters with fixed bayonets, wounding several and taking many prisoners. It is an ominous circumstance, in the present condition of Ireland, that so large a proportion of the British army are Irishmen.

A Box Containing Forty Pounds of Gunpowder, with a lighted fuse attached, was found in the London Mansion House, the official residence of the Lord Mayor of London, shortly before midnight on Wednesday, March 16th. A policeman passing the building noticed a light burning on one of the window-sills, and attempted to pull the burning stuff away. He found that it was attached to a box full of compressed gunpowder which must have exploded in a short time had he not noticed it and extinguished the fuse. An impression prevails that it was a Fenian plot against the Lord Mayor, who voted in Parliament for the coercion bill. The Irish party on the other hand, assert that the whole thing was a stupid hoax, concocted to excite the people against the Land Leaguers. It has, however, been deemed prudent to double the guard of soldiers at the Bank of England. Vigilant watch is also being kept on the Royal Exchange and the bank and insurance buildings which are in the vicinity of the Mansion House. The houses of Parliament, which were thoroughly explored the other day, are constantly guarded by a picked posse of detectives, besides the regular officers on duty there. It is not forgotten that a few years ago much property was destroyed, and many injuries inflicted, in an attempt of the Fenians to blow up one of the London prisons.

Dr. W. Morley Punshon, the Eminent Methodist minister, is ill. An English journal, says: "Dr. Punshon's many friends will learn with deep regret that this popular minister has been stricken down by severe illness. According to a statement made last Sunday by the Rev. R. Roberts, who fulfilled a preaching engagement for him, Dr. Punshon's nervous system has been completely shattered by the recent death of his son. This statement recalls to mind that Dr. Punshon was laid aside some years ago by a distressing nervous affection, from which however, his recovery appeared to be complete. The community will hope for better news of Dr. Punshon's condition."

The Romanists in Cologne have Adopted a novel way to annoy Mrs. Baxter, who writes the Sunday-school lessons for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They have put a story into circulation that she would give eighty thalers ($75) to every person who would come over to her persuasion. One lad was asked who had told him so, and said it was the Capelane—i. e., Roman Catholic curate. Constantly the request for this money was made by letter and in person. Although in the meeting Mrs. Baxter read aloud one letter asking for it, and spoke of the awful sin of being willing to sell one's soul for money, and of the real cost at which sinners are saved, the people, who are so used to lying that they do not believe anything one says, continued to make the same demand, and were furious because they did not get it. Some of the priests, however, have spoken kindly of Mrs. Baxter's work.

The Ignominious Failure of Legalized Sabbath-breaking is announced at Maidstone, England. The town council of that place, after an experiment of three years, has resolved to bring to an end the Sunday opening of their museum and library. The reason is given by the Mayor, who said: "He believed it had been proved beyond contradiction that the museum had not been resorted to as had been expected. The people who were expected to go did not attend. It was used principally by a number of young persons who went there not so much to inspect and study the contents of the museum as to meet together to amuse themselves." Many philanthropists at Maidstone and elsewhere believed that the museum would attract the people from the drinking saloons. But they were mistaken. The scheme was one of "doing evil that good may come," and God does not bless such a principle.

A Gravedigger Buried Alive.—At the Islington Cemetery, in London, one of the gravediggers, a young man, was directed by the superintendent, on February 4th, to prepare a grave, and he obeyed taking the usual precautions of putting in boards and struts to keep up the sides and ends of the excavation as he dug down. He had reached to a depth of about fifteen feet, and was at the bottom still at work, when some of the other men at work in the vicinity heard a crash, and on going to the spot it was found that the whole of the sides of the grave had fallen in, burying the poor fellow at the bottom, who had thus actually dug his own grave. Several men were soon on the spot, and set to work to extricate him, but nearly six hours elapsed before the dead body was extricated. This circumstance is a type of the course many men are pursuing. By a life of dissipation and vice they are preparing their own graves.

Getting a Motto from a Sleeping Man.—The late Henry Moorhouse once set out in company with Mr. Hambleton to speak for Christ at some races. On their way they stayed at an hotel where they occupied the same bedroom for the night. Mr. Hambleton says: "Hour after hour passed while Henry was fast asleep; my mind was travelling through the Scriptures for an appropriate text for the second side of a board we took with us, no answer coming from the Lord to direct me to the proper one. When about giving up the matter till the morrow, Henry sat up in the bed (still fast asleep), and began talking as though he were relating an adventure at some place from which he had just returned, saying with great earnestness 'There I stood with a board on which was printed "Christ for me! Christ for me!" and the poor people were singing so happily.' He then said, 'Praise the Lord! Mercy's free!' breathed heavily, lay down quietly, and slept on till morning. But I had the appropriate words for the board—'Christ for me! Praise the Lord! Mercy's free!'"

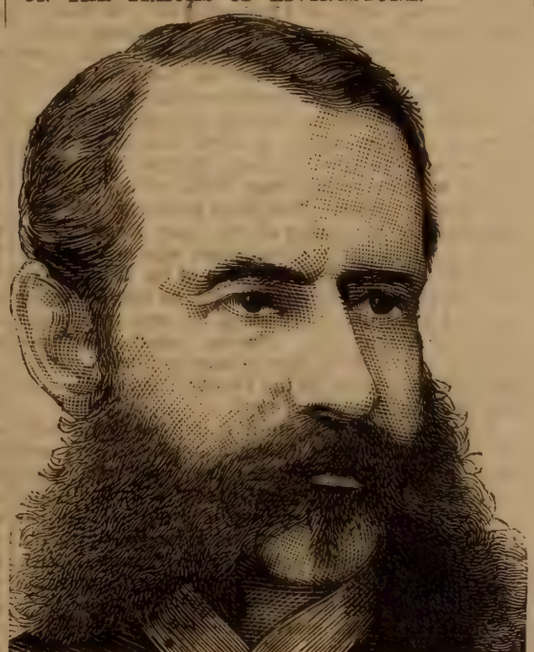
THE LATE SIR G. P. COLLEY.



SIR F. S. ROBERTS, C.B., V.C.

GEN. SIR E. WOOD, K.C.B., V.C.

SKETCH-MAP OF SOUTH AFRICA, THE SEAT OF THE RECENT WAR.

GENERAL SIR G. P. COLLEY.

Killed in the Transvaal on Sunday, Feb. 27.

THE late Sir G. P. Colley, the British general who was slain by the Transvaal Boers at the battle of Majuba Mountain, on Sunday, February 27th, was the youngest son of the late Hon. G. F. Colley, of Fermoy, county Dublin. He was born on November 1st, 1835, and was therefore at the time of his death rather more than forty-five years of age.

He entered the army as an ensign in the 2d Regiment, on May 28th, 1852. In August, 1854, he received his commission as a lieutenant, and in June, 1860, attained the rank of captain. Between the two last-mentioned periods he had seen considerable service. Thus he was employed on special service on the Cape frontier in 1858-9 and 1861, in the occupation of Kreli's territory and the defeat and death of Tola, being twice thanked by the government, and receiving the brevet rank of major in March, 1863. He subsequently distinguished himself in other campaigns, and attained the rank of colonel in 1874.

When, in 1875, Sir Garnet Wolseley was despatched to Natal to administer the government of that colony, and to advise upon several important points connected with the management of native affairs and the best form of defensive organization, he selected Sir G. P. Colley as his private secretary, which office he held till Sir Garnet's return in the month of September, being shortly after his return to England appointed assistant adjutant and quartermaster-general at Aldershot. He did not remain long in this post, however—indeed, only two months, from January 1st to February 29th—when he was selected to go out to India as military secretary to Lord Lytton, the Viceroy of India, April 13th, 1876. In this important position he remained exactly two years, when he was transferred to the office of private secretary. This post he nominally filled until February 19th, 1880, though from July 9th in the preceding year, until October 7th following, he was chief of the staff to Sir Garnet Wolseley in South Africa, with the local rank of brigadier general, with which rank he took part in the concluding operations of the Zulu war.

On April 24th, 1880, Sir George Colley was appointed Governor and Commander-in-chief in Natal, and High Commissioner for South-East Africa, with the local rank of major-general, with his headquarters at Pietermaritzburg; but almost immediately after the breaking out of disturbances in the Transvaal at the close of the year, he started from Newcastle (without awaiting the reinforcements he expected from England) to relieve Colonel Bellairs at Potchefstroom and the other beleaguered garrison at Pretoria. His small column was, however, repulsed while attempting to force the Drakensberg range at Laing's Nek, and again, a few days later, near Mount Prospect, near the river Ingogo. At the battle of Majuba Mountain on February 27th he was shot through the head by one of the Boers, who fired at him at a distance of only four paces. The battle was described in our issues of March 3d and 10th.

SIR FREDERICK ROBERTS, C.B., V.C.,

MAJOR-GENERAL FREDERICK SLEIGH ROBERTS, who was sent to the Cape to replace the late Sir G. P. Colley, was the commander of the Koorum Valley column of the British army which entered the city of Cabul, during the Afghan campaign, in the month of October, 1879.

He has seen thirty years of arduous service, having entered the army as second lieutenant on December 12th, 1851, and was attached to the Bengal Artillery (now the Royal Artillery). Six years later, in 1859, when the sanguinary Indian mutiny broke out, his signal qualities as an intrepid soldier secured him promotion to the rank of First Lieutenant.

He was present at the siege and capture of Delhi. At the commencement of the siege, which lasted three months, he was wounded, and at the subsequent capture of the city had a horse shot under him. He also lost his horse in the engagement at Bolundshur and Kunoj, which quickly followed the fall of Delhi. At Bundhera he narrowly escaped capture by the mutineers while reconnoitring. He was present and took part in the storming of Meangunge and in the series of engagements which ended with the capture of Lucknow, for which he was thanked by the Governor-General of India, and received the Victoria Cross medal and three clasps, together with the brevet rank of major, on November 13th, 1860, when the Sepoy mutiny in India had been completely quelled.

He earned his Victoria Cross at the siege of Delhi. This is the high distinction which Queen Victoria confers only for deeds of peculiar and striking bravery, and in the case of General Roberts is a memento of his having at great personal danger sabred a Sepoy standard-bearer, and thereby caused great confusion in the ranks of the mutineers.

When the Abyssinian war broke out in 1868, he superintended the re-embarkation of the whole of the returning army, and was selected by Sir Robert, afterward Lord Napier, to carry his final despatches. For this service, which was discharged with characteristic skill, he received the brevet rank of lieutenant-colonel and another medal.

Upon the breaking out of the war with the Ameer of Afghanistan in 1878, Colonel Roberts was selected to command one of three columns of troops which marched from India to Afghanistan by different routes. The route his troops followed was that by the valley of the river Koorum, the same as that by which two years ago he returned to Cabul after the assassination of the British resident Sir Louis Cavagnari; in fact, he had not really reached Indian territory when he was ordered to return to Afghanistan. He was raised to the rank of major-general for the decisive and brilliant victory which he won in the Peiwar Pass against the hill tribes in December, 1878.

He completed his return march to Cabul with about 5000 soldiers, through a hostile country and surrounding great dangers, on October 10th, 1879, only forty days after the massacre of Sir Louis Cavagnari. Upon entering the city the British standard was hoisted for the third time over the Bala Hissar, or royal palace, in which is the British Residency, where Sir Louis Cavagnari and some thirty others were massacred.

One of the most marvellous exploits in military annals was achieved by him in August, 1880, when, with nine thousand soldiers, he marched three hundred and thirteen miles in twenty-three days, from Cabul, to relieve General Primrose, who was beleaguered in Candahar, defeated Ayoob Khan and captured twenty-seven cannon.

When the news of the disaster at Majuba Mountain was received in England the Government turned to General Roberts as the officer on whom they could rely to retrieve their defeats of the army, and he was despatched to South Africa. Happily there will be no occasion for his services there in a warlike capacity, peace having been proclaimed while he was on his voyage out.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR EVELYN WOOD, K.C.B., V.C.

THIS distinguished officer has had a most eventful life, which has been spent in the interest of his country in both of the services—the navy and the army. He is a son of the late Rev. Sir J. Page Wood, Bart., and nephew to Lord Hatherley, who was Lord High Chancellor of England; he was born in 1838, and is now forty-three years of age. He entered the Royal Navy in April, 1852, and very soon displayed such marked merit that he was selected as aide-de-camp to the famous Captain Peel, who organized the Naval Brigade, and which he led with much bravery until he fell in India.

Under this intrepid commander Lieutenant Wood (naval), as he then was, served from October, 1854, to June, 1855, before Sebastopol, during the Crimean War. While carrying up the scaling-ladders, by means of which the troops were to storm the Redan fort, he was severely wounded.

At the close of the war he was, upon his return to England, loaded with honors. He received the Crimean medal and two clasps, was created a Knight of the French Legion of Honor, and received from Turkey the Order of the Medjidie of the fifth class, and the Turkish military medal.

About three months after his return he changed his profession, relinquishing the life of a sailor for that of a soldier. He found no difficulty, after his brave services, in obtaining a commission in a cavalry regiment as cornet.

His next steps, those of lieutenant in 1856 and captain in 1861, were purchased, but in 1858 he evinced capabilities which obtained for him the temporary rank of Brigade-Major in Somerset's Brigade, and throughout the Indian Mutiny he served most efficiently, being present at the battles of Rajghur and Sindwaho. For his bravery in these engagements he was again mentioned in the despatches of General Michel, and again at Kharee and Barode, and was gazetted as entitled to receive the Victoria Cross.

He was much beloved by his men for his great kindness and consideration of them, while as a soldier he was, and is, a strict disciplinarian.

When serving in the Ashantee war a large number of deserters came over to the British camp and offered their services to the general. These Colonel Wood organized, and made of them a very efficient corps, which bore the name of "Wood's Regiment."

He commanded the attacking force at Essaman, for which he received the expression of Her Majesty's approbation. Further on in the Ashantee campaign he commanded the troops which held the head of the road followed by the enemy from Mansu to the river Prah. With this mere handful at his command he successfully resisted every attempt to dislodge him until the European troops arrived to relieve his garrison.

Colonel Wood went out to the Cape before the Zulu War began in 1878, when several tribes on the border of the Transvaal were giving the Colonial Government some trouble. On the 30th of March, 1879, 20,000 Zulus attacked Colonel Wood's force. After a desperate engagement, which is considered to have been one of the most sanguinary engagements that have ever been fought in the colony, the Zulus were repulsed, but with heavy loss on the British side. In the course of the engagement Sir Evelyn Wood was in imminent peril, and displayed great intrepidity.

In the war with the Boers he has been actively engaged, and when Sir G. P. Colley was killed he, being the next officer in rank, assumed the chief command pending the arrival of General Roberts.

OUR MAP OF SOUTH AFRICA,

And History of the Colony.

PARAGRAPHS have appeared from week to week in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD describing the progress of a war, now happily at an end, between the British and the Boers in the Transvaal. The causes which led to the war have been but imperfectly understood in America, and even the country in which it has been waged is a region about which very little is generally known. The map which appears this week on our first page may furnish information which will be new to some of our readers, and the following brief sketch of the origin of the quarrel may correct some misapprehension which has found its way into the public journals, both religious and secular.

First, in

which represents the southern extremity of the great continent of Africa. The region to the south of the Orange River from the west coast to the dotted line running from the south east coast in a northerly direction between the words "Native District" and "Natal" on the map, is Cape Colony. This colony passed under British rule under the treaty of 1815, when it was ceded to England by the Government of Holland. The district of Natal, to the east of Cape Colony, was acquired by Great Britain in 1843, and was constituted a separate colony in 1856, being at that time peopled to a considerable extent by Dutch emigrants from Cape Colony. The Orange Free State, to the north of Cape Colony and on the west of Natal, is a republic, also largely populated by Dutch settlers.

In January, 1878, immediately after it was known that this river was the mightiest and most navigable of all the waterways into Central Africa, the Livingstone Inland Mission was started, and shortly afterward the Baptist Mission to San Salvador, the old capital of Congo, and the former sphere of a Jesuit mission, which long ago collapsed. The first object of both these missions is to get past the thirty-two cataracts and rapids which bar the navigation of the river for 180 miles, from the Falls of Yellala to Stanley Pool, where it becomes navigable again, and flows for nearly 1000 miles without interruption through the populous, fertile, and healthy table-lands of Central Africa, receiving continually on either side great tributary rivers, which open up vast tracts of country both north and south of the main stream.

The Baptist Missionary Society proposes to work on the southern shores and tributaries of the Congo, and the Livingstone Inland Mission in the countries on its northern banks and on those of its northern tributaries. A glance at any modern map of Africa will show that a very large portion of the continent, from the south of the Soudan to the watershed of the Zambesi, is included in the area drained by the Congo or Livingstone River and its tributaries.

So difficult, however, has proved the task of penetrating through the belt of mountainous country lying between this immense and needy mission-field and the ocean that it has never yet been accomplished during the four centuries that have elapsed since the discovery of the mouth of the Congo. Neither merchants, explorers, slave-traders, nor missionaries have ever succeeded in breaking through this mountain barrier, or in reaching the great Central African plateau behind the rapids of the Congo. Stanley came down through its rocky gorges, it is true; but not even he has gone up, though he is now endeavoring to open the country on behalf of the International Association. In 1816 Captain Tuckey was sent out, at the head of a most carefully-selected and amply-provided government expedition; but he failed to get beyond the second or third cataract of the thirty-two, and he and most of the expedition perished in the attempt.

It is little wonder, therefore, that our brethren of the Livingstone Inland Mission have found it no easy matter, with very slender resources of both men and means, to make headway. Two of their number, Messrs. Telford and Peterson, have already laid down their lives for Christ's sake in Congoland in their efforts to get in. The rest have been preserved, some for nearly three years now; and though the progress made has been slow, and the expense involved considerable, yet we feel that, seeing the importance of the end in view, and the difficulties that had to be encountered, they have had no small success, and that there is much cause for devout gratitude in the fact that they are now at Manyanga, and thus more than half way through their task of reaching the upper river. They have got through 220 of the 300 miles between the ocean and Stanley Pool.

The main obstacles to progress are the fever-breeding climate, which renders life in those regions one constant struggle with disease and death, the superstitions of the natives, and, worst of all, the total absence of any money or portable currency. Heavy, bulky barter goods must be carried in order to purchase the necessaries of life; there are no roads and no beasts of burden; porters are the only resource, and they are difficult to get, expensive to hire, and very troublesome to manage. In spite of all these difficulties, however, our brethren have now built four stations, at considerable distances from each other, making a chain up the country; have learned the language, and commenced mission work. Manyanga, where their last station is situated, is a large market-town on the north bank of the Congo, and about five miles from the river, among the Babwende people—a place where the natives of a dozen different districts meet to exchange their wares, and consequently an admirable locality for a station.

We have now eight missionaries in Congoland (all former students in our institute). Three of them are married men and have their wives with them. Mr. Adam McCall is leader of the pioneer party and director of the mission in Africa; Mr. and Mrs. Craven, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, and Mr. and Mrs. Richards, together with Messrs. Harvey, Clarke, Lanceley, and McKergow, are distributed at the various stations or advancing up the country with Mr. McCall. It is expected that the next station (perhaps now in process of erection) will be at Msumbula, another market-place, fifty miles beyond Manyanga, in the midst of a thickly-populated district, and on the fine breezy hills 1500 feet above the river, and 2500 feet above the sea. Then the next will be Stanley Pool.

We commend this mission very strongly to the sympathy of God's people. It is undenominational and in real earnest; upheld by no great society, but depending wholly on God. The dear brethren and sisters connected with it are not only sacrificing all comfort and enjoyment, but risking health and even life itself. They are bravely enduring great hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. They receive no salaries, but go out prepared to support themselves as soon as possible and as far as possible.

THE FOUNTAIN OPENED.*

By Mrs. Julia M. Olin.

I WILL tell you a story about my great grandfather—a good old minister. Like many of the good men of that day, he walked with God, like some of the old patriarchs. Every act and event of his life was under the direction of that gracious Providence which ordereth all the steps of the good man. When calamities came, he considered them as the chastisements of his heavenly Father, and humbled himself under the mighty hand of God.

One memorable summer there was a great drought in the country. Day after day the heavens seemed as brass over their heads. Morning and evening the sun rose and set like a red ball; his rays being hidden by the haze that obscured the landscape—the meadows lost their verdure, and looked brown and sere, the leaves of the trees began to fade and fall before their time, the tufts of fern in the woods curled up tightly their graceful leaves, the earth with its heated surface was gasping for rain—and one imploring cry seemed to go up from all things inanimate and animate.

There were no brooks or fountains of water; the wells failed one after another, till at length there was water but in one well, to which all the country side resorted for water for their cattle. At length the waters of this well were becoming very low; and, when that failed, what was to become of the people and their cattle? It was like a time spoken of by the prophet Jeremiah: "Their nobles have sent their little ones to the waters; they came to the pits and found no water; they returned with their vessels empty; they were ashamed, and confounded, and covered their heads."

But the good minister remembered the blessed promise in the prophecy of Isaiah: "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them; I the God of Israel will not forsake them. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water" (chap. 41: 17, 18). And he called together all his friends and neighbors who sought water, and there was none; and invited them to spend the afternoon at his house, in humbling themselves before God, and praying to Him for help in this time of need.

Broken and contrite hearts were there in the place of prayer, and earnest petitions were offered to that merciful Being who hath said, "Ask, and ye shall have" and, at the close of these sacred services, there was an humble confidence in many a trusting spirit that God had heard, and would not forsake them.

The neighbors retired to their homes; and my great grandfather, old Mr. Birdley, taking his hat and his stick, walked out silent and thoughtful. Several hours passed, and the shades of evening began to gather, but still he had not returned. His daughter, watchful and apprehensive, prepared to follow him, to learn the cause of his prolonged absence. She had walked but a few steps from the house, however, when she saw his venerable form approaching. The sadness had passed away from his countenance, now lighted up with grateful joy. "My daughter, I have found water!" he exclaimed, as he drew near; and he related how God had heard the prayers of his servants, and directed his steps to a fountain of water.

He was wandering over the farm, still occupied by the humbling and holy thought which had found public expression that afternoon, when on a hillside he perceived a dampness on the ground. Calling a laborer who was at work at a short distance, he directed him to remove the earth with his spade. He did so; and he had not dug more than one or two feet in depth, when a copious stream leaped out from a hidden fountain into the face of the astonished laborer. The fountain was unsealed; and the clear, beautiful water flowed on in an abundant stream.

The old man gazed upon it with feelings of gratitude, deep as those which thrilled the hearts of the children of Israel, when the rock was struck and the waters gushed out; and he recognized the hand of God as distinctly in this signal answer to prayer. And there the stream flows on to this present time, keeping up with its babbling voice a remembrance of the day when its waters came to save those who were ready to perish.

Mr. Birdley lived till he was a hundred and two years old. On his hundredth birthday, the inhabitants of the neighboring town invited him to deliver an address in the chapel; and, with the frosts of a hundred winters silvering his hair, the venerable old man mounted his horse, rode four miles to the chapel, delivered his address, and returned home not wearied with his day's labor.

The Duke of Wellington's Thumb-nail Mark on a map in the possession of the Lennox family is sometimes shown to visitors. On the eve of the famous battles of which Waterloo was the crowning victory, the Duchess of Richmond gave a ball in Brussels to which the distinguished officers of the allied armies were invited. The festivities were broken up by the news that Napoleon was in the vicinity. At an earlier hour of the evening the Duke of Richmond was asked by Wellington for a map, and took him into an outer room to show him one. There the great captain, after studying it some moments, made a sudden mark with his thumb-nail, saying, "I shall fight him there!" The map so marked has been treasured as a relic by the Lennox family, and is the subject of much interest. This circumstance may remind us of a point about the Ten Commandments which is often overlooked. Those commandments are not only a part of the inspired Word of God, but were written with the finger of God upon two tables of stone.

No Man's Land.—Some Years Ago, a Traveller stood on the rock of Gibraltar, and looking toward the Spanish mainland, saw two lines of white tents with a considerable space between them. Upon asking the meaning, he was told they were the British and Spanish lines respectively, and the space between was "no man's land," or neutral ground belonging to neither kingdom; and any one standing upon it was neither in English nor Spanish territory. Some think that a similar kind of neutral zone, or "no man's land," exists between the kingdom of sin and the kingdom of grace. They are not in the kingdom of God, but they associate much with Christians and attend the services of the Church, and so do not consider themselves as Satan's subjects. Such people are deceived. There is not a hairsbreadth of neutral ground. The boundary line of the Kingdom of God is "the blood of Christ." Outside the line all are under "the power of darkness;" inside are those whom God "hath translated into the kingdom of His dear Son."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Political Interest During the Past Week has centred in the subject of the Presidential appointments. There have been many prophecies uttered as to the course President Garfield would adopt in the distribution of official patronage, but they have all been falsified by the facts. Those who based their opinions on the reports of the interview known as "the treaty of Mentor," and predicted that the Conkling wing of the Republican party would control the appointments, were disappointment by the list sent to the Senate on March 23d. Among them was the name of Senator William H. Robertson to be Collector of the Port of New York, and Collector Merritt to be Consul-General in London. The significance of these nominations was fully appreciated in political circles. Neither Senator Conkling, Vice-President Arthur, nor Postmaster-General James could be expected to approve the principle on which they were made.

Judge Robertson, by his revolt from the unit rule prior to the Chicago Convention, incurred the displeasure of the section known as the stalwarts, and his nomination is therefore regarded as an act of defiance on the part of the President. An important section of the party, however, heartily approve the nomination, and the State Senate has passed a resolution thanking the President, and asking the Senate to confirm the nomination. There is an apparent effort on the part of the President to conciliate every section, but in alternately favoring one and another he has caused jealousy in all, which may result in factious opposition. President Garfield has a difficult and delicate duty to perform in exercising his nominating power, but though he may offend the different machines he will earn and receive the approval of the people if he makes the sole motive of selection the efficiency of the public service.

The National Subscription for the Benefit of General Grant, which was proposed and managed by Mr. George Jones of the New York Times, is now reported by that journal to amount to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. This sum has all been received save $34,000 due from subscribers who are at present out of the country.

The Question of an Extra Session of Congress has been definitely settled by the President's announcement that it will not be called. The arguments for and against the extra session have been anxiously debated by the Cabinet, but the preponderance of opinion was against it. The chief reason for calling Congress together was to pass a refunding bill in the place of the one vetoed by Mr. Hayes, and so avoid the loss resulting from the payment of the high rate of interest. But the Secretary of the Treasury has, it appears, means at his disposal which will render the loss from that cause comparatively small. He can take up a large portion of the maturing high-interest bonds with unsold four per cent bonds, surplus revenue and the temporary three per cent certificates which he has the right to issue, and so reduce the amount of bonds bearing the high rate. Other reasons affecting the general tranquillity and business interests of the country are also believed to have weighed with the Cabinet in coming to a decision. Unless an unforeseen emergency arises, Congress will therefore not meet until December.

Ex-Secretary Schurz Outlined the Policy he believes best adapted to solve the Indian Question, in his speech at the Boston dinner on March 22d. He has had four years' experience in the Department of the Interior, and during that period he had opportunities for studying the question and ascertaining the actual facts affecting Indian life and character. The policy Mr. Schurz recommends is that of "promoting the transformation of the Indians from shiftless paupers into thrifty and orderly workers, as agriculturists, herdsmen, traders and mechanics—of extending their educational facilities to teach them how to learn and how to live, of stimulating their desire to become individual owners of lands and other property like white men: a policy, in a word, of preparing them for their ultimate absorption into the great body of American citizenship, with all its rights and duties," a wise and vigorous pursuit of these ends Mr. Schurz believes "will finally solve that Indian problem which in the past has so often proved a trouble, and sometimes a disgrace, to the American people, not as a matter of justice, but as a matter of fact."

The House of Assembly of Rhode Island sets a much-needed example to the Legislatures of larger States. Some friends of the Parnell agitation in Ireland introduced a resolution expressing sympathy with the movement. One of the members in opposing the resolution said it concerned a people over 3000 miles away, over which we have no control, and about whose laws we know very little; that the effect of its passage might be to encourage assassination, and that he could not vote conscientiously for the resolutions. He also stated that land was cheaper to-day in Ireland than it was in almost any country in Europe, but was poorly farmed. The House very sensibly adopted that view, and the State of Rhode Island is therefore not pledged to a resolution endorsing Boycotting and other lawless proceedings.

Another Suit Under the Civil Damage Act has ended in a verdict adverse to the liquor seller. A saloon-keeper appeared at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Court house last week as defendant in a suit brought by the wife of a drunkard. The woman saw her husband go to the saloon on a Sunday morning last fall, and she followed him and begged of the proprietor not to sell him any more rum. He refused her entreaties and her husband got drunk and went back to his home, where, maddened by liquor, he beat and kicked the poor woman in a most shameful manner, planting the heavy heels of his coarse boots in her side repeatedly. She suffered serious injuries and she sued the saloon keeper for damages, bringing her husband as a witness. The judge charged the jury that the fact of the illegal selling being admitted, and also that it occurred on Sunday, the statute gave the plaintiff a legal right of action. After a short absence the jury returned with a verdict for plaintiff of $525. A few more verdicts of this character will, it may be hoped, render the venders of the poison more attentive to the entreaties of distressed wives.

Over One Hundred Thousand Dollars Have been received from newsboys in New York for board during the time the Newsboys' Lodging House has been in operation. In the annual report of the Children's Aid Society, recently issued, the Manager of the Newsboys' Lodging House gives some interesting facts. He says that since its organization in 1854 he has had under his care 170,773 different boys, some of whom are now over forty years of age. "During those years," he says, "we have furnished 1,210,037 lodgings and 1,186,178 meals; 13,850 wandering and strange boys have been returned to friends and relatives. The expense of this work has been $283,571.25, of which amount the boys have contributed $100,300.80, and thus have paid 35 per cent of the expenses. During the entire period 18,405 have saved $50,-114.45 in our savings bank.

"It is cause of regret that our influence over the boys is greatly crippled by the fact that they remain only a short time with us. As soon as steady employment, or a quiet home in the country, is procured, they leave us, carrying with them kindly remembrances of our Lodging House. At times we are visited by well-dressed, respectable young men, who tell us that years ago they occupied our bunks. We endeavor to make the boys feel that the Lodging House belongs to them, and that its success, in a measure, depends upon their efforts and support. Some of our boys are farmers, others are merchants, others follow various mechanical pursuits, others are filling positions of trust, and some have become ministers of the Gospel."

The Trial of Rev. I. M. Kalloch of San Francisco for the murder of Mr. DeYoung has ended in the acquittal of the accused. There was no doubt as to De Young having been shot by Kalloch, but the jury apparently considered that De Young's previous conduct had contributed to the crime. It is deplorable that society has sunk to so low a state of morality as to condone a crime like that of the DeYoung murder. It is still more deplorable that a man holding the position of a Christian minister should have committed the lawless deed and so have brought reproach on the name of Christ.

An Interesting Bicentennial Celebration was held at Bedford, Westchester County, N. Y., on Tuesday, March 22d. The Presbyterian Church of that village was founded March 22d, 1681, and there was a general desire that its two hundredth birthday should be appropriately observed. At the anniversary meetings held in the church it was stated that the present edifice was presented to the society by Mr. Francis A. Palmer, President of the Broadway Bank, thus redeeming a promise he made when he left Bedford a poor boy, that he would build them a church when he became a rich man. The church is a tasteful Gothic structure of wood, finished in black walnut, with rich stained glass windows, and cost $50,000. The interior was beautifully decorated for the occasion with evergreens and flowers. On one side of the pulpit was the inscription: "In the place of the fathers are the children. 1681–1881."

The Sisters of the Stranger are Receiving Encouragement in their new work inaugurated by Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., on January last. The last published list of contributions amounts to $243, and includes a donation of $100 from Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt. The charity was instituted for taking care of men who have been discharged from the hospitals, but are not quite strong enough to seek or enter upon employment. The "Rest" gives them quiet, a good bed, good food, and the requisite medicine, until they can go forth. There are no salaries. Up to March 1st thirteen applicants were received. To these fifteen weeks' board and lodging were given, medicines, extra comforts, and eighteen articles of clothing were furnished, with an outlay of only $83.28.

A Well-to-do Deacon in Connecticut was one morning accosted by his pastor, who said, "Poor Widow Green's wood is out. Can you not take her a cord?" "Well," answered the deacon, "I have the wood and I have the team; but who is to pay me for it?" The pastor, somewhat vexed, replied, "I will pay you for it, on the condition that you read the first three verses of the 41st Psalm before you go to bed to-night." The deacon consented, delivered the wood, and at night opened the Word of God and read the passage: "Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble. The Lord will preserve him and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth; and thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies. The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing: thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness." A few days afterward the pastor met him again: "How much do I owe you, deacon, for that cord of wood?" "Oh!" said the now enlightened man, "do not speak of payment: I did not know those promises were in the Bible: I would not take money for supplying the old widow's wants."

An Attempt to Promote the Comfort and religious and moral welfare of the people has been made at Kansas City, and has turned out a commercial success. The Intelligencer says: "Rev. Henry Hopkins, of Kansas City, has organized a mission among the laboring men in the 'Bottom'—a part of the city where several thousand people live, who work in the great packing-houses. Investing about $5000 in a good lot and building, he manages to furnish the people with a free reading-room, good board and lodgings at very low rates, and a chapel for Sunday-school and religious gatherings, all under one roof. This not only supports itself, but the income pays legal interest on the money invested and considerably over, each month, which will soon net enough to pay off the principal.

An Infidel Dancing-Saloon Keeper's Conversion was described by an officer of the Salvation Army last week. The members of the army in making a tour of the saloons, visited one the proprietor of which had been a Roman Catholic, but who had become an infidel by profession as well as by practice. His saloon was one of the lowest class, where men were enticed from theatres and the streets by dancing girls, drugged and robbed. They were anxious to have their visitors partake of refreshments, but they would not even accept the glass of water offered, having been forewarned. They were ordered away by the proprietor, who used profane language very freely, but they stayed, and sang "Just as I am, without one plea." The singing of this hymn produced such an impression on his mind that he was impelled to plead for salvation, and was ultimately converted. But before he could get pardoned for his sins, he had to send for a magistrate and marry the woman he was living with; and the next thing he did was to pour out the liquors and abandon the establishment.

Miss Ida Lewis, the Heroine of Lime Light Rock, whose bravery in rescuing shipwrecked people has won for her the name of the American Grace Darling, was presented on March 14th with a handsome silver medal, the gift of the Humane Society of Massachusetts. The presentation was made by Thomas Motley, vice-president of the society, who, with several members of the society, visited the lighthouse for the purpose. The medal is 2½ inches in diameter, ⅛ of an inch thick, and is of solid silver. On the rim are the words, "Reward of merit, courage, and perseverance." The face bears this inscription, "To Ida Lewis, the heroine of Lime Rock, for her many heroic and successful efforts in saving human lives." On the rim of the reverse are the words, "Humane Society of Massachusetts, 1791." In the centre is a raised emblem of the society; at the top is a representation of a small wooden hut, with the word "Refuge" on a scroll; underneath are two boats' crews, clasped hands, and a ship riding on the waves. It is very gratifying to observe brave deeds like those of Miss Ida Lewis so appropriately honored. A day is coming when self-denying men and women who have been instrumental under God in rescuing, from a fate worse than drowning, sin-enslaved men and women and leading them to the Refuge of Christ will be honored by Him who rewards His servants openly (Daniel 12 : 3)

A Peculiarly Melancholy Incident is Reported from Stone Ridge, N. Y. On Wednesday, March 16th, a little boy fell out of the schoolhouse window during recess. Not thinking the boy's injuries were of a serious nature, the teacher did not send him home. At the close of school, the boy started for home alone, taking a short cut across lots. Becoming weak and dizzy, as is now supposed, from the injuries received by the fall, he again fell while attempting to climb a fence, and was unable to proceed further. He took off his jacket, placed it under his head, and lay down. All that night the poor lad remained by the fence. His parents, thinking he had stopped over night with an uncle, as was his wont, felt no alarm; but next morning, finding he had not been seen by anybody, they started in search, and found him where he had lain down, still conscious. He was removed to his home, but, despite care and attention, he died that day. Possibly the boy's life might have been saved had his parents known of his accident a little earlier. The pathetic incident reminds us how many there are who fall morally and spiritually in the ways of life to whom a little timely help, a word of Christian encouragement spoken in faith might lead to recovery. God has given an explicit promise of reward for such work (James 5 : 19, 20).

A Striking Testimony to the Character of one of our Senators at Washington was once rendered by Senator Carpenter, who was president pro tem. of the Senate. Speaking of the Senator in question, he said, "You may put me in the chair blindfolded, and I can tell whether or no he is in his seat by the character of the legislation that is brought up. If it is known that he will be absent for a few days, every bill with a 'job' in it is brought to the front and pushed; whereas, if he is present, nothing is said about them."

A Town that is Dead is Described in an Atchison (Kan.) journal. It appears that some years ago a New England young man settled on the banks of the Lower Osage River, in Missouri. He set a large number of men at work getting out lumber in the forests that line the stream. He conceived the idea too of founding in the Missouri woods a New England village, and stores, mills, and many dwellings arose on a sloping hillside on the river, and the village was called, after a cliff on the opposite shore Castle Rock. The enterprising founder also built a little church. All went well until the outbreak of the war, when the people of the country were divided in sentiment. The New Englander joined a Missouri regiment and fell in one of the battles around Vicksburg. With his death a blight fell on his business and the village. No friendly hand took up his work. The sound of the ringing axe was heard no more along the Osage. The great business he had built up ceased. The mills were silent. Dusty and forlorn weeds encroached upon the highways, and the door of the deserted church swung idly to and fro. The Christian, as he looks at the desolate place, asks himself, "Would not this soon be the condition of the world if its Creator abandoned it?"

A Discovery in Connection with the Dreaded scourge, diphtheria, was accidentally made by a physician in the West. The facts, as related by the New York Times, are as follows: A young man whose arm had been recently amputated was attacked by diphtheria before the limb had healed. To the surprise of his physician, the matter incident to diphtheria appeared on the arm where it had been severed, in place of depositing itself as usual in the throat, and the case proved to be a very mild one. The doctor profited by this strong intimation from nature, and when next called to visit a diphtheritic patient, blistered his chest. There most of the deposits showed themselves, and the patient speedily recovered. It would appear from this discovery that the virus produced by the disease is attracted to the most tender part of the body, and may thus be drawn to a locality where it may be more readily treated than in its usual place, the throat.

The Plucked Flower.—A Gentleman's Gardener had a child in whom his affection seemed to be centred, and was overwhelmed with grief when it sickened and died. In one of his flower-beds was a favorite rose, the fairest flower he had ever seen on the tree, and he daily marked its growing beauty, intending when full-blown to send it to his master's mansion. One morning it was gone—some one had plucked it. Mortified at what he thought was the improper conduct of one of the servants, he endeavored to find out the culprit. He was, however, much surprised to find that his master, on walking through the garden, had been attracted by the beauty of the rose, and, plucking it, had carried it to one of the beautiful rooms in the Hall. The gardener's anger was changed into pleasure. He felt reconciled when he heard that his master had thought the flower worthy of such special notice. "Ah, Richard," said the gentleman, "you can gladly give up the rose, because I thought it worthy of a place in my house. And will you repine because your Heavenly Father has thought wise to remove your child from a world of sin, to be with Himself in heaven?

A FRIEND inquired of me yesterday, "Will you preach on Sunday morning to saints or to sinners?" I could not at the moment answer him; but I afterward thought within myself, If I preach concerning Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, I shall kill two birds with one stone, and give both saints and sinners a profitable theme for thought. There is but one message of the Gospel, and it has a voice to all. Saints know no sweeter music than the name of Jesus, and sinners know no richer comfort than His person and His work. We preach to all when we preach Him who is all in all. Christ comes as life to the dead, and He is equally life to the living. I trust there will at this time be a word in season, both to those who fear God and to those who fear Him not, while I speak of the Saviour from these three words, "Jesus stood still."

Our divine Lord has changed His position, but He is Himself the same as ever, and therefore every truth which we learn concerning Him in the past becomes all the more valuable since it is still true of Him. Our Lord's name is "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." What his character was on earth such it is still; His pursuits on earth are His pursuits still; his main object when He was here is His chief aim even in the glory. We have not to say, "This is what Jesus was," and then to mourn that He has changed; for He is without variableness. His transit from the tree to the throne has not affected His nature so as to make him other than He was when here below.

I. First, let us answer this question, in the Saviour's progress, "Jesus stood still"? This was not His frequent posture; for He was ever on the move: "He went about doing good." He might have done much among men if He had taken up His station and remained in one place, so that the crowds could have resorted to Him to listen to His voice, or to be healed by His power; but Jesus was not an immovable statue of benevolence, He was active and energetic, an itinerant preacher who never wearied in His circuit. One does not often see Jesus standing still. His was the love which does not wait to be sought after by men; for it has come to seek as well as to save that which was lost.

In the Gospel we read that our Lord was going up to Jerusalem, with His face steadfastly set to accomplish His great work. Yet, though His thoughts were thus urgently preoccupied, and His whole heart engrossed, we find Him pausing in His steady progress to the desired end; "Jesus stood still." There was, doubtless, somewhat special about this recorded pause. What was it which fastened Him to the spot? It was not hesitancy—his resolve was too firm; it was not fear—the thought of drawing back never passed the Redeemer's mind. Onward, onward, was His fixed resolve. He stood still from no unworthy motive; all His movements and His pauses have a nobility about them and a fulness of meaning which no personal motive can account for.

Our Lord was beginning at the moment that triumphal procession which continued till He reached the temple amid the hosannas of the multitude. It is true He was advancing to the cross; but ere he reached his death he was to be proclaimed as the King, meek and lowly, who came riding upon a colt the foal of an ass. His triumphal march has begun, and Jesus is in the midst of admiring listeners. Yet Jesus stands still; the whole procession halts; the twelve disciples and the company of the faithful are arrested, and the crowd tarries in the roadway of Jericho. For what great reason did it happen that Jesus stood still?

His eye is fixed in the direction whence had come a certain pleading cry. His ears are evidently open to hear the movement which follows His command to call the suppliant. The Saviour's thoughts are pausing too: he stands still mentally as well as physically, engrossed by one object to which he will attend before He takes another step. Ceasing from His discourse, however much His hearers regret His silence, He gives ear and eye and tongue to the petitioner whose voice reached Him above the trampling and hubbub of the crowd. "Jesus stood still": he was all there: ready, willing, able, too, to do for the poor man whatsoever he needed. He asked Him, "What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" as if He stood at his beck and call, and could not take a step onward until He had answered the prayer.

How marvellous was the power which dwelt in that poor man's cry! Is such power to be found among men at this hour? Ah, there is the point. The Saviour is the same to-day as ever, and I believe, my brethren, that you and I have power at this time to make Him stand still if we act as Bartimeus did. Many a poor sinner here this morning, if God shall help him to cry after the style of the blind man, can command the Saviour's full attention, can command His power, and get from Him the grace which He is so willing and able to bestow. As for you who know and love him, be ye well assured that no blind beggar can have such power with Him as you have who are His friends. Pleading saints can cause Him to stand still even now.

I have feared and trembled for my country of late lest the Lord Jesus should depart from it and take away the candlestick out of its place. More than two hundred years ago George Herbert said, when he looked upon the declining state of godliness in England:

"Religion stands a-tiptoe in our land,
Ready to pass to the American strand."

He saw the Puritans flying away to the New England colonies, and he trembled for the ark of God in his own land; but, thank God, the prayers of Herbert and the prayers of other saints have constrained the Lord Jesus to abide with us, though "He made as though he would have gone further." Brethren, the Lord had thought, as it were, to cross the Atlantic, and fix His dwelling among a people who should be gathered in a newly-discovered land.

THANK GOD, HE HAS BUILT A CHURCH IN AMERICA;

but he has not left us without witness. Because of the tears of His saints, "Jesus stood still." Still, we hold Him, and we will not let Him go; He abides among our churches, still opening blind eyes, saving souls, and making men whole. O ye that love Him, take care that by your entreaties you still detain Him.

Whatever our Lord Jesus is doing He is never so occupied as to disregard earnest prayer. He would, if needful, put everything aside to listen to importunate and earnest pleading. To this day Jesus standeth still to hear the cry of the destitute. If at this moment we could withdraw the curtains of heaven we should see our Saviour waiting to be gracious, ready to hear our prayers, hearkening to every sigh, putting every tear into His bottle, answering every petition which comes up before Him from a sincere heart. What though He ruleth empires, He stands still to hear the wailing of distress; what though He inhabiteth the praises of Israel, He is moved by the sorrows of sinners; what though He hasteneth the day of His coming, and is ready to begin His triumphal advent to the New Jerusalem, yet will He pause when the poor and needy present their case before Him.

II. We will now enter upon a practical inquiry:

WHO AND WHAT WAS THIS

which arrested the Saviour? What made Him stand still? Herod could not have done it, nor Pilate, nor chief priests, nor scribes, nor the foresight of the bloody sweat, nor a vision of the cross. These would but have quickened His steps to enter upon the conflict and achieve redemption. What made Him stand still?

First, as I have already said, it was a blind beggar. I am afraid there are very few here this morning who are literally beggars; for nowadays we wear good clothes, and are so very respectable, that abjectly poor people do not like to come and sit with us. The more's the pity. Yet I know that many poor persons are here now, and I thank God that it is so. Those who are in the depths of poverty will, I hope, believe that they are welcome to the house of the Lord, who is no respecter of persons.

Bartimeus was a man of the very lowest order; he did not earn his own bread; he could not; he sat publicly by the wayside, and held out his hand for alms. Men give small honor to and are apt to pass him by without regard; but He to whom we owe all hope of heaven stood still at the cry of such as he. After this no one among you will dare to say, "I cannot be saved because I am so obscure, so poor, so homeless, so helpless." Tell me what you are at your very worst, and still I have good tidings concerning my Lord's condescending favor to the like of you.

Did you lodge in the casual ward last night? Yet are you welcome to Christ. Have you come from the poorhouse? Yet are you invited to the palace of grace. Do you labor very hard for very little, and can you barely pay your way? The Lord Jesus Christ wants no fee or reward from you; come empty-handed to His treasury. "I was depressed," says one; "I should have thought about better things, but really the grind of poverty was so dreadful that I could not rise from the dust." This is not true, for you are not poorer than the blind beggar of Jericho, and the sharp tooth of penury has not bitten you more severely than many of the Lord's suffering saints. Misery had eaten into the heart of this poor blind man, and yet his cry made the Saviour stand still. Now then, you that are the lowest, poorest, most afflicted, most despised in this house, I pray that you may be helped to appeal to Jesus for mercy, and He will stand still to listen to you, even to you.

But what was the art by which Bartimeus stayed the Lord? That which stopped the Saviour was a blind beggar's cry. The man did not sing a touching hymn to a melting tune, he only cried. Sometimes persons have such melodious voices that if they sing in the street you linger to hear them, and are in no hurry to go on with your errand; but this man did not sing; he had not even learned to intone his prayers as certain do in these odd times. I wonder whether the Lord ever listens to prayers when men turn them into sing-song and deliver them in an unnatural voice—intoning they call it. Why do men think it an improvement to say their prayers the wrong way upward?

This man cried. It was a cry, a ringing cry, which increased in strength each time it was uttered. Thus it uprose into the ear, "Son of David, have mercy on me! Son of David, have mercy on me!" The voice came from a heart burdened with misery, breaking with desire, weary of long years of darkness, pining for the light, and hopeful of obtaining it. "Son of David, have mercy on me," again the cry rose above all the hubbub of the throng.

The prayer was a cry for mercy: "Son of David, have mercy." If you ask our Lord for anything on the ground of merit, you will find Him deaf as a stone; if you think yourself a very good body, deserving favor at His hands, He will pass on and never regard you, for He has not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Change that plea for a better, for when your prayer is for mercy you will touch the Saviour's heart directly, and mercy shall be yours.

When the messenger of mercy was travelling through the world he asked himself at what inn he should alight and spend the night. Lions and Eagles were not to his mind, and he passed by houses wearing such warlike names; so, too, he passed by places known by the sign of "The Waving Plume" and "The Conquering Hero," for he knew that there was no room for him in these inns. He hastened by many a hostelry and tarried not, till at last he came to a little inn which bore the sign of "The Broken Heart." "Here," said mercy's messenger, "I would fain tarry, for I know by experience that I shall be welcome here." "A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."

Now, beloved friends, if you plead for mercy because deeply conscious that nothing but the grace of God can save you, even though you cannot put pretty words together or offer a long prayer, you shall prevail with God. You need not be an orator in order to be mighty in pleading with the Lord. Only appeal on the ground of free grace and dying love, and Jesus will stand still and listen to you.

There was another point about this cry which must not be forgotten: the name of Jesus was used as a plea. Is there anything in heaven, or out of heaven, more powerful than the name of Jesus? "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, He will give it you"; "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do." Father and Son stand pledged to recognize and accept every draft upon the exchequer of heaven which is indorsed with the name of Jesus, a name that makes angels rejoice and devils tremble: there is none like it anywhere.

The blind beggar of Jericho had learned to use the name of Jesus; and he called him "Son of David"—Prince, Messiah, the sent One of God, the Saviour of the world. Herein is wisdom. O dear hearer, if you know the name of Jesus, plead it; if you know what He is, what He came to do, what He has done, what He is doing; if you know anything about His character, His nature, His power, or His promise, plead it before Him in prayer. In humble faith say to Him, "Son of David, if Thou be indeed all this, be all this to me, I beseech thee; if Thou art a Saviour, save me; if Thou blottest out sin, blot out mine; if Thou dost open the understanding, open thou mine, for Thy great mercy sake." When we can thus reason together with the Lord we shall have good speed in His presence, and again it shall be said, "Jesus stood still."

I suppose the main thing which brought our gracious Master to a stand was the fact that He had now an opportunity for doing good. Jesus has come to seek His lost sheep, and when His eyes light upon one all torn and lame He stops to deal tenderly with it. Our Lord was and wherever he found that he was wanted there he stayed. The object of his mission is still the same:

"He comes, from thickest films of vice,
To clear the mental ray;
And on the eyeballs of the blind
To pour celestial day.

"He comes, the broken heart to bind,
The bleeding soul to cure;
And, with the treasures of His grace,
To enrich the humble poor."

Certain people in His day boasted that they could see; our Lord did not tarry to argue with them; they did not want Him, and He therefore passed them by; but here is a blind man, and was it not said of the Messiah that He should open the eyes of the blind? Here is the opportunity for him, and before that opportunity He stands still until His illuminating work shall be done.

Believe me, the Lord of mercy looks not at merit, but at misery. The necessity of the case is its claim upon His tender heart. O sons of men, the Infinite Saviour cares not for your fulness; His eye of pity rests upon your emptiness. He turns indignantly from fancied claims of proud, self-righteous men, but He hastens to relieve those who confess their faults, and seek His face. This is the work and office of Jesus, and He loves to exercise His high calling; come ye to Him, and put your case into His hand. Be this your prayer:

"Since still thou goest about to do
Thy needy creatures good;
On me, that I thy praise may show,
Be all thy wonders show'd.

"If thou, my God, art passing by,
Oh let me find thee near!
Jesus, in mercy hear my cry,
Thou, Son of David, hear!

"Behold me waiting, in the way,
For thee, the heavenly light;
Command me to be brought, and say,
'Sinner, receive thy sight.'"

Thus I have tried to show what was the power which riveted the Saviour to the spot so that the Gospel saith, "Jesus stood still."

Under our third head we shall now inquire:

III. What was there special about this blind man and his prayer? An answer lies on the surface: there was this special about it, first, that

THE MAN WAS FULL OF NEED.

He had two loads to carry. He was poor—that is bad enough; but he was also blind—that is worse. Here was a man with double need, without bread and without light; and therefore his cries had a double loudness in the ears of the Sinner's Friend. I cannot so look around these galleries and over this area as to spy out those in direst need, or I would look their way and say, but I can make a few inquiries, and may the Lord find out His own by them.

"Come, ye sinners, poor and wretched;"

Is there any one here who has a double need, who is doubly guilty, doubly helpless—a man who feels that, if Jesus does not save him, he will be doubly damned? Do I speak to one whose need is doubly pressing, so that his heart breaks for immediate relief? Ah, thou doubly lost one, Jesus will stand still for thee. You who are blind and poverty-stricken, too, shall have speedy audience. You that have nothing, and can see no hope of ever having anything, you are the favored ones whose pleading voices Jesus never disregards. Cry mightily to him at once. He waits at this moment.

"Why," says one, "you are preaching up our poverty, our beggary, our bankruptcy." Exactly so.

"'Tis perfect poverty alone
That sets the soul at large;
While we can call one mite our own
We get no full discharge.

"But let our debts be what they may,
However great or small,
As soon as we have nought to pay
Our Lord forgives us all."

But there was another speciality about this man besides his double need, and that was his strong desire. When he sought for sight he meant it, and there was no question about his sincerity and eagerness. His was no prayer which froze on the lips. His desire was, moreover, a very fitting and appropriate one. He sighed not for a luxury, but for a necessity.

Have you, dear hearer, a longing for salvation? What else should a sinner long for? Do you desire forgiveness of sin? It is of all things most fitting that a guilty one should desire pardon. Do you wish for an opened spiritual eye? Do you pray to be made whole? Do you pine to become holy? Oh, then, if your desire be real and fervent, its object is so suitable, so commendable, that you may be sure of its being granted; therefore, be of good cheer, and at this moment hope in the Lord.

Another thing that was special about the case was the man's earnest pleading, for his desire turned itself into prayer, and that prayer took up arguments and urged them earnestly. His prayer was so full of life that it could not be repressed. Many tried to silence his cry, but it could not be hushed. Important persons said to the man, "Be quiet." Apostles charged him to hold his tongue; but he heeded no one. I am sure that if an apostle were to say to some of you, "Do not pray," you would feel quite warranted in ceasing from praying; at least, it would serve as a good enough excuse for you. You would say, "I never mean to seek mercy any more, for Peter told me not to do so." Oh, but if in your heart there is a work of grace, fifty Peters could not stop your praying.

That, after all, which fastest bound the Saviour was the man's faith, for He said to him, "Thy faith hath made thee whole." What kind of faith was it? It was the best faith as to origin, for it was the faith of a blind man, and therefore was not adulterated by the confidence which comes of sight. Faith cometh not by seeing, or else it never could have come to this poor beggar; it cometh by hearing, and he could hear.

We have among us a certain sort of people who seem to imagine that faith comes by sight. Acting upon this, they work upon the eye in many ways. If you step inside the walls of their churches you see an enormous cross; the altar is sumptuously adorned, mystical letters and characters are here and there in abundance. Open your eyes and get a blessing, if there be one. See, here comes a man who on his back and all around him carries means of grace for the eye. He wears an embroidered cross, and all over he is rigged out and ragged out, so as to instruct and save all who are willing to study symbolical vestures. He that hath eyes to see, let him see. Watch what this successor of the apostles is doing; observe his genuflexions, his facings about, his noddings of the head—all these minister grace to the beholders. Faith of the High Anglican kind would seem to come by sight; but the faith of God's elect, the faith which saves the soul, "cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."

IV. Thus have we thought over the peculiar forces which made the Saviour stand; may we know how to use them. Does any one inquire, What has this to do with us? This is my last point: "What is there my hearer?" I think there may be much for you, for it contains much for me. I was a blind beggar once, as blind as the heathens' gods, of which we read, "eyes have they, but they see not;" and I was a beggar too, so penniless as not to possess a pennyworth of merits to bless myself with. I thought I had some good works once, quite a little cupboard full, but they bred worms and stank, and I had to sweep them all out and sweeten the place which they had defiled. I found myself worse than having nothing, for, like the Egyptians when the plague of frogs was removed, I had heaps of rubbish to get rid of. My former good works became, in my judgment, like forged bank notes or counterfeit money: I was afraid of being charged with the attempt to utter them.

Alas, my base good works, my proud good works, my deceitful good works pressed heavily on my conscience. By putting these into the place of Christ I had made them worse than my sins. I was in a worse state than a man who owns nothing, for I was over head and ears in debt, and I knew it. Then it was that I heard of one who would deliver me, and I cried to Him, and He delivered me speedily. Oh, how I wish that many others would feel that they too need the divine Saviour. Oh that men knew that they are poor, and blind, and that Jesus can give them eyes, and can supply all their wants!

It is a very curious thing—a very curious thing to me—that so much uncertainty hangs over this narrative. I am not so sure as to speak positively, but I believe that this story which Mark tells us is not the whole of what happened, for Matthew is certain that there were two blind men. Read what Matthew says about it. Surely it is the same incident, or one strangely similar. Matthew 20: 29–34. There were two blind beggars, though Mark only sees it needful to mention the principal one. If there were two, one of them is not known by name at all. We know the name of Bartimeus, and we know the name of his father, but we do not know the name of his companion. It appears from what Matthew says that this No. 2, whoever he was, prayed in the same words as Bartimeus. Bartimeus was a man of force and energy, and he made the prayer as to its words, "Son of David, have mercy on me"; the other man followed suit, and adopted the methods of Bartimeus. He was like the poor orator who had to speak after Burke, and very wisely said no more than, "I say ditto to Mr. Burke."

Mark does not take much notice of him, because he was the echo of Bartimeus, and probably a poor, feeble-minded, shiftless body, whose only chance seemed to be in following the lead of a stronger mind. Here, then, is the mercy of it, that though we do not know the man's name he had his eyes opened quite as surely as Bartimeus, and though he could not make a prayer of his own, and only followed Bartimeus, he had sight of his own, and a word of comfort for himself from Jesus.

As soon as I saw that there were two beggars whose eyes were opened, I thought, "After preaching I will look to meet with a convert whose name and family I shall know, and with his tale of grace I will solace myself; but oh that my Lord would bless some whom I shall never know, some anonymous ones, some nobodies, some weak and shrinking souls. Are there any such here? Will not many such read the sermon? O that at their cry Jesus may stand still to bless them.

I must mention a more curious thing still. I am not certain, I am not clear, I am talking about things which must remain undecided; but it is very possible that there were three blind beggars healed. It may be that first of all one man, Bartimeus, applied to the Lord Jesus and had his eyes opened when Jesus was nearly out of Jericho; and then two others had their eyes opened when Jesus and the crowds were actually going out of the town. Many writers think that Matthew and Mark record two different incidents, and it is very likely to be so. Probably the two blind men, having heard of the success of Bartimeus, were encouraged to try for themselves, and carefully imitated his model, crying in the same language for the same boon. Thus there was a repetition of the incident on a doubled scale. I like that notion. I wonder whether No. 3 is here, whose name we do not know, and probably never shall know, but yet he is known to Jesus and His cry is heard. He has come here with poor No. 2, who is equally weak and trembling with himself:

GOD BLESS THEM BOTH.

Those of us on whom the Saviour has wrought a good work would speak well of him for the encouragement of the fearing ones. I bear my witness to the eye-opening power of the Gospel. "One thing I know, whereas I was blind, now I see," and no one opened my eyes but Jesus. I went to Him just as I was; I trusted Him, and He saved me. May there not be two more blind men or women sitting somewhere about who will follow our example? Just do as we have done, pray and trust, cry and believe. Say, "Lord, thou Son of David, have mercy on me!" Remember He that hath saved one can save two; He that hath saved two can save three; ay, it stops not at three; if there were three thousand there, who all cried for mercy, they should all have it.

I see this morning before my mind's eye Jesus standing before Jericho like a second Joshua. As you all know, the names Jesus and Joshua are the same. Joshua crossed the Jordan, and he stood with his sword drawn to capture Jericho, and commence his march through Canaan, conquering and to conquer. See, here is Jesus, and He must needs make captives in Jericho before He advances farther into the land. Even now I may say of Jesus Christ which was said of the son of Nun, "So the Lord was with Joshua, and his fame was noised abroad throughout all the country." I wish the Lord Jesus Christ this morning would make this place as the gate of Jericho, and begin on this spot a great revival of religion throughout the whole land, by opening the eyes of some that are blind. Let the prayer go up from many a heart, "Lord, open my eyes, and he will do it; and let that request be followed by another, "Lord, save millions," and he will hear us. Let us pray boldly and believingly in the name of Jesus. Hear thou us, O Lord. Amen.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

By Rev. George Müller, of Bristol, England.

The Apostles' Hope—Reality of Christ's Reappearing—A Great Distinction—Five Events at the Coming of Christ—1. The First Resurrection—Who Will Rise, and Who Not—2. The Restoration of Israel—3. The Destruction of the Antichrist—The Antichrist Not the Pope—The Present Duty of the Church—To Wait and to Work—Mr. Müller's Experience—His Aim and His Hope.

IN the days of the apostles the disciples were comforted and encouraged by the prospect of the personal return of the Lord Jesus Christ. An angel had said to them as they watched the Lord depart from the earth, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." (Acts 1 : 11.) This, and not death, was the hope of the Church; and thus it ought to have remained up to His actual return. His coming should have continued to be the hope of the Church; but this, alas! for centuries has not been the case.

In confessions of faith the truth that the Lord Jesus will come again may still have had a place; but practically to by far the greater number of His disciples it has been a mere doctrinal statement that has not been enjoyed, and which has had no influence upon their lives. The Lord, however, desired it should be otherwise. He intended that His Church should look for Him, that she should watch and wait for His return. Again and again, during His personal ministry, the Lord Jesus foretold this great event; and after His ascension the apostles referred continually to it.

Very many passages of Scripture might be quoted in proof of this assertion, but I will only mention the following: "When the Son of man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory." (Matt. 25 : 31.) "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also" (John 14 : 2, 3). "As it is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time, without sin unto salvation." (Heb. 9 : 27. 28.)

"The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then (afterward) we, which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." (1 Thes. 4 : 16, 17.) These quotations suffice to prove that the second coming of the Lord Jesus means that He will return in person, and has no reference to the gift of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, nor to His manifesting Himself in an especial manner to the believer in the way of comfort, instruction, or help of any kind; nor has it reference to our death, when we, as believers, are taken to be with Him.

If, however, any one should say, "Why lay such stress upon this; is not our going to Him when we die the same thing?" The reply is, "There is between these two events."

(a) As individuals we shall at that time be brought only to a state of partial happiness; we shall have no glorified bodies then, but must await the hour when "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Nor when we fall asleep do we reign with Christ and sit with Him upon His throne; because He will not then be manifestly reigning. Blessed therefore though it is for the child of God, when he departs, "to be absent from the body and present with the Lord," it will be unspeakably more blessed still to enter upon that fulness of glory which awaits us only at our Lord's return.

(b) Satan will not be bound until Jesus comes again, and for this reason, by the permission of God, he still has power here, both in the world and in the Church, though individuals are out of his reach who have fallen asleep in Jesus.

(c) The whole Church will at once be introduced to full eternal happiness and glory at our blessed Lord's return. Not only as individuals will our cup of joy be full to overflowing, but we shall rejoice throughout eternity with the whole company of the redeemed. What has been said therefore is, I trust, sufficient to show that the second coming of Christ will be His personal return, and that there is a vast difference between the death of individual believers and the coming advent of our Lord in glory.

I now proceed to consider briefly some of the events which will take place then.

1. The first resurrection, when the changed and risen saints together will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, to be forever with Him. (1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17.) At this time those only will be raised who, as believers in the Messiah under the old covenant dispensation, or as disciples of the Lord Jesus under that of the new covenant, shall have fallen asleep in Him.

The commonly received opinion is, that at our Lord's return there will be a general resurrection, both of believers and of unbelievers, while the Holy Spirit teaches in the Holy Scriptures that they who are Christ's, and they only, will have part in the first resurrection. In 1 Cor. 15 : 22, 23, we read thus: "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at His coming." Notice the words, "they that are Christ's." Not all who had previously died, but those only who through faith in Jesus are united to Him, and shall have fallen asleep as believers. The same truth is taught in 1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17, where we read: "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then (afterward) we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." Notice that only of the dead in Christ it is said they will rise at that time.

In Rev. 20 : 4–6 we read thus: "And I saw thrones and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the Word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast (the Antichrist), neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years." In the beginning of this passage, when it is stated, "And I saw thrones and they sat upon them," we have to understand that believers in Christ who are with Him, are here referred to; the armies in heaven mentioned in chap. 19, ver. 14.

Further, "The souls of them that were slain for the Word of God, and for the testimony which they held," spoken of in chap. 6, ver. 9, are next seen. Regarding the whole of the passage, it is obvious that believers only are referred to, and not the ungodly who had died previously. They indeed will be raised up also, but at the end of the millennium, a thousand years later, in order that having obtained their bodies (not glorified ones), they may be capable of enduring more abundant punishment. (See Rev. 20 : 11–15.)

Oh! how should the solemnity and certainty of these events come home to every one of us, and with what earnestness should each person who reads these lines seek upon Scriptural grounds to settle for himself that he is really Christ's; because by nature we are lost, ruined, and undone, and deserve nothing but punishment; but we have, at the same time, to accept God's only remedy, namely salvation through faith in the blood and righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom alone spiritual life, pardon, and justification can be obtained. (See Eph. 2 : 1–9; Gal. 3 : 26; Acts 10 : 43; Rom. 5 : 1; John 3 : 16, and Rom. 8 : 16, 17.)

2. The conversion and restoration of Israel nationally; for in Scripture the glory and resurrection of the Church of the first born ones is always connected with the time when Israel again "shall know the Lord." (Psalm 102 : 16. See Jeremiah, chapters 30 and 31, Isaiah, chapters 11 and 12. Read also carefully Isaiah, chapters 24, 25, 26, and 27.)

3. Another event which will take place at the return of the Lord Jesus, is that

SATAN WILL BE BOUND.

"And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be fulfilled, and after that he must be loosed a little season." (Rev. 20 : 1–3.) During the present dispensation, before the return of our Lord, Satan will not be bound: therefore sin and open wickedness will continue to the end of it; and instead of becoming better, things, according to Scripture, will become worse and worse. It is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fearful wickedness now around us everywhere; for murders of the most cruel character, and numerous other atrocious crimes are, even in this enlightened nineteenth century, continually being committed. How certainly does all this prove that Satan is not yet bound, that he is even now the god of this world, and has power still; and because he knows that his time will be comparatively short he manifests his hatred against God and against His people to the very utmost.

But this state of things will not always last; for, when Jesus comes again, he will lose his power in the earth, and will be shut up in the bottomless pit for a thousand years.

4. In connection with the return of the Lord Jesus is another event, namely, the separation between the wheat and the tares. Read carefully Matt. 13 : 24–30; also verses 37–43. In this parable, together with our Lord's own explanation of it, we see what is to be expected during this present dispensation, while Jesus tarries. Civilization, mental cultivation, and advancement in knowledge of every kind may continue to the utmost; but man, fallen man, remains a ruined creature, except he be regenerated by the power of the Holy Spirit, through the acceptance of the Gospel. Intellectually he may be improved and polished to the very highest degree, but he is a sinner, and, in his natural condition, remains lost, ruined, and undone. He may even possess natural religion and a form of godliness; but if he is not born again he is still at enmity with God, and as assuredly as he does not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ "the wrath of God abideth on him." (John 3 : 36.)

Sin is not, as some suppose, a comparatively little thing. It is a deadly spiritual disease, as the Word of God declares it to be; and no progress in education, no mental culture, can eradicate it from the heart, nor change depraved human nature. For, notwithstanding every effort at improvement, the heart remains "deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." Until the return of the Lord Jesus, therefore, the present state of things will continue, and, as we shall see presently from the Word of God, will become worse and worse.

This, then, plainly shows the notion entertained by many godly, excellent persons, that the world will be converted during the present dispensation by the preaching of the Gospel, and that the millennium will thus finally be introduced, to be not according to the Holy Scriptures.

The Gospel, indeed, was to be preached "as a witness to all nations," but it was not to be the means of the conversion of the world. (Matt. 24 : 14.) Moreover, from Acts 15 : 14 we learn the character of the present dispensation, which is, that God "takes out from among the Gentiles a people for His name," but does not convert all nations. This is confirmed by the parable of the wheat and the tares ; for if the whole world were to be converted before the return of the Lord Jesus, there would be no truth in the explanation given of it by our Lord Himself. He tells us that the tares (the children of the wicked one) were to grow together with the wheat (the children of the kingdom), until the end of the age, namely up to the time of His own return. This therefore, the word of the Lord Jesus, is in direct opposition to the common notion that the world will be converted previous to His coming again.

And in addition to this we find passage after passage in the New Testament in which we are expressly told, either by Christ or by the apostles, that at the close of the present dispensation wickedness will abound both among professed believers and in the world at large, in proof of which I will refer to one single passage of Scripture only. In 2 Tim. 3 : 1–5 we read, "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God ; having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof." Here we have particularly to keep before us that this is not a description of Pagans or Mahometans, but of the professed disciples of the Lord Jesus; for to such a state will Christendom, or the professing Church of Christ, be reduced at the end of the present dispensation.

Notice especially that of these persons it is said, they have a form of godliness. They wish to be considered Christians, they are not avowed infidels and atheists but professed believers. Are we, then, to expect that things around us will gradually improve, or rather, that as we approach the darker they will become? True it is that one day, "The earth will be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," but this will never be until Jesus Himself comes. In the meantime lawlessness will increase, and the socialism, the communism, the nihilism, etc., of which we now hear so much, will at last be headed up in the personal Antichrist, the man of sin. Which leads me to mention another of the events that will take place at the return of the Lord Jesus, namely :

5. The destruction of the Antichrist. In 2 Thess. 2 : 1–8 we read : "Now we beseech you brethren by (or, concerning) the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by (or, concerning) our gathering together unto Him, that ye be not soon (or, hastily) shaken in mind or be troubled, neither by spirit nor by word nor by letter as from us, as that (or, as though we had said) the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means, for that day shall not come except there come a falling away (or, the apostasy) first, and that (or, the) man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition ; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God and that is worshipped ; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. Remember ye not that when I was yet with you, I told you of these things.

"And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time. For the mystery of iniquity (or, lawlessness) doth already work, only he who now letteth (or, restraineth) will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that wicked (or, lawless one) be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and destroy with the brightness of His coming."

From this portion of the inspired Word of God (2 Thess. 2 : 3) we learn that the Lord Jesus will not come until after the manifestation of "the apostasy." Has the apostacy here spoken of taken place, and has the lawless one (or, the Antichrist) been revealed? The reply from Scripture is, the apostasy has not yet taken place, and the lawless one has not yet been revealed. This passage has not found its fulfilment either in popery or the popes. Fearful as the delusions of popery are, and awful as is the picture of what the popes have been, the apostasy here referred to will be far more dreadful still ; for it will be no less than an entire renunciation of all that is divine and the setting up as God of the lawless one himself. "For he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

He will be a king, a mighty monarch, whose might is obtained through the energy given to him by Satan, for "the dragon gives him his power and his seat and great authority." (Rev. 13 : 2.) This king, the Antichrist, will be at the head of the ten kingdoms of the Roman earth (that is, the ten kingdoms into which the countries which formerly constituted the Roman Empire will be finally divided), and the ten kings will agree to give to him their power.

During the period of his especial glory, which will be only forty-two months, he will blaspheme God, His tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. It will also be given unto him to make war with the saints and to overcome them ; and power will be given unto him over all kindreds and tongues and nations. And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. (Rev. 13 : 5, 8.)

This then, and not the world's conversion, is the state of things towards which we are rapidly hastening. Do we all really believe what the Scriptures declare concerning the things that are coming upon the earth? that the time is speeding on when "no man may buy or sell save he that has the mark or the name of the beast (the Antichrist) or the number of his name?" (Rev. 13 ; 17) When whoever will not submit to this and worship him, must be prepared to lose his life? The end, however, of this lawless one is plainly foretold in Scripture : "For the Lord Jesus will consume him with the spirit of His mouth, and destroy him with the brightness of His coming."

We have now in the next place to consider that it is the will of the Lord that we, His disciples, should

WAIT FOR HIS RETURN.

A great many passages might be quoted from the New Testament in proof of this ; but, for the sake of brevity I will refer only to a few. In Titus 2 : 11–13 we read, "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. Looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Observe how it is laid upon the saints to look for the blissful hope and appearing of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

In Matt. 24 : 36–41 our Lord Himself enjoins it upon us to wait for His return, and to watch. In Matt. 25 : 13 the Lord said to His disciples, "Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour when the Son of man cometh." Again in Mark 13 : 35–37 Jesus said, "Watch ye therefore, for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock crowing, or in the morning ; lest coming suddenly He find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." Again in Rev. 16 : 15 the Lord says, "Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame."

Now, are we, as believers, all watching? are we earnestly longing for the return of that blessed One? Do our hearts truly yearn after Him, and long for His glorious appearing? Are we also doing our part to hasten on His coming? And is it habitually our prayer that the Lord will be pleased to hasten the fulfilment of the events yet to be fulfilled before that day comes?

And now the last part of our subject remains to be considered, namely, the practical effect this truth should have upon our hearts. If it be really received and entered into, the child of God will say, "What can I do for my blessed Saviour before He comes again? How can I most glorify Him? His will concerning me is that I should occupy 'until He come.'" How then can I best use for Him the talents with which I am entrusted, my physical strength, my mental powers? How can my sight, my tongue, all my faculties of mind and body be best devoted to His praise? How should my time, my money, all that I am and have be used for Him? How can my whole spirit, soul, and body be best consecrated to His service?

These are deeply important practical questions which all believers in the Lord Jesus should ask themselves, seeing that we are not our own, but are bought with a price, even with His precious blood. Instead of indulging in inactivity and listlessness on account of the evil state of things around us, we should pray and work, and work and pray, as if it were in our power to stem the torrent of abounding iniquity ; for who can say how much good one single child of God who is thoroughly in earnest may accomplish ; and how greatly he may glorify God by walking in entire separation from all that is hateful to Him? We have especially also to guard against the temptation of slackening our efforts for the conversion of sinners, because the world will not be converted before Jesus comes. Rather should we say, "The time that He delayeth His coming may be short ; what therefore can I do to warn sinners, and to win souls for Him?"

When it pleased God in July, 1829, to reveal to my heart the truth of the personal return of the Lord Jesus, and to show me that I had made in looking for the conversion of the world, the effect it produced upon me was this : From my inmost soul I was stirred up to feel compassion for perishing sinners, and for the slumbering world around me lying in the Wicked One, and considered, "Ought I not to do what I can to win souls for the Lord Jesus while He tarries, and to arouse a slumbering church? I determined consequently to go from place to place, in order to preach the Gospel and arouse the Church to look and wait for the second coming of the Lord from heaven.

I soon began this work, but in a short time saw it plainly to be the Lord's will that I should stay for a while at Teignmouth, Devonshire, in a pastoral position, and labor in Bristol in the same way ; but though I have now been a pastor for more than fifty-one years, my heart has always been true to these two points ; and by means of "The Scriptural Knowledge Institution for Home and Abroad," which the Lord has permitted me to found, I have for forty-seven years been aiming at the conversion of sinners, and have sought to awaken the Church of Christ at large to look for His appearing as her great hope.

Besides this, during the last six years, from March, 1875, to March, 1881, I have almost constantly been travelling about (having visited eleven different countries and preached about 1800 times), in order to preach the Gospel, to stir up Christians, and also to instruct them about the character of this present dispensation, with the end thereof. This I have been able to do, as I can now be absent from the church at Bristol for a considerable portion of my time, having left it in charge of instructed fellow-laborers, and the institution during my absence is under the direction of Mr. Wright, my son-in-law.

In conclusion I would direct attention to 2 Peter 3 : 11–14 : "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming (or, hastening the coming) of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat? Nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless."

As assuredly as the practical character of the Lord's second coming is really apprehended in the power of it, the most blessed effects upon the life and deportment of Christians will follow. By means of it we are taught what awaits the world lying in the wicked one, and what will be the end of all this world's glory, pride, and pomp. The future destiny of the children of God is also unfolded to us, even that we shall be perfectly conformed to the image of our risen Lord, both in soul and body, when we shall see Him as He is.

Then shall we enter upon the possession of our inheritance, which is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away; and shall be seated with Jesus on His throne (Rev. 3 : 21), to judge the world in union with Him, and to spend a happy eternity together with our Lord in glory. "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." (Rev. 22 : 12.)

Mr. Müller, who has been holding services in the 13th Street Presbyterian church in this city for some weeks past, went to Newark last Saturday. He hopes to labor in parts of New Jersey, and perhaps of eastern Pennsylvania, for eight weeks. His passage to England is taken by the steamer Britannic, which sails on May 21. He is accompanied by Mrs. Müller.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Hardman at Home—His Temperament—The Saloon-keeper's Tactics—The School-boy—A Brother's Sympathy—The Transformed Grog-shop—Lady Isabel's Effort.

THE man who came into the cottage as Lady Isabel rose, bore the name of James Hardcastle, and by the usual clipping process in vogue among those of his class, he had undergone an abbreviation from his companions, and was commonly called Jemmy Hard.

Lucy's explanation that "mother" was "out," was supplemented by Jem's dismantlement of his shoulders from their basket-load of tools with one hand, while with the other he pushed a chair in the direction of his guest.

"No, thank you! I have been sitting down a long time," she said. "But I am very glad I have seen you; for I want to ask you to come and see me at the coffee-rooms some evening. Will you come?"

Jem puckered his eyes together, steadied himself by leaning hard on the back of the tilted chair. "Coffee what did you say, please?"

"Coffee-rooms," repeated Lady Isabel more distinctly. "There will be singing and speaking, and games, and coffee, and a great deal more besides; and I shall be there too. I wish you could come in and see us there. Will you?"

Her winning voice and gentle manner, accompanied by a smile so sweet that her own father used to say it reminded him of "a sunbeam in March"—beautiful and rare!—so won upon the tired man that before she had taken her farewell and slipped out of the door, he had compromised his usual, undeniable shyness into a half promise that he "would call in that way some evening, if so be he could."

When she was gone, he took a long iron hook from off a nail in the chimney-corner, and began to poke up the fire, by way of producing something like a blaze for the illumination of the cottage—candles were a luxury not to be thought of, except just at tea time, or perhaps for an hour afterward, if "the missus" or "Luce" had any fine needle-work to do—and with every poke he uttered his feelings.

His feelings were warm and sensitive. Unfortunately, as with most of his laboring brethren, he usually found plenty of outside magnetism for the irritable in his nature, with as little for the better side of it. "Adding fuel to fire" with their words, smiles, or blows, was an art at which most of his acquaintances were adepts, and which it amused them highly to practise on a "red-hot chap" like Sandy Jem; while too often his inflammable tempers were heated to their utmost by the offer of the fiery draught from the wily saloon-keeper, who, seeing Jem a "little put out," and thinking it a good opportunity to turn a penny thereby, would hold the tempting glass before his face in the presence of his mates, saying, "Don't 'ee think twice about it, old chap! Now take it, and welcome."

Pray do not think Sandy was a drunkard, or that he called himself one, or that his mates considered him so! Far from it. But he did find it very hard to resist such a token of goodwill, thus offered, and before "company." The consequence of all this was that Jem's life was by no means lined with swan's-down. On the contrary, it was rough and hard, and full of sore recollections, and jagged edges, and unpleasant prospects too. The result was that he never liked to think, and he never liked to be alone, and he did not much like to be in society—the only society he knew of—and often his only refuge was his pipe, from which he whiffed fumes of cheap tobacco.

So, after all, if we penetrate Sandy's interior, it was hardly an enviable one. Nor was it a solitary one. If he had cared to look in Thornham, his own little town, he would have found many another life very like his. This fact had never occurred to him; his small gallery of ideas was very like the panorama exhibited in a small sea-side town, of a revolving order. The same old thoughts, and the same fixed ideas, came and went in one time-worn groove, with scarcely a variety. This could easily be accounted for by his lack of education, moneyed resource, opportunity for amusement or travel. As for the latter, "Thornham Upper" was the farthest view he had obtained of the world that surrounded him; and this walk of from three to four miles over the ridge he usually accomplished on a holiday, if it was a fine day, and if he was not too tired, and if he felt inclined so to do.

As he now vigorously poked the fire, he rammed a few disjointed thoughts into the reddish embers. "Coffee—coffee room, she said—nice kind of a one she wur. Wonder whatever makes her come here," while so saying he savagely worried a bit of coal that wouldn't break, continuing his soliloquy with a saddened mildness, as he pulled about the ashes.

"Ain't nothin' much to bring her—it's summat a poor place—heerd tell they have a sight o' things up at their place"—then turning round so sharply as to startle Lucy, who was in a meditative mood on her locker-couch, he asked, "Wherever's your mother, I wonder?"

"She'll be in d'recly father. Couldn't you fetch down the teapot, and let the kettle stand, father? I'm that bad to-night, and so weak that I've been good for nothing all day."

A growl from the chimney-corner showed Lucy that "the least said was soonest mended," and that he was by no means inclined to comply with that or any other request. "Who can wonder," she thought to herself, "that digging work must make them cross?"

Not many minutes elapsed before another shadow had crossed the doorway, and Lucy's mother was in the room. No word of greeting passed from husband to wife, no tender attention. Mrs. Hardcastle thought herself fortunate if she could get the tea ready and administer the steaming cup and thick bread and butter without a snap. Yet he loved her. You would not have thought it, no! But beneath that very crusty outside, she knew quite well that in some degree she was essential to his happiness, such as it was.

She was a meek little woman, thin and worn. "A very 'eavy fam'ly," she would say, by way of an apology for the jaded appearance of her exterior. She had brought up her children, and brought them out. The youngest was a boy at school. He would soon be in now, and consequently a stool and plate and cup were left at his corner of the small deal table.

At this instant, "The King of the Cannibal Islands" was whistled in a more vigorous than musical style along the garden path and past the window, only arresting itself at the door, as that aperture opened to its widest, to admit the family schoolboy. Bluish eyes and sandy hair presented themselves to view, capping a pair of somewhat rosy cheeks and plenty of sunburnt freckles; hands that would always find their way into very gaping trouser pockets, which latter looked as if they were constituted by long use to hold any quantity of material varying from the consistency of "rock" to marbles; and a funny button-hole mouth that looked as if it had grown into a whistling shape—these were the most striking features of the youthful scion of the Hardcastle house.

"My word!" he began in a voice rather louder than was necessary, "you never did see such a rumpus as there's carrying on down at Grasslands Corner. There's a whole lot of people down there, and comin' and goin', and such a fuss. And the lady from Lionel Court—she's been down there, and ever so many more besides. I can't think whatever's up. I'm goin' down again when I've got my tea."

"I know!" said the father, sagely nodding with one side of the head toward his wife. "I specs it's something about what she was saying when she comed in just now. 'Coffee-room,' I think she called it."

"Ah! you may be sure," the boy was beginning, much excited, when he suddenly interrupted himself—"Oh! I say, mother, where's Lucy's tea? Poor old Luce. How are you?" and standing in a stooping posture over Lucy's extemporized couch, he passed his scrubby, rough little palm right over her face, and smoothed her hair with it. "Poor Luce! are you better?" he said. "Can't you come to the table to-night?"

Lucy replied in the negative, as she patted the hard, broad little hand that had caressed her. "No, dear; not to-night. Sit down and have yours, and tell us all about what you saw down at the corner."

Between huge mouthfuls of bread and butter and cavernous gulps of weak tea, Ted continued his descriptions, without once being interrupted by an injunction to silence from his father, who on other occasions would have said at a much earlier period of the conversation, "Now, then, hold your row. That's enough of it;" but who said on this occasion, "She's a werry good 'un, I expect. If she's a-doin' of it, it's sure to do. She's nice-spoken, too—she is. Not like a lot of 'em, I expect. I'll look down that way some night."

His paternal share of the repast being completed, Jem turned round to the fire, placed his two feet on the corner of the fender, reached down his pipe from the mantelpiece, lighted it, and put it into his mouth. The mother began to wash up, assisted for a few minutes in a kind of a way by Ted, until his diligence ceased, and he went to pay his usual attentions to Luce.

In the mean time we may follow Lady Isabel Hamilton in her homeward drive. She turned, on leaving the cottage, down the steep bit of hill, entered one little street, and through it drove into a wider one. At the end of this was a new-looking corner house. It had been a grog-shop, well known by its distinguishing sign, "The Blue Boar," on which was depicted a monster that looked as if its cast had been taken by some drunken artist after a fit of delirium tremens. Now reformed, literally as well as morally, each dividing wall and partition had been removed, each outer wall strengthened, and the second story heightened. The first floor was already lofty enough, and, with the enlarging operations to which it had been subjected, and the ornamental ones that were being added, it looked very suitable for its present purpose.

Lady Isabel had long set her heart on having at least one good rival to the oft-repeated drinking-house that was her perpetual eyesore, her heart-pain, in driving through Thornham. Her wish had been granted, and as she drove her ponies up to the door where workmen were still lingering, putting a finishing touch here and there, she lifted up her heart in a true whisper of thanks to the "Father of lights," whom from her heart of hearts she felt she could acknowledge as the "Giver of every good and perfect gift," and whom she would soon begin to know as the One "with whom there is no shadow of turning."

Her heart's desire for the working people of her neighbor town had to-night advanced at least one step to its fulfilment. So she hoped, and so she thought; but she little knew how much farther than her hopes she had really advanced. The first step toward the success of her labors was already gained, and more than the first. Of this, in her sweet humility, she was scarcely conscious. She had, by her pure, unselfish love, her consistent life, and her gentle sympathy won the respect even of those who had scarcely seen her.

So strong a hold had the gin-shop gained over the physique, mental and moral, of the workingmen, that it must indeed take "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together," before the tidal wave of so fatal an influence could be induced to surrender a victimized people, and the little craft of prosperous sobriety fairly launched in its stead. The echoes of so many a failure in this cause had reached the small circle of its supporters in Thornham, that we cannot wonder at some heart-quakings on Lady Isabel's part when she made her brave little venture. So far she had succeeded.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

S. S. Lesson for April 10th, Luke 10:25-37. Golden Text, Lev. 19:18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

FALSE inquirers are not among Satan's newest inventions. We complain sometimes in our work for God, that there is so little truth among those with whom we have to do, that their motives are so impure, that we can place so little reliance upon what they say; and we excuse ourselves often for the little effect of our work by saying that we are laboring on a hard soil. Let us not forget that God has an eye, not only to the work but to the workman; that in every difficulty which He permits us to meet with He is furthering our education, and affording us opportunities for carrying out in our lives the Divine precepts of Christianity. Our Blessed Lord's life in all its tiny details carried out His teaching, and if ours does not do the same, our spiritual children will be a poor, weakly, unsatisfactory class.

We have before us in our lesson a lawyer who came to Jesus, not to be taught, not to receive anything from Him, but to criticise, to "catch Him in His words," and if possible prove Him to be in error; he came "tempting Him." "Master," he said, "what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" Eternal life was the new doctrine which men were speaking against in those days, just as now some speak against assurance, others against consecration, others against healing. The only ideas of the lawyer were to do and to inherit. He spoke as a Jew, as one who was under the law and an heir of the promises. But he knew little of "eternal life." That which God has made to be a new creation was to him only a point of doctrine. The Apostle John says, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of Life; for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father and was manifested unto us" (1 John 1:1, 2). Here we see that eternal life is the very life of the God-man, of God manifest in our flesh.

The Lord Jesus knew the heart of the man who stood there to judge and criticise the only sinless of His love to God, and who manifested only love to the would-be antagonist who catechised Him; and there stood the critic, who till now had never made his convictions a personal matter. And Jesus "said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live." The man was in the very act of transgressing this law; he would not willingly be questioned in the spirit in which he was questioning Jesus; the tables were being turned upon him; he felt that he had lost ground; and now, instead of continuing to tempt or try Jesus, he took up an attitude of self-defence.

"He, willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, And who is my neighbor?" No doubt there were many different views abroad among the Jews of that period about this essential question. A covetous man would find it inconvenient to make the circle of his neighbors a wide one, because he would be so unwilling to answer to any claims which such a relationship might make upon his purse. A proud man would limit the circle to those who held the same position in society. A Pharisee would not let Sadducees into the number, nor Sadducees Pharisees. And this exclusive spirit reigns now among professing Christians. The Lord Jesus had nothing at stake on earth, and therefore He could take an unbiassed view of things; and as we live His life, the atmosphere clears of all fog, and we can see things and persons as they are in the unclouded light of God.

The Lord, in the parable which follows, supposed an extreme case. "A certain man"—no relation, no friend, not even an acquaintance—went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead." The Lord does not tell us if he was a deserving man, or to which of the many sects among the Jews he belonged; he was in need, and every one who is in need desires to be helped. Who would do to him a neighbor's part? Do we know any who are in need—drunkards, criminals, prostitutes, gamblers? "They don't deserve to be helped," says the unpitying world which has made them what they are. They are in need: this is the only claim they have upon those who have been saved in their need by the sinners' Friend.

"By chance there came down a certain priest that way." Oh that this were the only case in which the recognized pastor of a flock came in the way of a distressed one, "by chance," instead of intentionally. "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke 19:10). He goes out of His way, and leaves the ninety and nine in the wilderness to seek after that which is lost until He find it. The work of men filled with the Holy Ghost is no chance work. The Holy Ghost led Philip in contact with the eunuch, and Peter to Cornelius (Acts 8:29; 10:19). Every real laborer in God's vineyard, whether an ordained minister or not, has a right to expect the most intimate and direct leading, if he has surrendered himself to the government of the Holy Ghost, and laid down his own will and way. The priest who came "by chance" was certainly not guided by the Holy Ghost to pass by on the other side. "And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him and passed by on the other side." What was become of the precious office of both priests and Levites, to "bless in the name of the Lord" (Num. 6:23; Deut. 10:8)? Did it exist in name only, or did these men feel that they did not stand in a direct line between the needy one and God, and so were conscious of their lack of power; or were they so loveless that they were actuated only by indifference?

One passer-by acted out the precept of our golden text, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." He it was from whom the least might have been expected—"a certain Samaritan." "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans" (John 4:9); but in the case before us the need of the poor sufferer was too strong a claim on the Samaritan for his religious prejudices to interfere, and he took the honored place of "neighbor to him who fell among the thieves." Once the rein given to his love, and the Samaritan spared no pains, no expense, no fatigue, no time, for the restoration of the stranger. There was no calculation as to how long the man would be a burden upon him, no shrinking from any sacrifice; compassion had taken possession of him. He had nothing to gain by it but the privilege of loving another as himself—a privilege not understood by the world; for "men will praise thee when thou doest well unto thyself" (Ps. 49:18).

Divine love is the very eternal life, Christ in us, which the lawyer in his ignorance inquired about; it is a fire which is independent of earthly fuel, for it gives all, and asks for nothing in return. Earthly love soon dies away when it receives no love or gratitude in return, or when its object is an unworthy one; it is so narrow that it cannot take in many objects at once, and when it gets a new object it must diminish its supply of love to the old one.

The Samaritan went to the poor stranger, and "bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine." "The Lord . . . healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds" (Ps. 147:3); and He says of His lost sheep, "I will . . . bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick" (Ezek. 34:16). But how few there are of Christ's followers who understand the art of binding up a broken heart, or healing a wounded conscience. It is easy to condemn, but oh, how difficult to restore an offender; yet we are forbidden to condemn—"Judge not, that ye be not judged" (Matt. 7:1)—and commanded to restore our brethren: "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted" (Gal. 6:1). It is never by chance that we become acquainted with the sin of another, and it is our precious office, as the Lord's Levites, to bless and to restore in His name. But oh, how often is it that we have too little of the anointing of the Holy Ghost to be in a position to minister the Spirit to others, and to pour oil into their wounds; and too little of the new wine of the Kingdom, too little of Christ's nature, to cleanse the wounds without inflaming them.

The Samaritan did not expect too much of the stranger; he did not look for him to walk immediately after his wounds were dressed, but by walking himself provided means whereby he should be carried. This is a lesson for us. Sometimes, when some poor lost drunkard or prostitute is brought to Jesus, we expect of them a walk which is firmer and freer from sin than our own. Jesus carries us, we are borne by Him; let us bring these weak ones in contact not only with His forgiving, but His sustaining grace, and then we shall expect from Him, and not from them, that they will be kept. The Samaritan brought him to an inn, and nursed him, made himself a servant to the stranger; and as Jesus' followers, we are privileged to make ourselves servants to all, that we might gain the more (1 Cor. 9:19).

But oh, how this parable opens up to us the love of Christ! Have we not also fallen among thieves? Where are the early years of many of us; the precious time given us by God for His service, where is it? Robbed by the world, the flesh, and the devil; spent in another service, gone beyond recall. Where were all the precious gifts and graces provided for us in Christ during that lost time? Robbed by the unbelief and self which took for its own that which we might have held in partnership with God. And what have the outward institutions of religion done for us? What have the priests and Levites done? Passed by on the other side. But there was One who took our flesh upon Him, that He might come where we were—One who had compassion, who came to us when we were in no position to go to Him; who bound up our wounds with hands which had been first wounded for us, and poured in oil and wine, although in His sufferings for us none poured oil and wine into His wounds. And He came down that He might lift us up, and He has watched over and taken care of us. "On the morrow, when he departed, he took out twopence and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee." The Lord Jesus, too, is gone—gone to His Father—but He has left a provision for us, and made Himself surety for all our needs unconditionally; for He has said, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son" (John 14:13).

The Lord Jesus was always personal in His dealing with inquirers. He first made the lawyer condemn himself in his answer to the question, "Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor to him that fell among the thieves?" and then He who taught as one that had authority said unto him, "Go, and do thou likewise."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Close of the War in the Transvaal Between the British and the Boers was announced to the British Parliament by Mr. Gladstone on March 22d. The course the Government have taken in making peace with a victorious enemy has brought upon them the invectives of a large portion of the English people jealous for the honor of their flag. But the government believed that as the people of the Transvaal were opposed to British rule it ought not to be forced upon them. Having arrived at that conclusion it would have been wicked to sacrifice the lives of British soldiers and of the Boers merely to show the world that England was able to beat the Boers in battle. There is no doubt that had England put forth the power at her command the brave little army of Boers would have been overwhelmed, but Mr. Gladstone believed the reputation of his country was too well established to need a vindication of that character. The conflict has thus ended with honor to both parties, the valor of the Boers has been no less conspicuous than the magnanimity of the British.

A Royal Commission has been Appointed to arrange the details of the settlement in the Transvaal. The general principles having been agreed upon by the commanders of the two armies, there are questions of boundaries and the relations of the Transvaal with the Cape colonists and with the natives to be considered. Upon the wise arrangement of these details depends the permanence of the peace. It is understood that the main difficulty in the work of the royal commission will be, as it was in the past negotiations, to obtain guarantees from the Boers for the just treatment of the natives. The tribes are kept in a state of perpetual hostility to Europeans by the unjust conduct of the Boers, and England while conceding to the Boers complete independence and self-government, will retain a suzerainty over the Transvaal and maintain a representative there to protect the natives and adjust disputes between the two races.

Mr. Parnell is Endeavoring to Establish branches of the Land League in England. At a meeting held in London on March 25th, he said that although the English Land Question was not ripe for settlement he thought the English laborers would benefit by the Irish movement, and might aid it with profit to themselves. At the same meeting he stated that the subscriptions to the Irish Land League received from America amounted to twenty thousand dollars each week. If the tenant farmers and the laborers who are struggling to maintain themselves and their families could get some of that money instead of the agitators having it all to invest in France, they might be able to emigrate, or to purchase their farms, or at all events to improve their position.

The International Society has Attracted the attention of several European governments, and an attempt will be made to suppress it. The society is the result of an effort to unite the communists, socialists, and the secret societies of the whole world in a species of federation. A telegram from St. Petersburg says that the assassination of the Czar was planned by the International, and it is believed that the attempts on the lives of the Emperor of Germany, the King of Italy, and the King of Spain may all be traced to it. The initiative taken some time ago by Spain for effecting an understanding among the Powers with a view to united action against the common enemy, is now expected to have practical results. M. Rochefort and several other French communistic editors have been fined, and some of them sentenced to a term of imprisonment in addition to a fine, for writing articles applauding the assassination of the Czar.

The Difficulty Between Turkey and Greece has not advanced nearer a settlement during the past week. Newspaper correspondents at Constantinople regard the negotiations still dragging on as utterly hopeless, and express their conviction that only the united armed intervention of Europe can avert war. The terms offered by Turkey as the extreme concession she will make, the Greek Government will not accept. Indeed it is believed that the hopes of the Greeks having been raised by the decision of the Berlin Conference, and they having consented to abstain from joining in the war on the understanding that Europe would see to it that Turkey made a definite cession of territory, they would rise in revolution and overthrow the government if the king and his ministers accepted a smaller concession than was originally fixed. The territory offered by Turkey is less than one half of the size settled by the Berlin Conference. The negotiations have been still further complicated by a demand France makes on Turkey for the cession of Tunis. The process of dismemberment is thus pressing heavily on Turkey. She lost a considerable portion of her territory by the late war, she ceded Cyprus to England, and now the demand of France, and the Greek claims carry the same process still further. It is obvious that the prophecy of the drying up of the Euphrates is on the eve of fulfilment.

The Policy of the New Czar of Russia will, it is announced, comprise important benefits to the serfs emancipated by the late Czar. At the time they were set free, an arrangement was made with a view of securing to every freed man the house and land he occupied as a serf under the nobles. The value of these holdings was assessed, and they were purchased for the serfs. They were not intended to be a gift, but were to be paid for by the freed men. The Czar paid the nobles four fifths of the purchase money, and the serfs were to pay the other fifth, either by labor or by money, in full or in instalments. It was also arranged that the serfs were to repay the Czar the money advanced on their behalf in forty-nine annual payments of six per cent each. These payments have been a heavy burden, for the soil is in many districts very poor, and the means of transportation limited. It is now stated that a large portion of these annual dues will be remitted by Alexander III., who will thus complete the good work done by his father.

The Foreign Policy of Alexander III. is the subject of considerable anxiety. The close relationship and personal friendship existing between the Emperor of Germany and the late Czar, on several occasions prevented a rupture between the two nations, but Alexander III. has a strong aversion to Germany, which has increased since his marriage with the daughter of the King of Denmark. The hopes of France have in consequence been raised by hopes of a Franco-Russian alliance against Germany, which bodes ill for the peace of Europe. Prophetic expositors believe that ultimately France will wage a successful war against her old enemy across the Rhine. The accession of Alexander III., and his known antipathy to Germany, show how that event may be precipitated. The Czar's warm friendship with the Prince of Wales, whose wife is the sister of the Czar's wife, will, it is believed, allay the ill feeling which has existed for many years between Great Britain and Russia. It is reported that the advance of Russian troops toward Merv, which England regarded as a menace to her Indian Empire, has already been checked by command of the Czar.

An Attempt is Being Made to Induce the Czar of Russia to abolish the terrible punishment of banishment to Siberia. A member of the St. Petersburg Provincial Assembly of Nobles made a speech recently, in which he stated that between the years 1870 and 1877 63,442 persons had been exiled to that inhospitable land.

Sixty-Nine Corpses Have Been Taken Out of the ruins of the opera house at Nice, which was destroyed by fire on March 23d. The flames broke out on the stage, at the commencement of the performance, and the scenery being made of paper was quickly ignited, and the fire spread with fearful rapidity to other parts of the house. There were but three doors to the building, and one of those had not been used for years and could not be opened. The avenues leading to the other doors were soon the scene of a fierce struggle, in which men and women fought desperately to get out of the place. Besides those who perished in the flames many were suffocated, others were trodden to death in their struggle to escape, and some flung themselves from the roof into the street and were killed. The total loss of life is not accurately known, but it is feared that the sixty-nine bodies recovered do not represent the whole of the fatalities. Nice is the fashionable resort of the French aristocracy, and many American, Russian, and English visitors are always to be found there enjoying the breezes of the Mediterranean. French actors and actresses frequently run down from Paris when in need of change, and perform at one of the two theatres of the city. This terrible calamity ought to be a warning to the dissipated and careless people who resort to the gay city.

Arraigned and Acquitted Through her Child.—A poor, pale seamstress was recently arraigned for theft in Paris. She appeared with her baby of eleven months in her arms. She said: "The day I went to my employer's I carried my child with me. It was in my arms as it is now. I wasn't paying attention to it. There were several gold coins on the mantelpiece, and, unknown to me, it stretched out its little hand and seized three pieces, which I did not observe until I got home. I at once put on my bonnet, and was going back to my employer to return them when I was arrested. This is the solemn truth, as I hope for Heaven's mercy." The court could not believe this story, and it was proposed to renew the scene described by the mother. Three gold coins were placed on the clerk's table. The mother was requested to assume the position in which she stood at her employer's house. There was then a breathless pause in court. The baby soon discovered the bright coins, eyed them for a moment, smiled, and then stretched forth its tiny hand and clutched them with a miser's eagerness. The mother was acquitted.

Mrs. M. Baxter Writes from Cologne, the city of Germany best known for its eau-de-cologne: "After five weeks' work we have little to record in the way of visible fruits. Certainly, numbers have heard the Gospel in a very simple way, and a large number were from the very lowest ranks of the people, those who really have no religion—viz., some Protestants who never go to any church, and some Catholics who come to the meetings in spite of the threat that they will receive no absolution, many of them more from defiance than from a desire to know more of God's Word. At first the meetings were very unquiet—blasphemy, mockery, constant talking, singing, moving, during the whole time—but the last fortnight God gave us almost complete quiet during the meetings.

"But the scene outside was just the reverse. A rabble assembled every night to shout, scream, and yell at us as we came out of the meeting, following us sometimes for half an hour or more before we could be rid of them; and we were obliged to walk round and round the streets till they dropped off, to prevent their making an assault on the houses where we lodged. One unhappy old woman went out of the meeting mocking, and saying it was much better to come to a dance than to hear about salvation through Jesus' blood. Five minutes later she got a stroke in the street, and died in an hour or two, poor thing!" "He that being often reproved, hardeneth his neck (i.e., like an ox under the yoke), shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy" (Prov. 29:1).

THE ASSASSINATION OF ALEXANDER II., CZAR OF RUSSIA, ON MARCH 13.

THE ASSASSINATION OF THE CZAR OF RUSSIA.

The Scene of the Assassination—Result of the First Explosion—Arrest of the Assassin—The Second and Fatal Explosion—Medical Examination of the Czar and Death—Account by an Eye-Witness—The Arrested Assassin's History—The Conspirators' Nest—A Dangerous Mine Discovered.

The picture on the preceding page of the assassination of the Czar of all the Russias in St. Petersburg on Sunday, March 13th, with the fuller details we are now able to give of that lawless crime, complete the narrative which under the head of Foreign Topics we have already briefly presented.

Alexander II., it appears, had spent the morning of the fatal Sunday according to his usual habit, notwithstanding that a warning had been sent to his wife notifying her that he would certainly be assassinated before night. It was his custom to attend mass in the morning and to go from the church to the Riding School to review his troops. His wife begged him not to go to the review that morning, but he had received so many warnings that he had come to disregard them, and accordingly, having breakfasted with his family, he set out for the church. Thence after mass he drove to the Riding School, where the inspection of the troops was held promptly at one o'clock.

This great hall, the largest riding hall in the world except the one at Moscow, has a space of a little more than four acres under roof. It is well warmed by the great brick stoves along the wall, and it will hold about three thousand troops, with room for manœuvres. The various regiments of the guard stationed in and about St. Petersburg are here inspected in turn each Sunday morning during the winter. To this parade, the minister of war, the chief of the staff, the generals present in St. Petersburg, the members of the Imperial family and the military attachés of the foreign legations are invited. They all appear in full dress. Upon the Emperor's arrival, he, the foreign officers and the aide-de-camp on duty for the day mount their horses, all other officers remaining on foot. The troops are then inspected and reviewed. The detachment of cavalry or of Cossacks which happens to be present gives some exhibitions of fancy riding or sword exercise, and the Emperor moves his horse here and there through the troops, chatting and gossipping familiarly with them.

The parade usually lasts a little less than an hour; the troops are then dismissed with a "very well" from the Emperor, and he gets into his carriage or sleigh with one of his brothers or sons and drives back to the palace.

It was fresh from leaving just such a scene that the Emperor was murdered. The distance from the Winter Palace to the Riding School is a little less than a mile in a straight line, but following the streets the distance is about a mile and a quarter. The Emperor had travelled about one half the distance when, as he passed the Catherine Canal near the imperial stables, an explosion took place just behind the Czar's carriage, smashing in the back of it, wounding two horses, one of the six Cossacks forming the escort, and killing a soldier standing near.

The Herald of St. Petersburg says that the Czar immediately alighted. An officer ran toward him, and asked whether he was hurt. His majesty answered very calmly, "Thank God! I am untouched. Don't disturb yourself. I must see after the wounded." The Emperor ordered that all attention should be paid to the injured, and especially to the Cossack whose injuries appeared to be most serious, and then turning round, he saw the assassin a few paces from him, surrounded by a group of terrified people. A soldier of the Preobajenski Regiment of the guard held him fast by the arms. He had in one hand a revolver and in the other a dagger. The Emperor approached him with the utmost coolness, and ordered him to be removed.

At this instant another young man, an accomplice of the first assassin, threw something at the Czar's feet. A tremendous explosion followed. As soon as the smoke had cleared away, the Czar was seen to be lying in a pool of blood. Many other wounded persons were lying near him.

ACCOUNT BY AN EYE WITNESS.

An officer named Nowikoff, who himself was a witness of the terrible deed of blood, has given the folowing circumstantial recital:—

"I was walking home with two comrades from the Riding School, where the Emperor had been holding the parade, and had just reached the Razan Bridge when I heard a loud report. I hurried to the spot whence the sound proceeded and saw a group of people about thirty yards from me. A thick cloud of snow, mingled with splinters of wood, rose at the same time close to the place. Then came a second explosion. I thereupon ran all the faster, and when I arrived at the spot saw a sailor holding some one. The snow was thrown up in all directions, and on the ground lay a boy, killed; a Cossack, very severely injured; and one other person—the Emperor—without helmet or mantle, his clothes torn to pieces, his legs shattered, his blood dyeing the snow.

"I threw myself weeping at the Emperor's side, with the words, 'Good heaven! What has happened to your majesty?' The Emperor remained motionless, and I, with the assistance of some sailors, who had hurried to the spot, lifted him up, myself holding him round the body and breast, while the sailors, without leaving go of their carbines, held the feet. The Emperor then attempted to lift his hand to his bleeding brow, murmuring twice the word 'cold.'

"I was just about to take his handkerchief from his pocket to bind round the Emperor's head, when the Grand Duke Michael came up, and bending down close to the Emperor's face, said, 'How do you feel?' What his majesty replied it was difficult to catch. The Grand Duke ordered the sailors to throw down their carbines, and then, taking a cap from one of the bystanders, placed it on the Emperor's head. They then began to move forward. I asked the Grand Duke whether he would allow the bearers to carry the Emperor into the nearest house for the purpose of applying bandages to the wounded parts. The Emperor, who had evidently regained his consciousness, on hearing this, whispered in broken language, 'Carry—to—Palace; there—die,' and some few more words which were unintelligible. The Emperor was then placed on Colonel Dvortjetsky's sledge and driven to the palace."

THE NUMBER OF THE WOUNDED.

The wounded and injured by the two explosions number eighteen, of whom two, a Cossack of the escort and a young man, have since died. The others are Police-Colonel Dvorjetsky, who received various, some say sixty, flesh wounds; a marine subaltern, wounded in the head and arms; three soldiers of the imperial convoy and two cossacks of the Tver Squadron, slightly wounded; also a subaltern of the suite and two policemen, three peasants, a soldier's wife, injured in the right hand; a captain of cavalry, not much hurt; and M. Capri, a French teacher of music, wounded in the face, eyes, and feet.

The Emperor, who was unconscious, was placed on the sleigh of Colonel Dvorjetsky, chief of police, who took him in his arms, resting his head, which was covered with blood, on his breast. The Emperor's helmet had been carried away by the explosion. He was slowly borne to the Winter Palace, which was close at hand, and undressed. An examination disclosed the most frightful wounds. One leg was completely shattered right up to the top of the thigh, and the other was severed below the knee, and connected only by a few filaments of skin. The abdomen was also torn open, the face was injured, and the left eye forced from its socket. The surgeons declared amputation to be impossible, and that there was no hope.

The Czarewitch and his children, and the Emperor's young children by his morganatic wife, with the Grand Dukes Michael and Vladimir, were immediately gathered at the Winter Palace, the Emperor's chaplain was called, and the communion having been administered, the Czar quietly expired at about a quarter to four o'clock, in the sixty-third year of his age, and the twenty-sixth year of his reign. The only words he uttered after being carried into the palace were "Sasha, Sasha," his pet name for his eldest son.

Crowds of people had, in the meantime, assembled around the Winter Palace, full of anxiety to know the state of the Emperor. Many believed that the reports of the extent of the wounds had been exaggerated. But when, at the hour mentioned, the imperial ensign over the palace was lowered, half-mast, as a sign that the Czar was dead, all hats were removed, and general sorrow seemed to prevail. A general officer at the same time advanced toward the crowd and made known the sad event.

The Princess Dolgorouki, the woman whose relations to the Czar embittered the last years of the late Empress, and whom the Czar married after the death of his first wife, fainted away when she heard the news of the assassination, and remained unconscious for two hours. That same evening, accompanied by her sister and Prince Albedirski, Governor of Warsaw, who is her sister's husand, she left St. Petersburg, being taken to the railway station in a public conveyance. It is believed that she will remain in life-long exile. The present Czar was hostile to her influence over his father, and protested during his mother's lifetime so energetically against the Czar's immorality as to offend his father. He was also opposed to the marriage, and the Princess Dolgorouki knew that under his government her continued residence in Russia would be unpleasant both to herself and to the Imperial family.

THE ASSASSINS.

Some doubt exists as to the man who threw the second bomb which actually killed the Czar. A man present who fell to the ground although unhurt was seized by the soldiers on suspicion of being the assassin, but he was able to prove his innocence and was released. Another man who was badly injured and was carried to a hospital where he died next day, it was thought might be the assassin, and the man who threw the first bomb and was captured was taken to see his body, and asserted that he was his accomplice, but the police think that he may have said so untruthfully in order to divert pursuit from the real criminal.

The name of the captured assassin is Nicolai Vanoff Rousakoff. He is nineteen years old, and comes from Tikhvin, a town in the province of Novgorod. He received his elementary education in the small town of Vuitegra, in the government of Olonetz, and Tcherepovetz, in his native province, respectively, and in 1879 entered the Institute of Mines in St. Petersburg, of which he was a member at the time of committing the crime. It is stated by the correspondent of a New York journal that Rousakoff was interrogated as to his accomplices but refused to divulge their names; that he was then subjected to barbarous torture, being placed under the influence of a powerful electrical battery and his whole frame racked with the shocks. Under the agonizing suffering he made disclosures which led to the discovery of which was entered by the police on the night of the 15th and a quantity of bombs similar to those used on March 13th were found there.

As soon as the party of police tried the door about midnight they heard the report of an explosion within. Forcing open the door, they came upon a man lying in the passage with his brains blown out and covered with blood. On entering the room a woman shouted, "Take care, gentlemen, there is dynamite here." Two large cans of that substance were discovered in the apartment. The police arrested the woman, who seems to have made no resistance, and at once proceeded to search the apartment. A number of explosive shells were found, and one copy of a revolutionary proclamation relating to the crime, and pointing out that two persons would perform the terrible deed. No one else was found in the place. The police then set a watch for others who might come to the house, and remained there all night. At 11 o'clock next morning a young man presented himself at the door, and immediately fell in with the police. He drew a revolver, and fired six shots, wounding three policemen. He was, however, soon overpowered and removed in custody.

THE picture on the preceding page of the assassination of the Czar of all the Russias in St. Petersburg on Sunday, March 13th, with the fuller details we are now able to give of that lawless crime, complete the narrative which under the head of Foreign Topics we have already briefly presented.

Alexander II., it appears, had spent the morning of the fatal Sunday according to his usual habit, notwithstanding that a warning had been sent to his wife notifying her that he would certainly be assassinated before night. It was his custom to attend mass in the morning and to go from the church to the Riding School to review his troops. His wife begged him not to go to the review that morning, but he had received so many warnings that he had come to disregard them, and accordingly, having breakfasted with his family, he set out for the church. Thence after mass he drove to the Riding School, where the inspection of the troops was held promptly at one o'clock.

This great hall, the largest riding hall in the world except the one at Moscow, has a space of a little more than four acres under roof. It is well warmed by the great brick stoves along the wall, and it will hold about three thousand troops, with room for manœuvres. The various regiments of the guard stationed in and about St. Petersburg are here inspected in turn each Sunday morning during the winter. To this parade, the minister of war, the chief of the staff, the generals present in St. Petersburg, the members of the Imperial family and the military attachés of the foreign legations are invited. They all appear in full dress. Upon the Emperor's arrival, he, the foreign officers and the aide-de-camp on duty for the day mount their horses, all other officers remaining on foot. The troops are then inspected and reviewed. The detachment of cavalry or of Cossacks which happens to be present gives some exhibitions of fancy riding or sword exercise, and the Emperor moves his horse here and there through the troops, chatting and gossipping familiarly with them.

The parade usually lasts a little less than an hour; the troops are then dismissed with a "very well" from the Emperor, and he gets into his carriage or sleigh with one of his brothers or sons and drives back to the palace.

It was fresh from leaving just such a scene that the Emperor was murdered. The distance from the Winter Palace to the Riding School is a little less than a mile in a straight line, but following the streets the distance is about a mile and a quarter. The Emperor had travelled about one half the distance when, as he passed the Catherine Canal near the imperial stables, an explosion took place just behind the Czar's carriage, smashing in the back of it, wounding two horses, one of the six Cossacks forming the escort, and killing a soldier standing near.

The Herold of St. Petersburg says that the Czar immediately alighted. An officer ran toward him, and asked whether he was hurt. His majesty answered very calmly, "Thank God! I am untouched. Don't disturb yourself. I must see after the wounded." The Emperor ordered that all attention should be paid to the injured, and especially to the Cossack whose injuries appeared to be most serious, and then turning round, he saw the assassin a few paces from him, surrounded by a group of terrified people. A soldier of the Preobajenski Regiment of the guard held him fast by the arms. He had in one hand a revolver and in the other a dagger. The Emperor approached him with the utmost coolness, and ordered him to be removed.

ACCOUNT BY AN EYE WITNESS.

An officer named Nowikoff, who himself was a witness of the terrible deed of blood, has given the folowing circumstantial recital:—

"I was walking home with two comrades from the Riding School, where the Emperor had been holding the parade, and had just reached the Razan Bridge when I heard a loud report. I hurried to the spot whence the sound proceeded and saw a group of people about thirty yards from me. A thick cloud of snow, mingled with splinters of wood, rose at the same time close to the place. Then came a second explosion. I thereupon ran all the faster, and when I arrived at the spot saw a sailor holding some one. The snow was thrown up in all directions, and on the ground lay a boy, killed; a Cossack, very severely injured; and one other person—the Emperor—without helmet or mantle, his clothes torn to pieces, his legs shattered, his blood dyeing the snow.

"I threw myself weeping at the Emperor's side, with the words, 'Good heaven! What has happened to your majesty?' The Emperor remained motionless, and I, with the assistance of some sailors, who had hurried to the spot, lifted him up, myself holding him round the body and breast, while the sailors, without leaving go of their carbines, held the feet. The Emperor then attempted to lift his hand to his bleeding brow, murmuring twice the word 'cold.'

"I was just about to take his handkerchief from his pocket to bind round the Emperor's head, when the Grand Duke Michael came up, and bending down close to the Emperor's face, said, 'How do you feel?' What his majesty replied it was difficult to catch. The Grand Duke ordered the sailors to throw down their carbines, and then, taking a cap from one of the bystanders, placed it on the Emperor's head. They then began to move forward. I asked the Grand Duke whether he would allow the bearers to carry the Emperor into the nearest house for the purpose of applying bandages to the wounded parts. The Emperor, who had evidently regained his consciousness, on hearing this, whispered in broken language, 'Carry—to—Palace; there—die,' and some few more words which were unintelligible. The Emperor was then placed on Colonel Dvortjetsky's sledge and driven to the palace."

THE NUMBER OF THE WOUNDED.

The wounded and injured by the two explosions number eighteen, of whom two, a Cossack of the escort and a young man, have since died. The others are Police-Colonel Dvorjetsky, who received various, some say sixty, flesh wounds; a marine subaltern, wounded in the head and arms; three soldiers of the imperial convoy and two cossacks of the Tver Squadron, slightly wounded; also a subaltern of the suite and two policemen, three peasants, a soldier's wife, injured in the right hand; a captain of cavalry, not much hurt; and M. young widow busily employed at her loom weaving black silk. On her husband's death, two years ago, she had the energy to get a loom (having learned silk weaving in her youth), and thus she supports herself and two little ones. In the small apartment the loom and the bedstead occupy the whole space save a narrow passage between the two, and here the three have to live as best they can. When first discovered, some weeks ago, she was sitting with her two little ones, without fire or food, having no work. At present she is happy, having a piece in hand, for which she is paid 7½d. per yard, and three yards is the utmost she can weave in a day; besides it takes a day and a half to prepare the woof, and for this there is no allowance, hence her earnings are about 1s. 6d. a day. We were glad to find that she is at present anxiously inquiring the way of life.

ONE OF THE LORD'S POOR.

Further on, we found match-box makers, unemployed laborers, laundresses, etc., in various shades of poverty, and we closed our day by visiting an aged saint, whose testimony and happy face were quite a cheer to us after our day's experiences. Sixty-eight years of age, she had had sixteen children, has survived all but three, two of whom are in a foreign land, and one is in the hospital almost a permanent patient. She never wants, for "the Lord's people are so good to me, and I thank Him for it." Although only a few yards from the Tabernacle, she can seldom venture out of her lonely room, but "I never weary, for oh! the Lord does talk to me."

So with a peep into this saint's upper chamber we concluded our painful day's work.

A FAITH ORPHANAGE IN INDIA.

THE lowest estimates put the number of deaths that occurred in the awful famine that devastated South India four years ago at three millions. For two years after the drought was over very many little children, Hindoos and Mohammedans, who had been made orphans by the famine wandered about the towns, exciting the sympathy of the benevolent. A gentleman in the Government service, by name Mr. A. C. Davis, who was stationed at Goolburga, in the Native State known as the Nizam's Dominions, took four of these little orphans into his charge. He was a man who feared God, and he remembered that "he that honoreth his Maker hath mercy on the poor." *

An American missionary, the Rev. C. B. Ward, who had gone out to the South India Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church from Chicago in 1876, had his heart touched by that example, and the two men decided, after prayer and consultation, that if the Lord would give them means they would do all in their power to rescue, feed, and clothe a larger number of the starving children.

That memorable step was taken on the 20th of February, 1879. We will give the rest of the story mainly in Mr. Ward's own words: "It was a precious time of waiting, during which our motives were thoroughly sifted and the will of God was more fully ascertained. One month ended March 20th, and on that date I received from an old friend and older missionary a letter containing ten rupees for this work, which was to my heart an evident token of the will of God. So I went to Adonee, where was a famine 'camp,' and there, beneath the trees and elsewhere, were a host of over 800 of all ages. About 200 were children, one half of whom were parentless and friendless. Bad feet, ulcered legs, diseased bodies, forms so emaciated as to be scarce able to stand or walk, were the rule.

"On the ground there was a little ridge of eight inches in height: I observed a large number moving over this ridge, but being unable to lift a foot so high, they would sit down and then swing over. The cries of this famishing throng were such as I care not often to hear. While I was there five dead bodies were rolled up in blankets and carried away.

"I decided to bring away five children, aged about five to eight. But my heart yielded: I took five more. I could not yet stop; so I selected four more. How to feed so many I did not know; but I thought of John 15:7, and led my fourteen orphans to the railway station, and brought them to Goolburga, where Brother Davis already had four. Afterward we got two more; and after much prayer and assurance received from the Lord, we resolved to increase the number of our orphans to fifty.

"So I visited Adonee again, and selected thirty more little children, ranging from three to nine years old. And yet there were more than as many more, all crying with outstretched arms, 'Take me.' My heart bled because I could not.

"On the 17th of June we had 200 rupees—that is, $100—cash balance, and felt we were not being loyal to the Lord in not gathering a few more children. We hunted all through the Word of God concerning 'the fatherless,' 'the poor,' and 'God's possessions.' Our hearts burned over what we found. When we thought how easily God fed two millions for forty years in the wilderness, we were led to praise God and trust Him gladly for one hundred orphans.

"Nearly 800 rupees had been sent us by the end of June, mostly by unknown friends. We were by this the more certain the money came from God. We did not intend to amass money. So as God enlarged our supply, we felt led to enlarge our borders. We then asked the Lord to make it possible for us to gather two hundred orphans. I am not sure but that three times that number were to be found, hungry, naked, sick, and dying between Sholapoor and Bellary. One result of the work upon our people along the line was that several families were led to take one or more little ones to rear in their own houses.

"God gave these children a disposition somewhat unusual to appreciate what was being done for them. They tried to help themselves. They suggested the dismissal of the paid cook, and did all their own grinding and cooking, etc. Brother Davis spent an hour a day with them, explaining to them the Hindoostanee Testament. He sat down on the ground, and all these little creatures sat round him as eager to hear as ever I saw mission children at home.

"By the middle of October we had 116—48 girls and 68 boys—and we had lost by death fifty-eight. We rejoiced that they had died with us, having had Christian care and heard the name of Jesus, and many of them having learned His prayer, rather than that they had died among the heathen and without ever having heard the name of Jesus, had been bundled off and dumped indifferently into a hole sufficiently shallow for the jackals to uncover the first night. The survivors showed the lingering effects of famine on their little frames.

"Our hearts were sad to see the heathen trinkets many of the girls wore. Some of them had them when we gathered them; others had got them somehow since being with us. They were of no money value. But one Sabbath morning, when the children were all gathered for their usual Bible hour, Brother Davis began to talk of the necessity of being Christians out and out. The matter of bangles, earrings, nose-jewels, etc., was barely mentioned when one of the noblest of our Adonee trophies, a girl about twelve years old, came to me with all she had and put them in my lap.

"The example was good. Without a word of exhortation every girl in the flock, save one, came and put her bangles, earrings, finger-rings, and nose-jewels into my hands. The other did so the following morning, just as freely as the rest had done.

"By the month of December over 1800 rupees had been sent to us in answer to prayer. On several occasions we had nothing, and a prayer-meeting had to be held on the spot; but deliverance always came. It is sometimes keen work to just let go and trust; but it is blessed to do so. Attempts were made by natives of the place to excite distrust in the minds of the children, and a few did run away. The children were told that we were fattening them up to make them into carriage grease for the railway.

"In the same month of December we received a letter from Brother W. Marrett, Executive Engineer, Department of Public Works, in the northern division of the Nizam's Dominions, inviting our orphanage and all to some point in his division, where he might get us land for a plantation. He said a Teloogoo mission was in his faith.* Right on this came orders from the Government for Brother Davis to proceed to Brother Marrett's division for duty.

"Now did my heart rejoice with new joy. That was to me a month of much examination of heart and thorough consecration to be led of God. On the 10th of January I presented to my presiding elder, W. B. Osborn,† a written offer of myself as a pioneer worker in a purely faith mission to the Teloogoo people of the Nizam's Dominions, in connection with our orphanage.

"My request was granted, and in my joy I asked God to justify my faith by a manifest token. It came in the form of 240 rupees from a man in Michigan, through Brother Hard,‡ about the last days of January. Satan tried hard to distress me with doubts on financial scores. But blessed be God who honoreth our faith, there is infinitely more danger of our getting short in grace than bread. We confess that our success depends on the power of God."

Such is the story of the Christian Orphanage established under a Mohammedan government, and now growing up and increasing without any endowment or any pledged financial support. The staff of faith workers has been strengthened by the addition of Miss Mary M. Miller, a consecrated young lady of Pennsylvania, who was sent out by the Rev. Wm. Taylor, the founder of the South India Conference. She studied homœopathy in Pittsburg, and is of great service in the Orphanage.

We will close with two extracts from Mr. Davis' diary:

"June 12th.—I have been preserving my own account separate from that of the Orphanage. The grain-seller's bill amounted to a larger sum than usual, and fell due to-day; and no Orphanage money on hand. The question at once arose, Was it to be met from my private funds? While praying over the matter it was made very plain that I should share my portion with the fatherless. I praise God His Word prevailed, and after paying a few bills of my own I was able to pay the bill to the last rupee.

"August 24th.—To-day one girl named Golar Numuckah, aged twelve, died. Her brother had died a few days before, much refreshed by her simple faith. Brother C. asked her where she was going, when she expressed a fear she might not live. She said, 'Into Mahdava's house'—i.e., God's house. 'How do you know you are going to Mahdava's house?' 'Because you told me,' she replied. A day later she passed away. Another one being questioned, said, 'I have asked God's forgiveness, and prayed that God may give me a better heart.'"

Six of the children were taken to Ellichpoor by the Rev. Mr. Sibley, formerly of Oberlin, Ohio. He says: "When they stopped at Budnaira, the station master was much astonished to see them get up and give thanks before eating. As hungry as they often are now, they wait patiently for grace. They reached here at one o'clock in the morning, and after we had put them to bed, I heard them praying, little Murga leading. It surprised me. I had thought of it, but supposed they knew nothing about praying. My heart glows with the thought that each of them may be a redeemed soul in glory."

* Prov. 14:31.

* There are three races of natives in that part of India; Moosulmans, Teloogoos, and Canarese. Mr. Marrett's division is in the Teloogoo territory. The orphans had been gathered from all the three races. Hindoostanee is the language of the Moosulmans.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Nomination to the Collectorship of the port of New York is still the prominent subject of speculation. The office is one of considerable pecuniary value as well as of political influence; but the office itself, and this particular nomination of the President's, is not so much the question involved as whether it is an indication of the policy of the administration. There appears to be no dispute as to the eligibility of Senator Robertson for the office, or about the probability of his efficient management of the strictly official duties pertaining to it; but the difficulty is as to the motive which prompted the nomination. If the President simply desired to reward a man who did him real and valuable service at Chicago, then there is little significance in it. If on the other hand it is intended as an act of defiance to the "stalwart" section of the Republican party on the part of the President or Secretary of State, then it bodes ill for the prospect of useful legislation for the ensuing four years; and we may again witness as under Mr. Hayes, personal and party contests absorbing legislative attention, to the exclusion of work of national importance. Patriotic citizens have no desire to see the President become the tool of a party or the section of a party, but they naturally hoped to have seen the President and those politicians who exerted themselves to secure his election working harmoniously together for the general good. It will be a national misfortune if the struggle over the spoils of victory produces discord and enmity between the administration and its ostensible friends.

The Effort of the Citizens of New York to Remove the hindrances to street-cleaning is being persistently followed up. A vigorous opposition has been encountered at Albany, which at one time threatened to defeat the movement and permit a continuance of the present system, with all the inconveniences and perils it involves. Besides the attack on the system now waged at Albany, two assaults have been made at headquarters. Mayor Grace has cited the Commissioners to appear before him on April 12th and show cause why they should not be removed from office, and the Grand Jury have made a presentment in which they say, at the conclusion of specific charges: "We are convinced that the administration of the Street Cleaning Department has been inefficient, and in some cases corrupt, and that upon the Commissioners of Police themselves chiefly rests the responsibility for this state of affairs."

The Mayor's citation is equally unequivocal and emphatic, and consists of eleven specifications, in which details of negligence are stated. The entire list is summed up in the final charge, which is that the commissioners have "negligently, inefficiently, and illegally administered the affairs of their office." It may be hoped that now there is a possibility of the long-anticipated reform being realized. The question is one having more than a merely local interest; New York is the centre of the nation's commercial life, and the dangers with which the city is menaced, would, if they overtook it, be felt throughout the land.

The Time of the Senate During the Past week was mainly occupied with debates growing out of the ill-feeling produced by the position assumed by Senator Mahone. A noteworthy feature of the contentions has been the assumption that Senator Mahone's course has been adopted in compliance with the terms of a bargain, in which the Senator undertook to support the Republican party in organizing the Senate in return for the control of a certain section of patronage. Whether such an arrangement exists or not, events may decide, but the fact of the suspicion existing at all is nothing less than a national humiliation. That the people and even Senators themselves should think it possible that a man occupying so distinguished a position as that of United States Senator—a position more honorable than any political office in the country below that of President and Vice-President—would be capable of bartering his vote, indicates how low is the prevalent moral standard at Washington. Such a bargain could only have been made with the consent of men whose character ought to be above suspicion, and patriots of all parties are reluctant to entertain it, in spite of the positive assertions of prominent politicians.

An Anti-Lynching Law which Strikes at the root of the evil has been passed by the Tennessee Legislature. It punishes with loss of office any sheriff who allows a prisoner to be taken from his custody and lynched; it also provides that the sheriff shall thereafter be ineligible for any public office. This bill, we may hope, will become law, and be strictly enforced. There is no excuse for the lawless proceedings which have become a national scandal. The culprits lynched generally belong to a class of criminals which the law would certainly punish, and it is better even that such a criminal should occasionally evade punishment than that the spirit of lawlessness should go on unchecked through society.

Secretary of the Treasury Windom Paid a Visit to New York last week to consult with the bankers and Wall Street financiers on refunding operations. The question debated, it was understood, related to the rate of the bonds to be sold in order to realize means to retire the six per cent outstanding bonds. There is some hesitation between four and a half per cent bonds and four per cents of a little longer period. An impression prevailed that the latter would have a better reception in the markets. It is difficult to see the advantage of selecting a Secretary of the Treasury from the West if he takes his policy from New York.

Boycotting in New York.—It was Proposed at a meeting held in New York last week to introduce the process which in Ireland has become known as Boycotting, and arrangements were made by the appointment of a committee to carry the resolution into effect. A large number of house-owners in the city have raised their rents, in some cases thirty, and in some fifty per cent. Boycotting was proposed as a retaliatory measure, and the members of the association inaugurated agreed neither to work for any owner so proscribed or to rent a house of him. In consideration of the increased cost of living, mechanics have agitated for an advance of wages, and have in some cases been successful. Bricklayers now earn $3.50 per day. It would seem from some of the speeches made, that the anti-rent ideas prevalent in Ireland are held extensively on this side of the Atlantic.

The Trial of the Two Steamboat Inspectors on the charge of manslaughter in connection with the boiler explosion on the Seawanhaka on June 28th, 1880, commenced March 28th. The Grand Jury had presented an indictment in which "it was alleged that the defendants had given a false certificate of the steamer and her equipment, and that that false certificate was the authority under which the boat was navigated. The indictment contained nine counts, and the Government promised to show that the certificate was false in every particular; that the boilers were in a bad and dangerous condition, were unsafe to be used, and were in that condition when the certificate was granted. That the iron was so exceedingly thin that it was not of sufficient strength to answer for a second-class stove-pipe in a tenement house; that the upper fire door in a direct line with the fire was full of holes; that there was, therefore, no protection, and that the flames must issue on the slightest back draught. One of the experts, it was stated, would testify that he had frequently cut up for scrap iron better boilers than the Seawanhaka's, and that if he had been inspecting those boilers with the intention of purchasing them for old iron he could not have been deceived as to their condition at the time the inspectors state they inspected them, and that the boilers should have been condemned three years before the disaster." The details of that dreadful disaster have not been forgotten by the public. The owners who used boilers in the condition described, and the officials whose duty it was to protect the people from the results of cupidity and carelessness, but who, it is alleged, neglected that duty, must, if they are possessed of ordinary humanity, have suffered deep remorse.

Serious Losses by Floods are Reported from Nebraska. A dispatch to the Inter-Ocean from Omaha, Neb., says: "The Platte valley about 75 miles west of this place is the scene of the most disastrous flood experienced in the history of the Union Pacific Railroad. The Platte is a broad and shallow stream, which easily overflows its banks. All its tributaries are now pouring vast volumes of water and ice into it, and it has become a rushing flood, overflowing the level prairies for miles on either side. The freshet which has done most damage occurred March 26th, when an immense ice gorge in the Loup River, which is a tributary of the Platte, broke, and let loose the accumulation of water and ice. The damage done will probably reach several hundred thousand dollars, and fears are entertained of loss of life. When news of the flood was received at United States headquarters here, warning was telegraphed to the towns below on the Platte. People took refuge on the roofs of the houses. Barns and fences were carried away, and all the stock drowned. The $50,000 bridge at Columbus was washed away.

A Panic Occurred in the Union Square Theatre, New York, on Saturday, April 2d, which, but for the presence of mind of the officials, might have rivalled in disastrous results the memorable Brooklyn catastrophe. Smoke was observed issuing from the flooring during an interval in the performance, and soon a young man leaped to his feet and ran toward the door with a loud shout of "Fire! fire!" The first effect of this was to bring the entire audience to their feet, and an instant of the most profound silence ensued. Then a fearful spectacle was witnessed as the united mass of ladies and gentlemen, forgetting age or sex, rushed in terror down the aisles and fought to gain the street. Those who had the courage to pause for a moment and survey the scene say it was heartrending. Weak women, incumbered with silken wraps, stumbled and fell under the feet of the stampeding mob, crying out to their terror-stricken escorts for help. Ultimately order was obtained, and extra doors opened by which all the audience escaped alive, though many were shaken and bruised in the struggle. The prompt arrival of several fire-engines saved the building from destruction. The arrangements for producing brilliant spectacles and the method of construction necessitated by the requirements of the theatre render those buildings peculiarly liable to fire. The recent catastrophe at Nice and the narrow escape of the Union Square audience should be a warning to theatre-goers that besides the moral dangers of the amusement, there are also physical dangers to be encountered in it.

A New Serial Story will be Commenced in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and continued from week to week. The title is "James Graham's Bush Life in Australia."

An Article by the Rev. George Müller, of Bristol, England, on the Second Coming of Christ, was published in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD (No. 13, March 31st). Copies should be ordered through newsdealers.

The Proposed International Cotton Exposition at Atlanta, Ga., in October, November, and December, has met with cordial support in New York. Circulars were sent out inviting subscriptions to $25,000 of the stock, which is New York City's quota, but in a very short time over $30,000 was handed in. Several gentlemen have signified their intention to make a trip to Atlanta with their families during the exposition, which will be held at the most pleasant time of the year in that section, and to take advantage of the opportunity to attend the celebration of the battle of Yorktown, which takes place in October. It may be hoped that the exposition will be not only beneficial to the South, but the means of promoting good-will and friendly feeling between all the sections of the country.

"Is Self-Denial Compulsory?" is a Question which a minister discusses in the Independent. His remarks are directed to the subject of total abstinence and to the methods adopted by some of its advocates. This criticism should not discourage any temperance worker. Individual self-denial in the matter of intoxicating drinks is on a higher level than that of compulsion. A Christian, or even a philanthropist who is not a Christian, observing the extent of misery caused by intoxicating liquor, is prompted to an effort to stem the evil. If he sees that his own abstinence may aid in so good a work he does not usually inquire if the self-denial is "compulsory."

An Intending Suicide was recently Providentially arrested on his way to the river by a shower of rain. The incident was narrated at the Fulton Street prayer-meeting last Thursday. He was on his way to the ferry to jump off the pier and drown. He had determined to commit suicide, for he was in despair about his evil habits and the power they had over him. On the way the rain began to pour, and notwithstanding his intended watery grave, he sought shelter from the rain in a lighted hall which he noticed close at hand. In that hall the Gospel was being preached, and the spirit of God arrested the man that night and laid him under deep conviction of sin, and he soon after found pardon and peace in Christ.

A Lady's Life was Saved by the Presence of mind of her young brother, on March 18th, on the New London Northern Railroad. She had been visiting her sister, and in order to save time in returning had decided to walk along the railroad track, thereby shortening the distance to her home. Her brother, a boy of fourteen years of age, accompanied her. They had to cross a bridge on their way, and just as they entered it a train was heard approaching at the rate of forty miles an hour. The lady stood paralyzed by fear, but her brother, seeing her danger, seized her and dragged her to the parapet of the bridge and there held her in a fainting condition till the train had passed. Happy would it be for many a walker on the dangerous paths of life if a strong hand could snatch them away before destruction came upon them. Too often no human power can do that, and they neglect to appeal to the almighty help of Jesus.

A Brave Struggle for Life is Described in the Herald of Helena, M. T. Three men started with the mails from Fort Fetterman, on the Upper North Platte River, for Rock Creek station, on the Union Pacific Railroad. The snow was falling fast and drifting badly, and before they had reached the twenty-two mile station they had completely lost the trail, and the horses were suffered to wander about guided only by their own instinct. After a time they left the buckboard behind them and endeavored to push forward on horseback. At one point one of them was nearly killed by his horse, which fell backward into a snowdrift eight feet deep. After this the horses were abandoned and the men struggled along on foot, hands, faces, and feet being badly frozen. They plodded on, sometimes only keeping a footing by throwing their coats on ahead to step upon, until, when the third night set in they began calling for help, and in half an hour or so were answered. Again and again they called, and finally a light was seen; and in an hour and a half they made the last quarter of a mile, finding themselves at the stage station, twenty-five miles from the starting point. The driver had to be dragged the last quarter of a mile, and says: "When I knew I was safe it seemed impossible for me to walk. I fell down twice in making the last few yards from the stable. I had no strength to walk, and after entering the barn I could not eat." That journey will never be forgotten by either of the three. The weary struggle maintained until at last their cries were answered is a type of the spiritual experience of some who have wandered far from God, and have tried to save themselves. The light that has been seen in response to the weary sinner's cry is even more welcome to him than the material light was to the tired travellers.

A Strange Death Caused by Beer-Drinking is reported from Canton, Ohio. A telegram received at Cincinnati on March 28th says: "Last night James Little, a strong, healthy young man, died at a boarding-house near the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago depot, from the effects of drinking beer. While holding a glass of beer to his lips he was suddenly attacked by a violent fit of gasping for breath, his head hanging down on his breast. The inmates of the room took him outside into the fresh air, but in a few moments he was a corpse. A post-mortem was held, and the coroner reported all the organs in unimpaired condition. The mode of death was decidedly unusual. The cold beer which he drank partly paralyzed the stomach, and before the beer became of a proper temperature to be absorbed into the system it began to ferment, causing a formation of carbonic acid gas. The gas gradually overpowered the heart, lungs, and brain, and paralyzed the entire nervous system, producing death.

A Fatal Necklace was Suspended on a Man's neck on April 1st. He was engaged in making dynamite cartridges in the engine-house at Heidelberg Slope, near Wilkesbarre, Pa., and had hung the cartridges as he finished them on a string thrown around his neck. From some unexplained cause they suddenly exploded, killing the man instantly, and scattering fragments of his body in all directions. It is surprising that men familiar with the destructive properties of articles they are accustomed to handle, frequently grow as careless as those who are ignorant of the danger. The same characteristic is too often exemplified in religious concerns. Men who have been from their youth taught the deadly nature of sin, and have been acquainted with the way of salvation, are often more callous under the appeals of Christians than heathens who hear the Gospel for the first time. Of such it is said, "They shall be suddenly destroyed, and that without remedy" (Prov. 29 : 1).

A Physician's Bill was Paid in an Extraordinary way at Wheeling, W. Va., lately. An aged lady who had become reduced in circumstances and was very much depressed by apprehension of impending want, committed suicide on March 25th. She owed a bill of $17 to her physician, and having no money to discharge it, she executed a will bequeathing her body to him in payment. The strange mixture of regard for her obligations to man and her recklessness of the commands of God was manifested in a remarkable way, but the same characteristics displayed in other forms are by no means uncommon.

Mr. George S. Railton, the Salvation Army Commissioner, who has been recalled to England in consequence of the increased demands of the work on General Booth, the originator of the movement, sailed for Europe on March 24th. During his stay in this country he has been as far West and Southwest as Kansas and Texas, and visited most of our large cities West as well as East. Ten central posts of the army have been established in as many cities, and there are sixteen officers engaged, besides volunteer workers.

The Pernicious Habit of Opium Eating is Extending with alarming rapidity. A contemporary states that a village of 2000 population in Ohio has forty opium users; a village of 1200 population in Kentucky has over sixty; a village of 75 population in Illinois boasts of six; a village of 1500 in Illinois claims forty-two; another village in Illinois of 3500 has from 100 to 150. These figures indicate a very serious danger to society.

THE BELIEVER'S DEATHDAY BETTER THAN HIS BIRTHDAY.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Delivered March 3d, 1881.

"A good name is better than precious ointment; and the day of death than the day of one's birth."—Eccles. 7 : 1.

The Oriental Idea of Perfume—Superiority of a Good Name—What is a Good Name—Bad Names on Church Books—I. The Believer's Deathday Better than His Birthday—Because the End is Better than the Beginning of a Thing—The Beginning beset with Danger—With Uncertainty—II. Better than all His Happy Days—Coming of Age—Marriage Day—Days of Gain—Of Honor—Of Health—Of Social Friendship—The End of Natural Kinship—III. Better than all Holy Days—The Day of Conversion — Sabbaths — Communion Days — No Change of Nature at Death—Recognition of the Disembodied—The Same Spiritual Employment—The Same Company—A Dying Woman's Hope—A Christian Mother's Farewell—Death the End of Dying—The Day of Cure—The Beginning of Best Days—Don't Miss the Way.

In this part of the world we can hardly understand how much the Easterns thought of perfumes. When Solomon speaks of "precious ointment" he speaks of a luxury highly appreciated by those who heard him. Orientals delighted to anoint themselves with fragrant oil, and to pour upon their heads unguents full of perfume. We do not so—at any rate, not to the same lavish extent; but among the luxuries of eastern life was that of delighting the nostril with sweet smells.

When you understand that precious ointment, or sweet perfumed oil, was very precious to the Jew, first, because of the pleasure it gave to him and the healthy influence which he believed it exerted upon himself; next, because it made him pleasureable to others; and, next, because in its highest sacred sense it prepared him to come before God; you see why "precious ointment" was so much held in esteem. But Solomon says that a good name is better than that. I do not think he merely meant a good reputation; and yet it would be true if he referred only to an honorable character among his neighbors, for it is a good thing for a man to stand high in the esteem of his fellow-men, and he ought never to lose their respect except for one cause, namely, for the sake of standing in higher esteem before God.

Consider it spiritually, and, dear brethren,

WHAT IS A GOOD NAME?

A good name is a name that is written in the Lamb's book of life, and that is better than the sweetest of all ointments. Oh, that I may find my name recorded in some corner of the page among the sinners saved by grace. "A good name." Why, that must be a name written upon the breastplate of the great High Priest. If you could have gone up to the high priest of old you would have read there "Reuben," "Simeon," "Levi," "Judah," "Dan," "Gad," "Naphtali," and the like; and they were all good names when once they were engraven there.

What a blessed place to have your name inscribed—not upon a jewel that shall hang on the breast of a man, but upon the very heart of Jesus Christ your Lord. If you could see your name written on the palms of His hands you would say, "It is a good name that is written there. Blessed be the Lord that ever I had that name, insignificant as it is. Though it is a name that has been ridiculed, though it is a name that has been bandied about and kicked like a football through the world, yet it is a blessed name, for it is written on the palms of Jesus' hands." It is so if we are the Lord's own people, and are walking the walk of faith. Jesus says, "I have graven thee upon the palms of My hands."

Connected with this, I may say that a name that is written among the living in Zion is a good name. Oh, there is nothing like it. Some men are very anxious to get their names upon the roll of this club or of that, or of some wonderful secret society—or to get their names into the peerage. It is thought to be a wonderful thing to be a nobleman, though it is better far to be a noble man. But the best list of names on earth seems to me to be the list of the people of God. I should count it a higher honor to be inscribed on the church book of a humble company of baptized believers meeting in a barn than to wear a name imported by the Conqueror, and written in the roll of Battle Abbey. The pedigree of saintship confers honor such as angels recognize; all else they think little of.

You may be in the church and yet you may not have a good name as a member of it. I mean as to your own personal character as a Christian; for some professors are in the pot of ointment, but I wish we could pick them out, for they are flies, and they spoil everything. There are such in this church—oh that they had gone elsewhere! If they would but have flown into a pot of the world's honey, or something of that kind! But for them to get into the church's ointment is a great pity. May God grant that you and I may never be dead flies in the pot of ointment. Some get a name in the church for quarrelling and fault-finding. "Oh," people say, "if anybody can pick a hole in the sermon, I know who it is." You need only have half-a-dozen words with this crab-apple critic and you surely and speedily lose what enjoyment you have had during the service. Alas, that many Christian women have not a good name, for they are addicted to gossiping. A word to the wise on this matter will, I hope, be enough.

It is of persons who have this good character, and are known by the sweet savor of their lives, that the latter part of the text is spoken—"The day of death is better than the day of one's birth." It is possible that you may never die, since the Lord Jesus may suddenly come a second time; but if this should not occur in our day, we shall in due course fulfil our service and fall asleep. At this hour, ere yet the sand in the glass shall all be run, the long-expected Lord may suddenly appear in His glory; therefore let us stand ready, as men that wait for their Lord, with our loins girt and our lamps burning. But if he do not come for the next hundred years—and he may not, for our Lord has not committed to us a knowledge of the times and seasons—then we shall die; and in that case it is no small consolation that "the day of death is better than the day of one's birth."

I. First, then, our deathday is

and it is so for this among other reasons—"Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof."

When we are born we begin life, but what will that life be? Friends say, "Welcome, little stranger." Ah, but what kind of reception will the stranger get when he is no longer a new comer? Very likely he is not long in the world before he begins to feel the poverty of his parents, and perhaps the misery of an unholy home. A troop of infantile diseases are waiting around him; and the little candle that is newly lit is in great danger of being blown out. Infancy is a very dangerous passage for a tiny boat unfitted to bear rough buffetings. Those first few years are full of rocks and quicksands, and many scarce begin life before they end it.

Since the day of a believer's death is his time of triumph and of victory, it is better than the day of the first shot—the day of one's birth. When we were born we set out on our journey; but when we die we end our weary march in the Father's house above. Surely it is better to have come to the end of the tiresome pilgrimage than to have commenced it. We wave the handkerchief, and bid good-bye to those who start upon a long voyage and it is meet that they should be made as cheerful as they can be; but, surely, it is a better day when at last they reach their port, all danger over, and come to their desired haven. So, then, it is better to die than to begin to live, if we be indeed the Lord's people.

Better is the day of death than our birthday, because about the birthday there hangs uncertainty. I cannot tell you, good woman, what is to become of the little child who is pressed to your bosom this evening. God bless it, and make it a comfort to you, and an honor to His church! But it is all matter of hope as yet. Children are certain cares, they say, and uncertain blessings. I hardly like the phrase. They are blessings anyhow; but there is certainly this about them: we cannot tell what will become of them when they grow up and come under the influence of evil. You look upon a youth as he grows up, and you feel, "I cannot quite see what you will be. You may be led astray by temptation; or by divine grace you may cleanse your way. You may be useful and honorable; or you may be dissolute and degraded." Everything is uncertain about the child on his birthday; but everything is certain about the saint on his deathday.

So, too, in things which are certain the saint's deathday is preferable to the beginning of life, for we know that when the child is born he is born to sorrow. Whatever else is uncertain about him, we are quite sure that those little eyes will weep; that those little limbs will know weariness and pain; and that his little heart will be distracted sooner or later by many griefs. We know this, for "man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward."

But look, now, at the saint when he dies. It is absolutely certain that he has done with sorrow, done with pain. We know that they shall die no more; "they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." Now, surely, the day in which we are certain that sorrow is over must be better than the day in which we are certain that sorrow is on the road. For this reason we set up the headstone of the grave above the tablet which records the birth.

Ay, and this holds good about subsequent birthdays. It is wise thoughtfully and cheerfully to mark each birthday. It should be a holy day in every Christian's case—a day of grateful thanksgiving that we have come so far upon the road of life. It is a very blessed thing to sit down on the milestone and say, "Well, now, I have come twenty miles—thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, seventy miles of my journey. I shall never tread those miles over again. So many troubles are past: so many waves have risen that will never wash over me a second time; so many tossings to and fro I have endured, and I shall never feel them any more." There are still battles to fight, mountains to climb, dark nights in which one sighs for light; still temptation; still sin. Ay, but when we get to the day of one's death then the whole journey lies behind. It is all over now. On your coming to die there is nothing left to do but to die. All else is done. The battle is fought, and the victory is won for ever. Oh, is not that better than even the best birthday that we have ever had, good as they have been, and cause for thanksgiving as each one certainly has been?

I think, then, I need not dwell longer on this point. "The day of death is better than the day of one's birth."

II. Now I will give the same thoughts in another form. The day of death is to the believer

BETTER THAN ALL HIS HAPPY DAYS.

What were his happy days? I shall take him as a man, and I will pick out some days that are often thought to be happy. There is the day of a man's coming of age, when he feels that he is a man, especially if he has an estate to come into. That is a day of great festivity. You have seen pictures of "Coming of age in the olden time," when the joy of the young squire seemed to spread itself over all the tenants and all the farm laborers: everybody rejoiced. Ah, that is all very well, but when believers die they do in a far higher sense come of age, and enter upon their heavenly estates.

Speak of heirs, of heirs coming into their estates! Why, our day of death shall be such a day as that. What a jubilee day it will be! If we were really in our senses the thought of fearing death would be ridiculous. No young man is afraid of coming to be one-and-twenty. No; he says, "Fly away, fly away, days and nights. I shall be glad to get out of my nonage, out of my infancy, and to come into my full manhood, and into possession of everything." So might we say, "Fly away, years! Come, grey hairs. Fly away, years, and bring me into possession of things which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, which God hath prepared for them that love Him."

Another very happy day with a man is the day of his marriage: who does not rejoice then? What cold heart is there which does not beat with joy on that day? But on the day of death we shall enter more fully into the joy of our Lord, and into that blessed marriage union which is established between Him and ourselves. Then we shall enter into the guest-chamber where the supper is to be spread, and we shall wait a while with joy, the bridegroom being with us, till the word shall be given, and the trumpet note shall ring out, and then we shall sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb, not to look at his guests, but to be ourselves part and parcel of that blessed bride, the Lamb's wife, in whom Christ finds all His heart's content.

There are days with men in business that are happy days, because they are days of gain. They get some sudden windfall, they prosper in business, or perhaps there are long months of prosperity in which all goes well with them, and God is giving them the desires of their heart. But, oh, beloved, there is no gain like the gain of our departure to the Father; the greatest of all gains is that which we shall know when we pass out of the world of trouble into the land of triumph.

There are days of honor, brethren, when a man is promoted in office, or receives applause from his fellow-men. But what that will be, if we are carried by angels into Abraham's bosom! Our honorable escort will manifest how highly the Lord thinks of us. Oh, the honors that will be heaped upon the saints when they shall be recognized in glory as brethren of Christ, heirs of God, joint heirs with the Redeemer!

Days of health are happy days, too. But what health can equal the perfect wholeness of a spirit in whom the good Physician has displayed His utmost skill? Days of recovery from sickness are happy days: but, oh, to be clean recovered—to go where "the inhabitant shall no more say, I am sick." When Jehovah Rophi shall restore our whole spirit to perfectness then will a new gladness take possession of us.

We enjoy very happy days of social friendship, when hearts warm with hallowed intercourse, when one can sit a while with a friend, or rest in the midst of one's family. Yes, but no day of social enjoyment will match the day of death. Some of us expect to meet troops of blessed ones that have gone home long ago, whom we never shall forget. We have priceless friends over yonder, and the bliss of reunion will be sweet. Some of you old people have more friends in heaven than you have on earth; you may forget all sorrow as to those you will leave in the joy of meeting those with whom you will be united again. What family greetings there will be! Mother has gone; father has gone; uncles and aunts that were in the Lord, and brothers and sisters too, are all gone before: and all these are waiting for us, and we shall soon be in full fellowship with them.

Best of all, He has gone before whom our hearts love, and who is more to us than brother, sister, and mother. Oh, the bliss of meeting with our risen Lord! Oh, the joy of meeting in Him all that are truly our own kin! The saints will meet around the throne, an unbroken family; not one of God's children will be away. We shall have no brothers or sisters who will not be there.

"Oh," say you, "I am afraid that we have some who are still unconverted, and who will not be there." They will not be your brothers and sisters then. Ties of merely natural kinship will come to an end; only spiritual relationship will last and survive. We shall have none to mourn over; our kindred will all be in glory. Those that were truly related to us in the bonds of everlasting life shall all be there.

III. In the third place, going a step farther, the day of a believer's death is BETTER THAN HIS HOLY DAYS.

I think that the best holy day I ever spent (yes, I think I must put it as high as that), was the day of my conversion. There was a novelty and freshness about that first day which made it like the day in which a man first sees the light after having been long blind. My conversion day, shall I ever forget it?—when my heart began to beat with spiritual life, and the lungs of my soul began to heave with prayer, and the hands of my soul were stretched out to grasp my Lord, and the eyes of my soul beheld His beauty. Ay, that was a very blessed sight, but what will it be to see Him face to face? What will the first five minutes in heaven be? Surely those dawning moments will be forever remembered, and spoken of by holy beings as they commune with one another concerning their delights.

Since then we have known many blessed days; our Sabbaths, for instance. We can never give up the Lord's day. Precious and dear unto my soul are those sweet rests of love—days that God has hedged about to make them His own, that they may be ours. A young man said to me yesterday, when he came to join the church, "I often wish that all the week was made up of Sundays." I thought, "Yes, and so do I," only I could not always be preaching. I should want to come down and take a turn at hearing; although it is always precious to talk about God's word. Oh, our blessed Sabbaths! Well, there is this about the day of one's death—we shall then enter upon an eternal Sabbath. We shall go "Where congregations ne'er break up,

And Sabbaths have no end."

Our communion days have been very holy days. It has been very sweet to sit at the Lord's table, and have fellowship with Jesus in the breaking of bread and the drinking of wine; but sweeter far will it be to commune with Him in the paradise above, and that we shall do on the day of our death. I might go on mentioning all our holy days one after another; but which ever you should select as the season of your highest joy on earth I should say of the best of them, "Yes, but the day of one's death, as ushering us into a higher and holier state, is better than any of those days."

Those days have been good, I am not going to depreciate them, but to bless the Lord for every one of them. When we say that a second thing is "better," it is supposed that the first thing has some goodness about it. Ay, and our holy days on earth have been good; fit rehearsals of the jubilee beyond the river. When you and I enter heaven, it will not be going from bad to good, but from good to better. The change will be remarkable, but it will not be so great a change as thoughtless persons would imagine.

First, there will be no change of nature. The same nature which God gave us when we were regenerated—the spiritual nature—is that which will enjoy the heavenly state. I shall be the same man there that I am here; and I have not the slightest doubt that

YOU WILL KNOW ME.

At any rate, you will be bigger fools in heaven than you are here if you do not. Did I hear some one reply, "We shall not know you in the disembodied state, for here we only recognize you by your outward appearance?" I answer, Many of you know me in another manner than after the flesh; you not only know me by my looks; but you know my spirit. If I could get out of my body, and I could not use a voice, but yet could influence your spirits by my spirit, you would know my spirit. You know what spirit I am of. I will not try to describe myself, but you know me. I know you do. Nobody is exactly like me in some traits of character: each one stands alone.

Nobody is exactly like you, dear friend; so that there will be peculiar points by which to distinguish man from man. We shall know each other certainly. Yes, and we shall be the same persons; and when our bodies rise they will be the same bodies. "Every seed its own body,"—changed and perfected, but still preserving its identity. On earth we have had good days, because we have had a good nature given us by the Holy Spirit, and we shall possess the same nature above, only more fully grown and purged from all that hinders it.

We shall follow the same employments above as we have followed here. "Oh dear," says one, "I hope not. I do not want to work hard there as I have had to do here." No, perhaps not; but I mean the employments of our spirits will be similar to what they have been while we have been in the world. Oh, yes; He has something for me to do up there, and for you to do, too. You active-spirited ones, you shall find an intense delight in continuing to do the same things as to spirit as you do here, namely, adoring and magnifying and spreading abroad the saving name of Jesus in whatever place you may be.

We shall certainly possess the same enjoyments. for our richest enjoyments as saints are found in fellowship with Christ and with one another, and we shall have these above. We shall live upon Christ. We shall rejoice in God there as we do here. And there is one thing I like to think of—we shall have the same company. I was visiting a poor old woman who was near to death, and she said to me "One thing makes me feel quite safe about where I am going; I believe that I shall go to my own company; and for the last sixty years I have never had any company but the Lord's people; and if a stranger has come in here, and begun to talk about worldly things in a carnal way, I have wished him gone. I said to myself, 'The Lord won't take me away from my own people. Surely He will let me go where they go; and if I go where those people go that I love, I know that I shall be happy.'"

So, dying believer, you will not change company; only the company will be all improved, and you will be improved as much as any of them. It will be the same company, and this makes it look so much like going home. The day of our death has nothing so very strange and mysterious about it as to make us fear it. You and I ought to live like people who, when they hear a knock at the door, do not go into fits at the startling sound. Some people are terribly alarmed at a knock or a ring because they have not paid their rent, and they are afraid that somebody is after them for money. You and I have paid our debts, or rather, they have been all paid for us. The Lord Jesus Christ has set us free; and when death comes and knocks at our door, all that we shall have to do will be to answer the summons and go with God's messenger at once.

Our friends will say, "He is gone;" and if we have lived so that we have had a good name, that is better than precious ointment; they will know where we have gone; and if they lament on that account they will be very foolish, for they ought rather to say, "Thank God that our friends have entered into their joy and rest." There was a dear mother, a woman of great faith, who loved her daughter very much, but she loved her Lord more, and when her dear daughter was dying she kissed her, and said to her, "My dear girl, you will be in heaven within a few hours, and I congratulate you. The thought of your joy fills me with joy concerning you, and I cannot weep. I congratulate you, and wish I was going with you." Let us think of death after that holy manner.

IV. I have not time to finish my sermon. At least, I have time to finish it, but not to continue it as long as I would. I was going to say, in the fourth place, that the day of a saint's death is because his days here are days of dying. The moment we begin to live we commence to die.

"Every beating pulse we tell Leaves but the number less."

Death is the end of dying. On the day of the believer's death dying is for ever done with. The saints who are with God shall never die any more. Life is wrestling, struggling; but death is the end of conflict: it is rest—victory. Life is full of sinning. Blessed be God, death is the end of that; no transgression or iniquity shall follow us into heaven. Life is longing, sighing, crying, pining, desiring. Heaven is enjoying, possessing, delighting one's self in God. This life is failure, disappointment, regret. Such emotions are all over when the day of death comes, for glory dawns upon us, with its satisfaction and intense content.

The day of our death will be the day of our cure. There are some diseases which, in all probability, some of us never will get quite rid of till the last Physician comes, and He will settle the matter. One gentle touch of His hand, and we shall be cured for ever. All infirmities, as well as sicknesses, will vanish in our last hours. Blind sister, you will have your eyes. You that have lost your hearing shall listen to the songs of angels, and enter into the most refined of their harmonies. You who must limp to your graves shall dance by-and-by. Infirmities you shall have none. Death will also be the cure of old age. No doctor can help you about that; but this doctor will end all. You shall renew your youth like the eagle's.

Our deathday will be the loss of all losses. Life is made up of losses, but death loses losses. Life is full of crosses, but death is the cross that brings crosses to an end. Death is the last enemy, and turns out to be the death of every enemy.

Dear friends, put all your days together; they shall not equal that last day which shall be to you the beginning of days of another sort. The day of our death is the beginning of our best days. Sometimes even that part of a dying day which is spent on earth is the best that the dying believer has ever lived. I have seen believers die, and if anything can convince a man of the reality of religion, of the truth of the Scriptures, and of the power of the Spirit, it is the death of saints. I have seen many persons who seemed to be as much dying of their joy as of their disease, they were so happy. Their eyes, their face, their whole bearing were those of persons in whom the utmost pain was forgotten in an excess of joy, while weakness was swallowed up in the delights of the heaven which was dawning upon them.

I believe that angels come and meet certain departing ones, that they come trooping outside the gate, and that dying ones frequently see that which is supernatural. I am not dreaming. I believe that they actually see what eye hath not seen, and that there comes upon them a light which is neither of the sun, nor of the moon. At any rate, they speak words of wondrous import. Dying children have spoken words which certainly they never learnt, for none have ever heard the like before; and other departing ones have uttered words of rapture and ecstacy and almost delirium of bliss; for Christ has come to them, and they have seen the King in His beauty, even in the borderland before they have crossed the river and entered into Canaan. "Is this to die?" said one. "Well, then," said he, "it is worth while to live even to enjoy the bliss of dying."

And then that later part of the day which is spent among the angels! They breakfast with Christ on earth, but they sup with Him in heaven.

OH, THAT EVENTIDE OF THE DAY!

Then to think that it shall be without end: for ever happy, for ever triumphant, and for ever more and more so; for "from glory unto glory" makes us look for progress even there. We shall rise from seeing Christ to seeing Him yet more, and to discovering more and more beauties in Him; we shall ascend from one perfection to another perfection; from fulness up to our capacity to an enlarged capacity and an equal fulness; from glory unto glory; from sunlight to Godlight; from Godlight to the light of God yet more received and enjoyed.

There! I cannot go farther. Good night "till the day break and the shadows flee away;" and then you and I will know in ten minutes more than all the bench of bishops could tell us in a year. You will know more in half a second than I could tell you if I were to keep you here the livelong night. Only mind you do not miss the way, one of you. Mind you do not miss the way! Turn to the right, by the cross, and keep straight on. God lead you by His Holy Spirit.

MADELINE, THE SEWING-GIRL.

"RAIN, rain, rain! What a long, lonely day this has been!" sighed a weary-looking girl, as she glanced from her window into the dreariness without.

In smoky London, up five fights of stairs, in a small attic room, sat Madeline Stuart. Yearningly, almost tearfully, she gazed into the distance—

Above the cross on St. Paul's Church."

All alone in the world was she—a poor sewing-girl, alone in London; and yet she did not feel alone. Those threatening clouds in yonder sky were but a veil between her and her mother, and heaven was very near to Madeline Stuart. Slowly she folded her work, drew down the little white curtain, and put on her bonnet and faded shawl.

"I am glad I've finished this work to night," she said softly to herself, as she tied the bundle, "for Mrs. Arden will surely pay me."

Swiftly she walked through the muddy streets until she reached the handsome mansion in Burlington Street. A trim-looking women opened the door in response to her ring, and ushered her into the comfortable drawing-room. A few moments followed, and then the rustle of silk on the stairs, the door was pushed ajar, and in swept the stately Mrs. Arden.

"You are very prompt to-night, my dear," she observed with one of her most patronizing smiles; "I hope you have not slighted your work in your haste to finish it."

"Not at all, ma'am," answered Madeline Stuart, advancing towards the lady, and laying the work in her hands.

"Very well: I will not stop to examine it now, as I have a pressing engagement to meet at seven, and it lacks but five minutes to that hour. Call to-morrow night for your pay, please, and perhaps I may have more work for you." Mrs. Arden touched the bell and a servant showed Madeline to the door.

"What a disappointment!" murmured the girl, as she retraced her steps. "She does not know how much I need the money."

Mrs. Arden did not mean to be unkind; she was simply thoughtless. She had everything herself; how could she realize Madeline's wants? Such people seldom do. The little chapel in Vine Street was lighted as Madeline re-passed it, and sweet music floated out from the open door. Beautiful words they were, and they sounded very beautiful in that London street to that poor sewing-girl—

"Precious promise God hath given
To the weary passer-by;
On the way from earth to Heaven,
I will guide thee with Mine eye."

Madeline walked in and took a seat. Presently a tall, handsome man, past middle age, entered and passed up the aisle to the chair behind the desk. As the music ceased, he rose, opened the Bible on the table, and read: "In all thy ways acknowledge Him and He shall direct thy paths." Three times he read it in clear, earnest tones, and then closed the Book. Laying his hand upon its cover, and looking searchingly into the faces before him, he said:—

"My friends, God has never yet broken one of His promises: what is more, He never will break one of His promises. Is there a soul in this room to-night who is worried and perplexed because they cannot see the way before them—any one who is in trouble because the future looks so dark to them, and they cannot see even one bright spot ahead? If so, let me say, this promise was meant for you. Think over your past life, and if at any time God has been good to you, has led you, has kept you, rise, and before this company acknowledge Him. Do this and the promise shall be verified unto you: He shall direct your paths. Who will acknowledge Him now?"

Thought after thought rushed swiftly through Madeline Stuart's mind. She had been left an orphan at twelve years of age. God had placed her in a good family: through kind friends she had obtained an education and a business by which she might gain an honest livelihood. To be sure, she must work hard, very hard, for her daily bread, and true it was that her only friends were far away on the other side of the great Atlantic; yet God had been good to her, so good, for her life might have been much more bitter. As these truths were pressed home to Madeline's heart, she arose, and in short, simple words, "acknowledged Him." Would the promise be verified? Would He direct her paths?

"If you please, Miss, there's a caller for you below." "For me, and so early?" and Madeline hastened downstairs. To her surprise, the clergyman of the previous evening stood before her.

"I will explain my business at once," he added, after his self-introduction was over. "I am Mrs. Arden's brother. I stood in the back hall last night, putting on my overcoat, and, the door being ajar, heard my sister defer paying you. I imagined your disappointment, but feared my offer of assistance might be deemed obtrusive. I walked behind you, and saw you enter the church, and it was for your especial benefit that I chose the lesson of the evening. I was much gratified to hear your prompt testimony, and moved to come here this morning. For many weeks I have been in search of some competent person to act as governess for my children and companion to my wife. I feel that it was a providence I chanced to be at my sister's last evening, and have no hesitation in offering you the situation; it is for you to accept or reject."

And Madeline bowed her head, and answered, "I accept the position and will strive to fulfil its trusts."

She has a happy home of her own now; but she will never forget that rainy evening in London, when the singing of a hymn led her into chapel. And there hangs upon her wall, in bright letters, the motto to which she attributes all the sunshine of her life: "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths."

A TRAGIC HEART HISTORY.

ONE day last summer a temperance lecturer was being driven from one town to another, where he was to hold a meeting in the evening. His friend, whose carriage he was riding in, and who was most zealous in everything associated with temperance, was asked, "How is it that you, who have never felt the tooth of the serpent, should always be so ready to make sacrifices for the good cause?"

He gave a quick, searching, telegraphic glance at the speaker. A tear gleamed in his eyes as he said, "One reason why I wanted to ride with you was to tell you the story of a most important crisis in my life.

"I was born in the year 1823. My father was a very intemperate man. The most of his time was spent in the tavern in my native town, or at a village tavern about three miles distant. We often suffered for the necessaries of life while my father poured all his earnings into the tills of those two tavern-keepers. My mother was quite expert with her needle, and thus kept the wolf at bay by her industry and close economy. Our little home had been left to us by my grandfather in such a way that my father could not spend it or deprive us of a shelter. We kept a cow, which furnished a large share of our living. The family consisted of myself and three sisters.

"One day, when I was about seven years old, my father went to the tavern, and while taking his accustomed drink discovered that some one had spoken of him as a common drunkard. He furiously demanded of the landlord the name of the person who had said this, and the fellow replied, 'Your wife knows all about it.' He came home infuriated with drink, and began abusing my mother in language which it makes me shudder to remember, she protesting that she did not know anything about it. Finally, his face purpled with passion; he dealt my mother a terrible blow, which prostrated her bleeding and insensible to the floor."

Here the relater broke down completely, bursting into tears. After a moment, he said, "I hope you will pardon my emotion; but now, after a period of nearly fifty years, I cannot refer to this picture without the sad, suffering face of my mother, who is now a saint in heaven, rising before me. My sister shrieked, 'Oh, father, you have killed my mother!' Affrighted, I sprang from my bed, and ran to the barn and hid myself.

"When daylight came all was still in the house, and I crept back to find that my grandmother had gone to seek a doctor, who, finding my mother in a critical condition, told my father, who had just risen from his drunken slumber, that he would certainly be punished for his violence. He gathered what few clothes he had together and absconded, leaving us to get along the best way we could. When my father had left the house my mother tenderly drew me to her breast, and, with the tears streaming over her cheeks, made me promise never to drink a drop of liquor while I lived, and sealed that promise with a passionate kiss, which left an indelible impress upon my heart. For nearly fifty years I have kept that pledge. That summer we got along comfortably.

"With the help of our neighbors we cultivated the little patch of ground, and with our cow we did not suffer for food. My mother raised a flock of turkeys also, with the sale of which she hoped to obtain means to purchase our shoes and other necessary clothing for winter. There was to be a militia muster near the village. The landlord of the little tavern I have spoken of came to purchase our turkeys for that occasion, offering a good price, which my mother gladly accepted. He put them in his cart, and handed my mother a bill which my father had contracted at his bar, and, jumping into his cart, drove away as fast as his horse could go.

"My poor mother stood there dumbfounded, and, bursting into tears, walked into the house. Early and late all that autumn she worked, sometimes till past midnight, to get our winter clothing, and I went bare-foot until the snow covered the ground before she could purchase our shoes. Oh! when I think of my broken-hearted mother, and my sorrow-laden childhood, do you wonder that I am a radical temperance man?" It seems as if God's retribution followed that tavern-keeper. He died a poor, loathsome drunkard, forsaken of God and man."

NIHILISM, COMMUNISM, SOCIALISM, FENIANISM.

By the Rev. Hugh Hanna, St. Enoch's Church, Belfast.

SEVERAL powerful and dangerous communities have recently struggled into existence, with declared hostility to the existing structure of society, and the principles on which that structure is established. We have had the Commune in France; the socialistic democracy in Germany; the formidable sect of the Nihilists in Russia. There may be shades of difference between these revolutionary systems, but it is not worth our while to distinguish them. They are all in substantial agreement. Their aim is one. By whatever means they hope to reach the paradise of revolution, they all desire to shatter the existing framework of society, to abolish distinctions of rank and condition, and to reduce the whole human family to one dead level of equality, or to show how such an end can and ought to be accomplished. In addition thereto a strong feeling of hostility to the Christian faith is generally cherished by these revolutionary sects; and the obligations of marriage are commonly repudiated.

A chief apostle of Nihilism has declared that "the gospel of Nihilism admits of no half measures and hesitation. The old world must be destroyed, and replaced by a new one. The lie must be stamped out and give way to truth. The first lie is God; the second lie is Right. When you have freed your minds from the fear of God and your childish respects for the fiction of Right, then all the remaining chains which bind you, and which are called science, civilization, property, marriage, morality, and justice, will snap asunder like threads. Let your own happiness be your only law. Our first work must be the destruction and annihilation of everything as it now exists. You must accustom yourself to destroy everything—the good with the bad; for if but an atom of this old world remains the new will never be created."

It might be supposed that these are but the ravings of madmen, and that no defence is needed against them but that of a lunatic asylum to accommodate the apostles of such a creed. But it should be known that such iniquitous and destructive doctrines are proclaimed to multitudes, both on the platform and through the press, on the Continents of Europe and America; and that the rapid spread of such doctrines has occasioned serious alarm to some of the most powerful governments and nations of the day. We have seen the peril to which Communism exposed France at the close of her last great war. We know how strenuously Germany has had to combat her powerful and persistent bands of Socialists; and now the Nihilism of Russia has gained an infamous notoriety by its repeated attempts on the life of the Czar.

These revolutionary associations have adopted murder as a perfectly proper instrument of reform. And we have seen in unhappy Ireland in connection with Fenianism and the Land League, how a certain section of the population has come to regard assassination as a legitimate means of reaching political and social ends. And we cannot doubt that the revolutionary principles so boldly avowed on the Continent lie at the root of many of our own ills, and are too likely to develop themselves in Ireland with still greater danger to society, uness encountered and corrected by the forces of faithful instruction, and a government true to its office in the protection of society against the foes of public order.

Now, it is easy to excite discontent against the comfortable and opulent orders of society. There always have been, since population increased on the earth, multitudes of the human family who have hard struggles for life—hard struggles to obtain the barest necessities of life. And as these multitudes toil and struggle, and see others living apparently at ease, in possession of the outward comforts, and it may be of the luxuries of life—it is not hard to rouse the multitude to envy and even hostility, to those who are apparently so much better off than themselves. But it is very wicked so to do—to pervert the judgment of these lowly ones; to fill their hearts with bitter thoughts of their more fortunate fellows, and add to the trials of their outward state the agonies of envy, and distrust, and hatred to the more prosperous classes of society.

THE AGE BEFORE THE FLOOD.

A Picture of Our Age, and a Sign of the Lord's Coming.

By the Rev. A. R. Fausset, M.A.

Characteristics of the Antediluvians—Worldliness—Open Disavowal of God—Violence and Lawlessness—Characteristics of this Age—Worldly Culture—Sensuality—Hard Speeches Against God—Corruption Rising in the Church.

THE following characteristics of the age before the flood, answering to those of our age, the foretold presage of the Lord's return.—Our Lord tells us, if we desire to know what the state of the world will be at His return we have a picture of it in the age just before the flood (Luke 17 : 26)—"As it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and the flood came, and destroyed them all."

Worldliness supplanting godliness.—Now the prominent feature in the picture drawn by the Lord of the antediluvian world is its intense worldliness. The absence of the connecting "and" marks the complete absorption of men in secular aims and pleasures, eating, drinking, marrying, as if this were their all, with no desire beyond. No interval was allowed for repose or meditation upon the concerns of eternity; it was one ceaseless round of bustle, business, and pleasure. "They knew not (the things which belonged unto their peace—Matthew 24 : 39; like Jerusalem before its awful judgment—Luke 19 : 42) until the flood came and took them all away."

Open disavowal of God, the Giver of every good.—Along with this practical unbelief there was not wanting what often accompanies it—open putting away of God from them, and professed disavowal of the debt of gratitude due to Him: "Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden? which were cut down out of time (prematurely), whose foundation was overflown with a flood: which said unto God, Depart from us; and what can the Almighty do for them? Yet he filled their houses with good things" (Job 22 : 15-18). This, and the corresponding picture of the heathen—"When they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful" (Romans 1 : 21), has its exact counterpart in St. Paul's description of the men of the last days, "unthankful, unholy" (2 Timothy 3 : 2); relapsing into heathenism—a marked characteristic of our own age.

Violence and disregard of the rights and lives of fellow-men.—The sacred writer (Genesis 6 : 4) adds another feature, "There were giants (nephalim, rather "men of violence;" literally, "fellers") "in those days;" and again (verse 13), "The earth was filled with violence through men." This feature, too, is to be reproduced in the "lawlessness" (English version) of the last days (Greek, Matthew 24 : 12, and 2 Thessalonians 2 : 7, 8), about to culminate in the revolution of "the lawless one."

These traits of the antediluvians reproduced in OUR AGE.

Are not these characteristics beginning to mark our age? Selfish absorption in the pursuit of gain; ambition, and pleasure; no pause, no rest allowed, so that the worldlings make themselves mere drudges; and the prevalent diseases are those of the nerve-system and the heart, entailing frequently sudden deaths; intense worldliness; impatience of Divine law; independence of God; the tyranny of the multitude; recklessness of the rights, properties, and lives of one's fellow-men? Witness the selfish and lawless war waged by Communists in France, Ireland, and Russia on property and rank; treachery, sedition, and assassination are the weapons without scruple employed. Then "lawlessness" appears where least of all we should expect it—in the Church: clergymen flying in the face of the law of the land, and defying their own ecclesiastical superiors.

Simultaneous worldly culture.—All this, moreover, goes on side by side with worldly and intellectual culture; advancement in material civilization and science, while there is deterioration in moral purity. For instance, æsthetic and artistic taste and secular education (the social nostrum of philosophers) have failed to secure Germany from verging to the abyss of moral ruin. So it was in the days before the flood. Cain's descendants were distinguished for inventions, accomplishments, and the arts of civilization. Tubalcain, the "instructor of every artificer" ("hammering every kind of sharp-edged tool") invented weapons of brass and iron; Jubal, musical instruments (Genesis 4 : 21), the harp and the pipe (Hebrew). Our age is music-mad; our churches are changed into sacred opera houses, our charity bazaars into vanity fairs and music saloons.

The harp may beguile a Saul amidst his demon-possessions for a time, but it will not prevent the evil spirit's return. Nebuchadnezzar's concert was the accompaniment of idolatry and persecution (Daniel 3; 1 Samuel 16 : 23; 19 : 9, 10). So it will be again (Revelation 13 : 4-18). The cries of the innocents sacrificed to Moloch used to be drowned with the sounds of music. How many stifle the voice of conscience and thoughts of seriousness with melodies which reach only the ear, and mistake pleasurable emotions awakened by church music for the religion of the heart. In Cain's race was found a "father of tent-dwellers," and a "father of musicians," but not a father of the faithful; one to instruct in brass and iron, but not in the good knowledge of the Lord. So our present "last days" are peculiarly noted for the innumerable applications of iron railways, iron houses, iron ships, and especially terrible iron instruments of warfare.

Sensuality, luxury, and vaunting self-assertion. The names of their women indicate voluptuous beauty of person, not the graces of the inward man—Adah, "the adorned;" Zillah, "the shadow" of delight; Naamah, "the lovely" (Genesis 4 : 19-22). The arts of civilization (which men fancy will elevate the world at last to moral perfection) and secular enjoyments advanced side by side with sensuality, violence, and God-defying arrogance. Lamech, the polygamist, in defiance of God's law (Genesis 2 : 24; Matthew 19 : 5; Malachi 2 : 15), relying on his son Tubalcain's recent invention of metal weapons, embodied in song (in Hebrew parallelism) his self-confident assurance of power to revenge himself, if assailed:—

> Adah and Zillah (who as women feared for his life on their account [Genesis 12 : 12, 13] in that lawless age) hear my voice,
> Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech;
> For surely I slay a man for my wound (i. e., if he wound me).
> And a young man for my stripe (i. e., if he inflict stripes on me),
> For Cain is avenged sevenfold, but Lamech seven and seventy fold.

He evidently believed more in his own material powers than in the might of God; just as in the last days Antichrist shall deify material "FORCES" while he sets God at nought (see Daniel 12 : 36-38; "He shall honor the God of forces." So in Job 12 : 6, the Hebrew, "They make a god of their own hand.") The same godless vauntings of material forces characterize our age. Witness, as a sample, the folowing sneer at God's providence: "Providence only followed its usual rule of siding with the large battalions" ("History of England," by Spencer Wapole).

The Lord's coming to convict the ungodly for hard speeches against Him.—These words of Lamech were some of those "hard speeches which ungodly sinners spoke against Him," and for which Enoch at the time foretold that "the Lord will come to convict and to execute judgment upon them" (Jude 14 : 15). In our age there are similarly the "great words" of so-called scientific men who know not God, nor His word, nor themselves, in denying His providence and His creative and miraculous interpositions in the kingdoms of nature and of grace, and His personal coming again. The very words of the antediluvian "stout" cavillers against Jehovah, as though His services were profitless, and prayer to Him an unmeaning soliloquy, are again being taken up in these last days, as foretold by Malachi 3 : 13-15. One end of the coming of the Lord is to confute all such self-sufficient infidel reasoning. "Now we call the proud happy; yea, they that work wickedness are set up"—but—"Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts. But unto you that fear My name, shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in His wings" (Malachi 3 : 13; 4 : 1, 2).

CORRUPTION OF THE CHURCH the sure forerunner of unbridled lawlessness in the world: unequal marriages.—Cowper truly writes:

> "When nations are to perish in their sins,
> 'Tis in the Church the leprosy begins."

"The sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose" (Genesis 6 : 2). The "sons of God" were the worshippers of God, chiefly Sethites, as appears from Genesis 4 : 26 and Exodus 4 : 22, 23; not angels, as some suppose, for "angels neither marry nor are given in marriage" (Matthew 22 : 30). "The daughters of men" whom they took as "WIVES" were children of the worldly (1 Corinthians 15 : 47, 49). Our Lord, in characterizing the people before the flood, mentions their "marrying and giving in marriage," evidently referring to their marrying merely to gratify the flesh, instead of "in the Lord" (1 Corinthians 7 : 29, 39; 2 Corinthians 6 : 14; Ezra 9 : 1; Matthew 24 : 38). They whose calling was to be "the salt of the earth" lost their spiritual "savor" by marriages with those whose recommendation was that "they were fair," not godly. They "saw" with the lust of the eye, and then "took all which they chose" by the lust of the flesh and fancy, not faith. Then, at this point, it was that universal corruption set in, the sure prelude of universal destruction.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

The Coffee-Room Manager—A Prayer for a Blessing—An Uncongenial Guest—Preparations for Opening—The Invited Guests.

HAD you been among the privileged few to-night who might open the door of the coffee-room and glance within, you would have beheld a large room, the essence of cheerfulness, bright and warm—gas burners, stove, and crimson blinds each giving a glowing light and warmth and reflection of the same.

Busy in every part of the room at once, apparently, you might have noticed a man of quiet manner and silent demeanor.

"Yes" and "No" were his principal answers to the questions put to him by the various inspectors of the premises. But that he was a ruling power, though a serving one, was also evident from the unconscious respect with which he was generally appealed to on all matters.

"Too quiet, isn't he?" whispered a stout old gentleman to Lady Isabel.

"I don't think so," she as briefly answered.

He was the embryo manager of the gay coffee-room. Everything was in a state of pristine element at present. All was expectation on the part of those interested in the novel movement; with Lady Isabel and one or two others that expectation was faith, and therefore was not likely to be disappointed.

The manager's name was Loudon. The publicans cracked their jokes and said it ought to have been "Quiet 'un." Some said, "Grave one" would have suited him better. Others again said "Proud 'un" would have been more appropriate. But the object of their satire was untouched by personal remarks of any kind. They did not seem to reach him. He lived in another element, and, like the Psalmist, seemed to have obtained the heaven-born gift of a sacred deafness!—that much-neglected power. "I as a deaf man, heard not; and I was as a dumb man, that openeth not his mouth." This was with regard to personal treatment.

And it was well for him that he had this "peculiarity," as it might well be called, so rare a spiritual gift is it! or rather, one so rarely sought, obtained, or cultivated. For it made him independent of much that would have both harassed and hindered him sorely in his new work. He was a wise man too, for he was silent, except when his Master would have him speak, and then from lips dedicated to a noble service he could say words of burning love and power, or bright encouragement, as the case might claim.

Where did he obtain his graces? Whence did he derive his gifts? From the Master, he could have told you if he would, who not only provides each of His children with a mission, but with directions for its fulfilment—and those, daily directions—but also gives the power to obey them, and with the obedience grants the reward in success. What a happy service! and he found it so.

His eyes never lighted on Lady Isabel but they kindled. She had been the means of first leading him to his Saviour's love; and seeing in his consecrated life the elements of heart-devotion that could foster an untiring zeal, with the quiet power, as she hoped, of a wise control, she had enlisted his services for her new work.

So important a department of the coffee-room wholly was he, that he is worth investigation. But there is much more to be seen and studied, and this must be done when we can see the premises at their best, i.e., what Lady Isabel would have called their best—quite full of working men! She longed for this sight, she hoped for it, yet sometimes she almost feared. But, unlike good Mrs. Hutton, her fears never overcame her. Hope and faith carried the day. A fresh grasp of one promise would give her heart the victory in any struggle.

Though she had not been very long in God's great school, she had learned very quickly, and was learning every day. Her progress strengthened her to communicate the same blessings to her neighbors. The townspeople who had welcomed her as her husband's bride, she felt were the rightful claimants for her sympathies. To them she owed the overflowings, the plentiful droppings from her own overful cup. Her happy life! Could it be happy if she enjoyed it alone?

Mr. Hamilton felt with her in this, and aided her in every effort she had as yet made in a small way for the benefit of the sick or poor. Now she was undertaking a harder task, for she was in the act of commencing a raid on the kingdom of evil.

After a short time spent in general inspection, or rather regalement of her eyes with this early development of her heart's desires, she retired, as was her wont on each visit, to the inner room with James Loudon and one or two chosen friends who happened then to be on the spot—not very high in earthly birth, nor counted worthy of a page in the Peerage roll, but "King's Daughters," and Princes of the Blood in God's own reading!—for a few moments' prayer.

"Let us ask great things to-night!" she said; and so they did.

He heard and answered then and there with a sweet birth of new confidence and praiseful joy in every soul. It was but a foretaste of fuller blessing, and they knew, they felt it. So they rejoiced as much in the bright expectation of benefits to come, as in the actuality of His presence "in the midst."

When they separated, Lady Isabel had to pass her way through a crowd of bystanders to her carriage, where the impatient ponies chafed their bits, tossed their manes, and, indeed, had well-nigh exhausted the temper of their faithful groom. Their heads were towards home, and the instinctive vision of oats and hay loomed too clearly before their blinkered eyes, or, perhaps, ideas. But so it was!

Not many minutes elapsed before she was at her own hall door, where, having dismounted, and reached the top of the stone steps she knew so well, the butler opened the door, saying as he removed some of her superfluous wraps, "Mr. Jardine has come, my lady."

At this moment Mr. Hamilton appeared in the hall and beckoned her into his study.

"Mr. Jardine is here, darling; come for the night, evidently—portmanteau and all. He will have a little business to talk about during the evening. In the meantime he has had some tea."

At dinner time she appeared in the drawing-room dressed in a long black velvet robe, trimmed at the throat and front with rich lace. Her tastes in dress were what many a lady would have called simple, some "too plain;" but they suited her, and became her too, as her husband thought.

Coming up to Mr. Jardine, as he entered the room, she gave him a gracious welcome, and resigned herself to what she knew would follow.

The remarks she usually found distasteful, and indeed had dreaded, to-night slipped past her in a wonderful way. She scarcely heard and certainly did not feel them!

"Ah, Lady Isabel! about yonr good works again! It has been a cold evening for you to be out. I found it quite chilly in the train."

"I am afraid it must have been rather a disagreeable journey," said his listener. "There is such a fog this evening. Did you leave all well?"

"Oh yes! I thank you. My mother has been ailing a little, but my sisters are as active as ever—out every night. There is generally something going on in town, or out of it. Though I confess this is quite the dullest month in London itself. They have been paying some visits lately; and my sister Lucy has come off with flying colors. Very pretty girl she is getting, immensely liked. I expect she will do something when the season comes round."

Mr. Hamilton got up from his seat and began to stir the fire. Lady Isabel reached out her hand for a work-basket that lay temptingly near.

"Dinner is on the table!" at this moment proclaimed the portly gray-haired butler, as he opened wide the drawing-room door.

"I am so sorry," said Lady Isabel, rising, "that we are quite alone to-night. Had we known you were coming, we should have asked some friends to meet you."

"Well, I did not know it myself until after office hours. I found there were one or two papers about which I wanted to consult Mr. Hamilton; and I thought that, on the whole, it was better just to run down and talk them over."

As conversation proceeded during dinner, various topics of general interest were touched upon—the politics of the day—sundry pieces of gossip relating to mutual friends or acquaintances, and not seldom were the brothers and sisters of Mr. Jardine dragged on to the tapis. His brotherly pride in them perhaps was natural, and no doubt commendable.

But presently he leant towards Lady Isabel, and said—

"How are all the ragamuffins prospering?"

Lady Isabel was quite accustomed to this line of query from her present guest, as well as from many others; and was about to reply with her usual graciousness, when Mr. Hamilton, in rather a louder voice than necessary, interrupted her by saying—

"Do you care about wine, Jardine? We don't usually have it on the table now, but you can have some if you wish for it?"

"Oh! thank you. Well! I am very independent of such luxuries—wonderfully so, I am always told! But as you are so kind—thank you, yes, I think I will," and the butler filled up his glass with sparkling sherry.

Mr. Hamilton was more impatient than his wife had ever been of the cold scorn with which Mr. Jardine, and many of his other acquaintances, looked upon the line of life in which they were both now walking. While he for this reason, and under such circumstances, rather repelled the subject as one for conversation, Lady Isabel felt disposed to encourage it, always hoping—often almost against hope—that some who at present despised their blessings might one day share them.

When Mr. Jardine left Lionel Court the next morning, he said, as he took leave of his host and hostess—

"You have often been kind enough to say I might bring a friend down with me, on some of my flying visits. Perhaps you would allow me to do so next time I come. It would be an awful treat to some poor smoked-up chap, mewed into the offices there!"

"Oh, certainly!" replied both.

"We shall be very glad. But try, if possible, to let us have a line or telegram beforehand, that we may at least be at home," said Mr. Hamilton.

And thus they parted.

The next morning was a busy one in Thornham, for it was the dawn of the first day of the new coffee-room!

Lady Isabel of course was busy. Her little girls were busy too. Tiny things of five and seven years they were, but they delighted in a share of the interests of the day. Mother's pleasures were their pleasures too. And this was not accidental. It was the result of baby training.

"Mother wants to make a pillow for such a poor sick girl. Will Janie help her to make it?" was one of many an appeal that had enlisted the utmost sympathies as well as skilful little energies, at least for a few minutes of such infantine ability.

"Me too! me too! muvver," was sure to be the response of the younger.

In every little household work or pleasure at certain quiet hours of the day when Lady Isabel could have them quite to herself the children were initiated into pure enjoyments, the fruit of occupation rather than of idleness. To-day they had a very happy half-hour in the snug little boudoir "helping mother to arrange the books" that were to fill up some newly-erected shelves in the coffee-room. This was delightful work! They piled them up one by one as the talismanic words "Lending Library" were inserted in printed letters in each. Thus two important piles of very simple but interesting literature were piled upon the small Sutherland table.

When this piece of business was finished the children were enchanted; and when the nurse appeared to decoy them away for their morning walk their happy faces, kisses, and clapping of hands, as they retired into the distance, added brightness to their mother's heart, and festooned with joyous rays the solemn corridors through which they passed on their way to the nursery.

"O God! Thou hast been very gracious!" she said, lifting up her heart in praise. "To-night add another link to the golden chain with which Thou art daily surrounding me! Bless the opening of our coffee-room, Heavenly Father! Thou hast pledged Thy word. Thou hast promised Thy blessing. We plead the promise. For Jesus' sake, we ask it. For Jesus' sake."

Can we wonder if a project succeed, that is thus bathed in prayer, and wrought out in faith and hope? It must obtain a blessing!

The group of men from the new house had again been met, the evening before, by Lady Isabel, according to promise, and the invitation for eight o'clock on this particular night warmly given. But it was seconded by a little written invitation on a card. It ran thus:—

"We are going to Open the New Coffee-Room To-morrow Evening at Eight o'clock.

Will you come and help us?

Isabel Hamilton."

With this the men were enchanted. It seemed "so indiwiddawal-like," they said, and "warn't a bit stiff," and "seemed to come round 'em like."

The result was that they came!—all except a few rather tough characters to move, one or two who were terrified of the publican and his following, and one who was "out o' sorts."

THE PHARISEES REPROVED.

S. S. Lesson for April 17th, Luke 11:37–54. Golden Text, Matt. 23:3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Lord Jesus in His teaching had been reproving His hearers because they sought a sign; God's great sign was manifest, present before their eyes, but they had no eyes for Him, and He declared that no sign should be given them but the sign of Jonas the prophet: "For as Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of man be to this generation." He told them how the Queen of the South "came from the utmost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and behold, a greater than Solomon is here; how the men of Nineveh "repented at the preaching of Jonas; and behold, a greater than Jonas is here." He told them that the men of Nineveh and the Queen of the South should rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it. He added: "No man when he hath lighted a candle putteth it in a secret place, neither under a bushel, but on a candlestick, that they which come in may see the light."

God had sent His Son to be the Light of the world, but the generation to which Jesus came had dazzled their eyes with other objects, and in the very presence of God's light they groped for the wall like the blind (Isa. 59:10). Therefore Jesus said unto them: "The light of the body is the eye" (because through the eye all impressions are received): "therefore when thine eye is single, thy whole body also is full of light; but when thine eye is evil, thy body also is full of darkness." Light and life streamed forth from the human body of our blessed Lord; those who came in contact with Him found light for their darkness, health for their sickness, comfort for their sadness, and when He came in contact with the dead, He brought them to life again, and from His glorified body we receive our power, our light, our life. What He is to us, He would have us, as members of His body, to be to the world, His interpreters, reflectors, instruments. And therefore it is necessary that our whole being, body as well as soul and spirit, should come under the immediate control of the Holy Spirit, and should be "full of light, having no part dark," transparent, so that every movement, every word, every deed, may be in the full light and simplicity of Christ. "If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light."

What is it then to have a single eye? Surely, to have one undivided aim in life. Christ pleased not Himself, sought not His own, did always those things which pleased His Father—His was a single aim. Paul said, "This one thing I do." In the multiplicity of his labors, his aim was one, to live Christ, pressing on to the mark for the prize of his high calling. He did not stay by the way to think whether he could afford to lose this, whether his endurance would hold out for that, whether his physical strength would be equal to the other; he had counted the cost, committed himself to the race course, and staked all upon the issue, Paul's eye was single. Therefore it is that God has given us more details of his inward and outward life than of any other man mentioned in the Word of God.

"And as He spake, a certain Pharisee besought Him to dine with him; and He went in, and sat down to meat. And when the Pharisee saw it, he marvelled that He had not first washed before dinner." It would appear from Mark 7:3–9, that the Jews practised some kind of ceremonial washing, not for the purpose of cleanliness, but in obedience to some tradition of the elders, for the Lord says, "For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men;" and again (ver. 13), "Making the Word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered." Are there not many who wish to be considered religious, and are exceedingly scrupulous as to whether they pray always kneeling, as to the laying no other book upon the Bible, and many other external marks of reverence, which are not to be despised, but which never change the heart or bring the soul in real contact with God. There are some who would think it a greater sin to pray standing or sitting than to give way to anger or to be in debt.

"The Lord said unto him, Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and the platter; but your inward part is full of ravening and wickedness. Ye fools, did not He that made that which is without, make that which is within also? But rather give alms of such things as ye have (or, Give of the contents—i.e., of the vessel—Alford); and, behold, all things are clean unto you." That is to say, "Let your bodies serve the purpose for which they were created, to minister to God and man, and then the contact with men and things will not defile that which you eat; live, eat, think, speak to the glory of God, and 'all things are clean unto you.'"

"But woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees." These were unusual words from the lips of Him who came not "to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might be saved" (John 3:17). But there was a reason for them, and our golden text discovers it to us, "The scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say and do not." Jesus' heart was open to the vilest sinner, and bless God it is so still; but for those who want to appear holy, and get the credit of it before men, while their hearts are revelling in sin and wickedness—for those who will not come to the light lest their deeds should be reproved, even the Lord Jesus He could only say, "Woe unto you."

"Woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye tithe mint and rue and all manner of herbs," ye do that which costs you nothing and wins you the reputation for being pious, but "ye pass over judgment and the love of God"—ye neither submit yourselves to the judgment of God, nor yet do ye accept His love. "These ought ye to have done," these are of primary importance which ye have neglected, and ye ought not to have left the other undone. "Woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets;" ye love the praise of men whether there is any ground for it or not. Oh, this awful, deadly blindness to things eternal! In our own day it reigns in the religion of many. Many are there whose aim is not to be holy, but to appear so; not to be pure in the sight of God, but to get the credit with their fellow-creatures for being so; not to be self denying as a habit of life, but to do two or three great things which may win the character of self-denial, and then to hide under that character a self-indulgence and a self-complacency which are despicable. To such our Lord has but one message, "Woe unto you!"

"Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them:" pitfalls for others, misleading sign-posts, which may cause others to go out of the way and to rest in externalism; "having a form of godliness, but denying [in word, in manner, in deed, in everything] the power thereof" (2 Tim. 3:5). These words of the Lord were not without convincing power. One of the lawyers said unto Him, "Master, thus saying Thou reproachest us also. And He said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers." Theory without practice! This is what God hates. A teacher of the Word who is not a doer is even more abominable than a hearer who is not a doer. To such the Lord has but one message, "Woe unto you!" No man has a right to teach others that which he himself is not prepared to put into practice. Paul could say, "Those things which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do" (Phil. 4:9). Oh, that every Christian parent, master, teacher, or minister, could say the same.

The Lord continued, "Woe unto you, for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them. Truly ye bear witness that ye allow the deeds of your fathers: for they indeed killed them, and ye build their sepulchres;" and yet neither the fathers nor the children hearkened to the voice of the prophets. It was an easy thing to build the sepulchre of a prophet whose voice could no more disturb them. And thus it is in our own day that men such as John Bunyan, John Knox, etc., who were persecuted, despised, imprisoned in their own lifetime, yet are memorialized after their death by the very successors in unbelief of those who have so ill-treated them. It costs a man nothing to help in setting up a statue to the memory of one who, if he were living, he would keep at the greatest distance possible.

But He who "knew what was in man" (John 2:25) went on to say, "Therefore also said the wisdom of God, I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them they shall slay and persecute: that the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation; from the blood of Abel unto the bood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple: verily I say unto you, it shall be required of this generation." That generation took upon it the awful responsibility of rejecting God's Son, and in rejecting the salvation which reached back to the time of Zacharias, and even to that of Abel, chose the awful alternative of having their lot with the rebellious in all ages; and thus the blood of Abel and Zacharias, who were both slain for God's sake, is required of all those in all times who take part against God. "God requireth that which is past" (Ecc. 3:15).

"Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered." And these were the professed leaders of the people. No wonder God said, "I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran: I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied. But if they had stood in my counsel, and had caused my people to hear my words, then they should have turned them from their evil way, and from the evil of their doings" (Jer. 23:21, 22). But these lawyers of the time of Christ, instead of opening the knowledge of God to others, took away the key, caused many "to stumble at the law" (Matt. 2:8).

Christ's faithful dealing with the Pharisees and lawyers incensed them against Him, for "A scorner loveth not him that reproveth him; neither will he go unto the wise" (Prov. 15:12). "The scribes and the Pharisees began to urge Him vehemently, and to provoke Him to speak of many things: laying wait for Him, and seeking to catch something out of His mouth, that they might accuse Him." But they did not know that His mouth was guarded, that no guile could come out of it, because it spoke not in the interest of self; they did not know how futile were their endeavors.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Serious Illness of the Earl of Beaconsfield has been the most prominent subject of interest among the foreign topics of the week. The distinguished English statesman, who is in his seventy-sixth year, has been prostrated by an acute attack of bronchial asthma complicated by his chronic malady of gout. On March 30th he was considered by the physicians in attendance to be in a very critical condition, and one of them sat up with him through the night. Since that time he has rallied somewhat, and it is hoped the crisis of his disease has passed; the physicians, however, are apprehensive that if the east winds now prevalent in Great Britain continue, he may suffer a relapse which will probably be fatal. Lord Beaconsfield enjoys a wide popularity in Great Britain, and even his political opponents feel sincere sympathy with him personally, though differing from him widely on questions of state. Mr. Gladstone has been among the most regular of the callers to inquire after his health, and his death would be regarded as a national loss. It is thought that if he should die, the political parties in England would be broken up and a new party be formed, which would include among its members the moderate followers of Lord Beaconsfield and the aristocratic supporters of Mr. Gladstone.

The Remains of the Late Czar of Russia were deposited with much pomp in the imperial vault on March 27th. There was no hostile demonstration on the part of the Nihilists, although grave fears had been entertained of an attempt to assassinate the royal guests. It is a significant fact that one of the first proclamations of the new Czar related to the appointment of a regency to assume the functions of government in the event of his being assassinated.

The Turkish Government Under the United pressure of the ministers of European courts has made a small concession to Greece. It includes an offer of territory in Thessaly, comprising Larissa, Trikala, Turnova, and the whole valley of the Salembrias, but excluding Prevesa and Metzovo, or any part of Epirus. The Porte will grant the rectification of the Epirote frontier, cede Fort Punto, dismantle the fortifications of Prevesa, and declare the neutrality of the Gulf of Arta. The ambassadors have decided to sign a protocol declaring that they regard the last offer of the Porte "acceptable." Negotiations will accordingly be opened at Athens to induce Greece to accept it. The protocol admits that the cession of Epirus is almost impossible. It also advises the powers to recommend acceptance of the Turkish proposal to Greece.

An impression prevails that the Greeks will not accept the compromise, which cedes far less territory than the Berlin Congress assigned. Active preparations are in progress both in Greece and Turkey for war. The London Pall Mall Gazette says: "The European Powers could easily restrain the Greeks by sending ironclads to the Piræus, but there is no indication that they intend to take such a course. The question is, therefore, what amount of resistance diplomacy can oppose to the momentum with which Greece is gravitating into war. Keen observers at Athens believe that nothing but force will suffice."

The Opening of Exeter Hall, in London, took place on March 29th. The building so long associated with evangelical societies, and in which many American orators have addressed crowded assemblies, has become the property of the Young Men's Christian Association. The opening services were under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and among the distinguished speakers was the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Atheist Member of the British Parliament, has failed in his appeal to the Superior Court. The decision of the judges affirms the court below and adjudges Mr. Bradlaugh subject to the enormous penalties enacted against any one sitting and voting in Parliament without taking the oath. On the question of these penalties Mr. Bradlaugh will appeal to the House of Lords, but will vacate his seat in Parliament and seek re-election. Should he be re-elected he will take the oath as other members do. It is expected that as he is unable to pay the penalties he has incurred, an attempt will be made to have him declared a bankrupt, in which case he could not sit in Parliament; but as he took his seat by virtue of a vote of the House, it is probable that an act of indemnity would be passed, relieving him of the consequences of his conduct. It is by no means certain that he will be re-elected. He will be opposed by a Conservative candidate, and the correspondents of New York journals cable that Mr. Henry Varley, the renowned evangelist, who is well known in this country, will also contest the seat with him. Mr. Varley is popular in Northampton, and if he succeeds in gaining the votes of even a third of the Liberal electors, the Conservative candidate will be elected, as the last election showed that the Liberal majority in the borough over the Conservatives was very small.

The Suppression of the London Newspaper, Freiheit, has occasioned some excitement in that city. The office was entered by the police on March 30th. The type was carried off, the compositors ejected, and the building locked up by the officers. The Freiheit was a rabid socialist paper which openly applauded the murder of the Czar and covertly advocated the assassination of his successor and of the Emperor of Germany. It was not extensively circulated in England, but had a large clandestine circulation in Germany. The charge of despotic methods is brought against the British Government for its action in the matter, but it is certain that the articles published in the newspaper were incentives to the commission of crime, and were consequently punishable by law. The suppression of the journal will make the government unpopular with the radical wing of the Liberal party, who, while they care nothing for the Freiheit, are jealous of any act which has the appearance of curtailing the liberty of the press.

The European Explorers who went to Africa in the interests of the project to lay a line of railroad across the Desert of Sahara have, according to a telegram from Algiers, been foully murdered. The dispatch says: "Four natives belonging to the mission of exploration arrived at Ouargla on Monday last, bringing details of the almost complete annihilation of the expedition. The natives report that the expedition was surprised by a hostile tribe, and Colonel Flatters and nearly all the members of the expedition were killed. One member named Dianons, with a subordinate officer named Poleguin and sixty-one men, escaped, but they were subsequently overtaken by another tribe who offered the fugitives some dates; the fruit was poisoned, and Dianons and twenty-eight men died after partaking of them. Thirty men continued the retreat, but when four days' march south of Messenguen they were surrounded by hostile tribes. The four natives were then dispatched to Ouargla. On their arrival succor was immediately dispatched to the remnant of the expedition. Little hope, however, is entertained of their relief, as, when the messengers left, they were closely beset and poorly supplied with food and ammunition."

Reports from Ireland Describe the Country as strangely tranquil. Inferences of a widely divergent character are drawn from this state of affairs. On the one hand it is explained as an unnatural calm preceding a general rising; on the other hand it is hoped that the people await with some confidence the Land bill promised by the Gladstone government. It is worthy of note that the only subscriptions received by the Land League now come from America, and that Mr. Parnell's popularity has sensibly declined since the enactment of the Coercion Act.

An Attack by the Boers on Potchefstroom, one of the garrisons Sir G. P. Colley was on his way to relieve when he was defeated and killed, was made after peace had been concluded between the British and Boer generals, and resulted in the surrender of the place to the Boers. The British complain of the attack as a breach of faith on the part of the Boers. It is asserted in defence that the officer in command was not wholly under Joubert's control. It is feared that the conclusion of peace will not end the Transvaal troubles, as many people complain that they had invested money in the Transvaal in the expectation that the annexation to Great Britain was permanent, and who believe that anarchy will follow the withdrawal of the British troops. In England the Gladstone government has suffered serious loss of popularity by the Transvaal settlement. While one section of the public blames the government for making peace at all, another section condemns them for fighting if they contemplated surrendering the Transvaal in the end. It is, however, clear that the surrender was not forced upon them, as they have now in the Transvaal reinforcements which with the troops already there make up a force against which the Boers would find it hopeless to contend.

The Princess Victoria, the Bride of the German emperor's grandson, was asked to exclude at her wedding a verse from the hymn selected to be sung in the chapel. The verse referred to evil days, but she insisted on its being retained, remarking that she and Prince William neither expected nor desired to be always bedded on roses, but were willing to bear whatever trials might await them. Her commands were obeyed, and the following verse was sung:

> "If a hard lot doth await us,
> Give us strength to bear it, Jesus;
> Grant that we in worst of days,
> No complaint of burden raise."

The lot of the young people cannot, exalted as it is, be free from trouble, and prophecy indicates that as Emperor and Empress of Germany it may be very heavy trouble. Many expositors believe that Germany will undergo in the near future serious reverses. It will be well therefore if the incident of the verse so deeply impresses their minds as to prepare them to meet it strong in the strength God alone can give.

Unexpected Fortunes.—An Errand Boy in the establishment of Messrs. T. & W. Cockane, of Sheffield, England, a few weeks ago suddenly became aware that he was the recipient of a fortune of $50,000, which had been left him by an uncle at Manchester, after whom he had been named. The lad has been sent to school, in order that he may receive an education befitting the possessor of such a fortune. His mother, who is a widow, has also been remembered in the will. Another heir to an estate worth nearly $100,000, which has been for many years in Chancery, has just been discovered in the person of Elizabeth Hutchins. She has spent a great part of her life either in the workhouse, jail, or lunatic asylum. Lately she has been living in a wretched house in Roath, Cardiff. The sudden transition from poverty and hardship to ease and affluence must be a pleasant surprise to these people, but the change will not be so great as that which will happen to the Lord's poor, who, rich in faith, will one day enter into the inheritance prepared for the saints in light.

In Paris an Effort has been Made to Induce tradesmen to close their establishments on Sundays. A Roman Catholic journal of Paris gives a list of six thousand storekeepers of the Quartier Saint Roch who have agreed to the request, and will in future do no business on the Lord's Day.

MISS DE BROEN, whose portrait appears on our frontispiece this week, is the devoted and indefatigable superintendent of the Christian Mission, Belleville, Paris. She is about thirty-five years of age, and of prepossessing appearance and powerful mental capacity.

BELLEVILLE

is a suburb of Paris, with more than a hundred thousand inhabitants, and is the abode, not of poverty and starvation only, but of sundry forms of vice and crime. There, at the time of the Franco-German war in 1870-71, large numbers of captured Roman Catholic priests were brought by the infatuated Communists, and shot, amid scenes of the wildest excitement and terror.

There, too, the government forces mowed down hundreds of desperate Communists in punishment, while hundreds more were carried from Belleville away to prison. Probably no locality in Europe has witnessed worse scenes of desperate and deadly struggle.

The houses in general are inferior, and the streets narrow; the latter are very roughly paved, and the former rise to several stories in height, with somethink like a "common stair" as the entrance to the whole. In a small room at the foot of this stair dwells the concierge or porter, who takes charge of the outer door, and is responsible for the flats above.

The character of the district for poverty and crime is well known in Paris, and from the dens with which its lanes abound, went forth the Communists of 1871, who, with the words "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity" on their banners, sought to sweep away not only rank, but property, going out through the city as murderers and incendiaries.

Soured against the wealthy for their neglect of the poor, and enraged against a priesthood who never approached them but for money, and who during the great siege were feeding luxuriously when they were starving or sustained in life upon the vermin of the common sewers, they struck right and left when their opportunity came. Their provocation had been great, and their revenge was terrible.

It is in this faubourg, and among this people, that Miss de Broen originated her mission in the summer of 1871, while Paris was yet smoking in ruins. It sprang from the sight of the misery of those who had lost all in the indiscriminate and saguinary retaliation of the Versailles Government after the wild struggle of the Commune, and who in their rage and grief were abandoned by every one. Their sorrows and sins were the pressing reasons for making known to them our Saviour and our hope, and many have blessed and do still bless God for constraining Miss de Broen to begin

THE BELLEVILLE MISSION.

For some time Miss de Broen, who speaks French like a Parisian, had lived in Mrs. Pennefather's Home at Mildmay, London, and had successfully labored among the French emigrants and refugees in various districts of the metropolis, so that when in June, 1871, she was invited by a friend to accompany her and others in a missionary tour in the French provinces, she had already gained a practical experience of the work in which she has ever since been so successfully engaged.

The travellers arrived in Paris so soon after the Commune that at the railway station no carriage of any kind could be got to convey them to their hotel. Presently, however, a vehicle, a grocer's cart, did appear, but it was being driven by a woman. In the course of a few hours Miss de Broen made her way to the celebrated

CEMETERY OF PERE LA CHAISE.

This cemetery is one of the sights of Paris, and is the resting-place of the most illustrious men that France has produced during the last two centuries. The site of it was the gift of the confessor of Louis XIV., whose name was Père la Chaise, and the cemetery is called after him. Numbers of visitors pass through its gates every day, but no visit to this grand old Necropolis has ever been so productive of such great and beneficent results as that of Miss de Broen on the day in question.

Only a few hours previously the cemetery had received a notable addition to the number of its silent tenants. Five hundred Communists had been shot there, and the long ditch into which they fell, one after the other, was their common grave. The friends of these infatuated, frenzied men, their wives and children, now surrounded the spot, bitterly mourning. Some had brought a little black cross, bearing the name of the lost husband, or father, or son; some carried wreaths of immortelles as tokens of their loving remembrance. A few were silent in their deep grief, but the majority gave utterance to cries of rage and revenge.

They proved singularly open, however, to words of kindness, and all who were spoken to listened with grateful attention to the Christian lady while she spoke of the Saviour and the unfailing consolations of the Gospel, and accepted gladly the portions of Scripture given to them.

One poor woman was so wild in her sorrow that Miss de Broen ventured to speak a few words of sympathy to her, adding, tenderly, "It is sad for you to lose what you have loved." "Ah!" replied the woman, "you do not know what it is. I have lost all!" "You have not lost the love of God," was the answer. These simple words seemed to soothe the poor bleeding heart, and, thus encouraged, Miss de Broen spoke to several others, telling them that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," and pointing them to Him as the only Comforter.

Her interest in these wretched outcasts did not end here. She resolved to remain in Paris and devote her time and energies to the miserable people of Belleville, for she felt that, though guilty, they were not too bad for the love of Christ to reach them. Her resolution was received with surprise and disapproval. The quartier was considered abnormally unsafe. No soldiers, even, would dare to enter its haunts, excepting in imposing companies, and for a lady to take up work there was pronounced to be monstrous. But the harrowing spectacle in Père la Chaise had shown Miss de Broen the need these people had to hear of the Saviour's love, and as she left her friends, after having made known to them her proposal, with tears in her eyes she said, "If God has put the thought into my heart,

HE WILL SEND THE MONEY."

The money requisite to commence the mission and for one year's operations was speedily forthcoming, and that, too, in the most singular manner. Two gentlemen came to Paris to dispose of some money remaining over from the funds provided by the Society of Friends for the victims of the recent war. It was determined to hand over this sum to Miss de Broen for the furtherance of her generous scheme, and from that day to this she has heroically worked in humble dependence upon the help of heaven, meeting only with the respect and confidence of the inhabitants of that ill-omened Parisian faubourg.

For the first time the novel sight was witnessed in the streets of Belleville of a lady passing to and fro speaking to the women, and telling them that she knew of their distress, and that if they would come to a room lent to her in La Villette they would receive a small sum for three hours' needlework, at the same time adding that her chief object was to tell them about the Lord Jesus Christ. Her invitation was accepted, though it sounded strangely in the ears of all, and many wondered what it could really mean. Only three attended the first meeting; eight came the next time, and then the numbers steadily increased.

A few months pass away, and the group of women are gathered at the sewing-class. But what a change a few months have made! The sullenness and fierceness have died away from their countenances, and are replaced by an earnest, nay, even a softened expression. Love has won their hearts, and, best of all, the marks of a real change, through the inward working of the Holy Spirit, are seen in many of them.

The ignorance of the poor women whom Miss de Broen gathered around her was surprising. One day, when she asked the question, "Who wrote the Bible?" a woman looked up and nodded, and then said readily, as if a very bright idea had struck her, "C'est vous, Mademoiselle" ("You did, Ma'am").

The women began to tell at home what they heard at the sewing meetings; then their husbands thought they would like to hear it too. Finding that many of them really longed to know the Gospel, Miss de Broen instituted which were held two evenings a week, Christian gentlemen coming from Paris to conduct them. The room, being near a thoroughfare, was soon filled, for passers-by came in also, until 250, or more, were assembled, many of whom were obliged to stand.

Madame Dugand, the wife of a French pasteur, near the Champs Elysée, Paris, with whom Miss de Broen lived during most of the first year of her mission work at Belleville, has asserted that "she worked with the energy of ten men, and had to bear all kinds of persecutions." Every morning, even in the depth of winter, when the snow was on the ground, she started upon her journey of three miles, that she might resume her work, and, taking some cold luncheon with her, she remained in Belleville all day. "The suffering and sorrow I witnessed during this period of my work," says Miss de Broen, "are beyond all description." Sometimes even aged people were found lying on the floor, the bedstead and other furniture having been broken up for firewood during the terrible siege.

Noticing that whenever a soldier came in sight the women turned away, Miss de Broen asked one of them why they did so. "I cannot bear to see a soldier: it cuts me to the heart," was her answer, for it reminded her of the fighting between the Communists and the soldiers. On one occasion she gave a warm red flannel petticoat to a poor woman who had been very ill in consequence of the shock she received during the horrors of the siege. One very cold day, when Miss de Broen called to see her, she found that her gift had been put away, so she asked why she did not wear it. After some hesitation she said, "Ah, miss, if you could only give me one of another color! You know it is red. I have seen so much human blood in the streets I cannot bear the sight of red." speaking of the first time Miss de Broen went to see her, said, "I shall never forget it. She prayed with me; I had never heard any prayer like it before. C'était comme une conversation que l'on avait avec Dieu." (It was like holding a conversation with God). "It touched me so much I could not help crying, and yet it comforted me. Previously I repeated a certain number of prayers as a duty, but now I have learnt to speak to God as my Father. What is the use of praying to saints when we can go straight to God?"

A POOR WIDOW,

The mission work developed in so many different directions that Miss de Broen was often deeply affected by the distress which came daily before her, but which, single handed, she could neither remove nor diminish. Her work seemed like a drop in the ocean; she longed for and prayed that the Lord of the harvest would speedily send them. Just at this time she was present at a service in the Rev. Baron Hart's chapel, in the Rue Royale. The pasteur read a letter which he had received from an English Congregational minister, who was wishing to preach the Gospel among the Paris workmen, but owing to the recurrence and multiplication of difficulties, he began to think that it could not be the Lord's will that he should do it. He therefore asked God's children to pray that the way might be made very plain to him.

Miss de Broen heard the letter read, and at once hailed it as an answer to her prayer for "more laborers." She therefore wrote to the minister in question, begging him to come, concluding her communication by saying, "Only come, and the Lord will bless you." A few weeks afterwards she had the joy of welcoming Mr. and Mrs. McAll to Paris, and has ever since witnessed, with the most grateful satisfaction, the extension and usefulness of their noble work among the masses of La Villette, Belleville, Paris, and Lyons.

Besides the Gospel meetings and sewing classes, Miss de Broen felt the urgent necessity for originating NIGHT SCHOOLS.

Her offer to teach any who liked to come being widely accepted, it was a most interesting sight to see fathers and sons sitting side by side spelling out words or patiently learning to write, the proverbial volatility of Frenchmen giving place to the most steady and resolute perseverance.

At the end of her first year's work the funds supplied by the Society of Friends had come to an end, and, as they had undertaken to support a mission at Boulogne on the Seine, they could not give further help at Paris. What was to be done? The work must go on, and the need of money was laid before the Lord in prayer. The answer quickly came, but in a most unexpected way.

A friend, in writing to Miss de Broen from England, mentioned that she had received a letter from a gentleman, then in America, in which he spoke of his visit to her mission at Belleville; and she added, "His impression having been that you need more money to carry it on, I am willing to give some help." Thus encouraged, the devoted lady went courageously forward step by step, always desiring that it might be a work of faith in the ever-living God.

The holy enterprise now increased so rapidly that Miss de Broen determined to live in Belleville, that she might always be among the people; so she hired a house and invited ladies from England to help her. From that time she has had a little band of voluntary workers always with her, who devote their time and strength to the work.

And thus year by year the Mission has steadily increased, and now consists of the following

IMPORTANT BRANCHES:

A medical mission, sewing-classes, girls' day school, night schools, general meetings for men and women four times a week. Sunday-school for children and adults, training home for young nursery-maids, Bible classes, visits to the homes of the men and women, a free library, and a depot for the sale of Bibles and Testaments. The entire expense for carrying on this magnificent work for Christ is under $10,000 per annum. Well-defined and unmistakable evidences of the divine blessing are continually appearing. Take the following: The number of suicides in Paris has increased of late years to an appalling extent. In 1873 it was computed by the official authorities that five thousand committed suicide, while fifty years previously, in 1822, there were only 200. One man who attended the Belleville Mission Hall told Miss de Broen's Evangelist—who is a converted Roman Catholic—that his wife and children were starving because he had no work, and that he was on the point of committing suicide, but, he added, "I happened to open the Bible you gave me; my eye fell on that passage which tells of judgment to come, and I dared not rush unprepared into the presence of the Judge."

The last few years many of the French, and those in large towns more especially, having lost faith in "the religion of the priests," as they call it, have become either libre penseurs (free-thinkers) or totally indifferent. More than half of those who apply at Miss de Broen's dispensary, say, "How can we believe in what the priests teach when they do not believe it themselves?" or, "The questions asked at confession are disgusting." The priests, for the sake of money, openly lend themselves to falsehood, and it is a current saying in France, "We have a religion in which everything can be had for the buying." Some go so far as to say, "It is a religion about a God who can be bought," and with bitterness add, "It is a religion for the rich, and not for the poor," for they know full well that absolution, indulgences, masses for the dead, may all be had for payment.

A LITTLE ORPHAN BOY,

a member of Miss de Broen's night school, went one day to the priest to ask that some prayers might be said for his mother, who had recently died. "The charge is ten francs," said the priest; "have you the money?" "No," replied the boy, "but I will earn it and pay you later—do say the prayers," adding, with tears in his eyes, "It was mother's last wish." "Ah!" said the priest, "that won't do. I have been taken in so before, and I won't be taken in again." This is one out of many instances of the mercenary, heartless character of the priests.

Among the girls in Miss de Broen's Training Home is BERTHE, AN ORPHAN.

Her life has been a very sad one. Her mother being a widow, and too ill to work, the child was sent out to lead an old blind man about the streets, and was thus often in low cafés and bad company.

One cold wintry day the poor woman went to Miss de Broen's dispensary, and the doctor saw at a glance that she was in the last stage of consumption. When the lady visitors went to see her in her home they found her in a very small room, without fire or light, and they learned that when she could bear the cold no longer she used to crawl across the street to warm herself by a neighbor's fire. She said she was willing to die if only some one would care for her child.

Miss de Broen visited her frequently, telling her the simple Gospel message. She also gave her a New Testament, which she read eagerly. One day the poor woman said, "Oh that I had only known it before! I hope to be able to read it through before I die." At length she passed away, rejoicing in the Lord as her Saviour. Her orphan child and the Evangelist followed her to the grave, and then Berthe was taken into Miss de Broen's Home.

In one part of Belleville there are low, narrow streets of the foulest kind; dark alleys and wretched abodes—in fact, a nest for the worst of characters. Three years ago three of the lady visitors resolved to make a special effort to carry the Gospel into this

DARK DEN OF INIQUITY.

Accordingly one Sunday afternoon they invited a few of the people to come to one of the courts to hear about God. It was a strange scene. At first only a few men and women in tattered garments gathered round them; then gradually one head after another was poked out of the windows above. Very soon a staircase outside one of the houses was filled, then a small balcony, crowded with hearers, began to groan under their weight, and the meeting passed off very quietly and successfully.

In this court a soup kitchen is now open thrice a week, on which occasion the Bible is read and explained, and Gospel hymns are sung. The Sunday afternoon meetings are now held in a wine shop, rented by Miss de Broen for the purpose, and it is a rough set of men and women who are thus gathered there. Many are in rags; some are so unkempt that they look quite wild. When the meeting is over the wine shop is immediately transformed into a ragged school, and it is crowded to the very doors.

Lord Shaftesbury says: "A great part of the problem of 'Woman's Mission' is shown by the life and actions of Miss de Broen. All women may learn from these singular details how great is the power of the female sex over the mightiest and fiercest of the human race. A woman—ay, even a young woman—earnest, decided, persevering, rich in piety and common-sense, with the love of Christ in her heart, and with a burning desire to impart it to others, becomes all but irresistible. While the Communists were in the midst of vengeance, orphanage, widowhood, and ghastly privations, this young lady, unguided, unprotected, and alone, began her marvellous and Christian career."

And thus in the very heart of La Belle France—for "Paris is France"—the work of God goes grandly on. And among the devoted laborers none need more fervent prayer for blessing than Miss de Broen and her small though faithful band of fellow-helpers, and none deserve a larger measure of the sympathy of evangelical Christians.

CATHERINE ALDERSON'S WIDOWHOOD.

In one of the outskirts of Amsterdam there lived, some time ago, an English family, which had taken up its abode there through an engineering undertaking which required the presence of two of its members, George Alderson and a younger brother. The work undertaken by the brothers was such as could have been intrusted only to men of unquestionable competency and considerable experience. Their plans proved successful, and so pleased were the company by whom they were employed with the execution of the work, that, on its completion, the elder brother was presented with $2,500, in addition to the sum agreed upon, as a mark of appreciation. Having had his share of loss and trouble before leaving England, this addition to his means was very welcome, and immediately on receiving the cheque he went home to tell his wife the good news.

Scarcely had he got there when a telegram came from England to the effect that a company for the liabilities of which he was partly responsible had collapsed, and that a sum which exceeded all his savings since he came to Holland would be required to meet the case. As if this calamity were not sufficient, he was seized the next day with gastric fever, and in three days more George Alderson was numbered with the dead.

His widow was a tender, delicate creature, brought up amid the comforts and refinements of an English rectory. Any one who observed her fragile form and sensitive face would have thought that a frail pleasure boat amid the billows of the Atlantic would not have been more helpless than she.

Her position was, in truth, most deplorable. Her husband was taken away from her, her property was gone, her father and mother were no more, and there she was in a foreign land well nigh overwhelmed with floods of trouble. In a few days after the funeral the landlord, who had heard of her husband's misfortunes, was heartless enough to demand immediate payment of half a year's rent, and, on being told that this could not possibly be done, threatened to turn her out of the house at once if the claim were not met—a threat which in less than a week he literally carried out. Being irritated by the remarks which the neighbors made about the proceeding, he was even more exacting and unfeeling than he would otherwise have been, and stoutly refused to allow the widow to retain a single article, except a linnet which her husband had greatly valued for its sweet note and as a gift from an English friend. Taking with her this one relic of the departed, Catherine Alderson left the house, but had only proceeded a few steps when, overcome by physical weakness, she sat down in utter desolation on a step close at hand.

One would have thought that nowhere beneath the sun could destitution more abject or misery more complete be found. But He who is "the father of the fatherless and the judge of the widow" had not forgotten Catherine Alderson. The brutal hardness of the man who had turned her out into the street made friends for her even among strangers, and when her way seemed completely blocked up, help came from quarters which none could have dreamed of. In her after years she had her full share of disappointment, trial and sickness, but the experiences of the first days of her widowhood were indelibly inscribed on her memory and heart. Those experiences were to her not merely mercies which had been, but pledges of guidance and succor through all life's journey. She loved to dwell upon what she had known and felt of God's goodness, as reasons for trusting His faithfulness to the end. In this respect her example is full both of instruction and reproof. Her life was indeed a beautiful commentary on her favorite text: "From the end of the earth will I cry unto Thee, when my heart is overwhelmed, lead me to the rock that is higher than I. For Thou hast been a shelter for me, and a strong tower from the enemy" (Ps. 61 : 2, 3).

With mettled horses at full speed, for he was celebrated for fast driving, Jehu, the warrior and king, returns from battle. But seeing Jehonadab, an acquaintance, by the wayside, he shouts "Whoa! whoa!" to the lathered span. Then leaning over to Jehonadab, Jehu salutes him in the words of the text—words not more appropriate for that hour and that place than for this hour and place,

IS THINE HEART RIGHT?

I should like to hear of your physical health. Well myself, I like to have everybody else well; and so might ask, Is your eyesight right, your hearing right, your nerves right, your lungs right, your entire body right? But I am busy to-day taking diagnosis of the more important spiritual conditions.

I should like to hear of your financial welfare. I want everybody to have plenty of money, ample apparel, large storehouse, and comfortable residence; and I might ask, Is your business right, your income right, your worldly surroundings right? But what are these financial questions compared with the inquiry as to whether you have been able to pay your debts to God; as to whether you are insured for eternity; as to whether you are ruining yourself by the long-credit system of the soul? I have known men to have no more than one loaf of bread at a time, and yet to own a government bond of heaven worth more than the whole material universe.

The question I ask you to-day is not in regard to your habits. I make no inquiry about your integrity, or your chastity, or your sobriety. I do not mean to stand on the outside of the gate and ring the bell; but coming up the steps I open the door and come to the private apartment of the soul; and with the earnestness of a man that must give an account for this day's work, I cry out, Oh, man, oh, woman immortal, Is thine heart right?

I will not insult you by an argument to prove that we are by nature all wrong. If there be a factory explosion, and the smoke-stack be upset, and the wheels be broken in two, and the engine unjointed, and the ponderous bars be twisted, and a man should look in and say that nothing was the matter, you would pronounce him a fool. Well, it needs no acumen to discover that and askew and unjointed. The thing doesn't work right. The biggest trouble we have in the world is with our souls.

Men sometimes say that though their lives may not be just right, their heart is all right. Impossible! A farmer never puts the poorest apples on top of his barrel; nor does the merchant place the meanest goods in his show-window. The best part of us is our outward life. I do not stop to discuss whether we all fell in Adam, for we have been our own Adam, and have all eaten of the forbidden fruit, and have been turned out of the paradise of holiness and peace; and though the flaming sword that stood at the gate to keep us out has changed position and comes behind to drive us in, we will not go.

The Bible account of us is not exaggerated when it says that we are poor and wretched, and miserable, and blind, and naked. Poor: the wretch that stands shivering on our doorstep on a cold day is not so much in need of bread as we are of spiritual help. Blind: why, the man whose eyes perished in the powder-blast, and who for these ten years has gone feeling his way from street to street, is not in such utter darkness as we. Naked: why, there is not one rag of holiness left to hide the shame of our sin. Sick: why, the leprosy has eaten into the head, and the heart, and the hands, and the feet; and the marasmus of an everlasting wasting away has already seized on some of us.

But the meanest thing for a man to do is to discourse about an evil without pointing

A WAY TO HAVE IT REMEDIED.

I speak of the thirst of your hot tongue only that I may show you the living stream that drops crystalline and sparkling from the Rock of Ages, and pours a river of gladness at your feet. If I show you the rents in your coat, it is only because the door of God's wardrobe now swings open, and here is a robe, white with the fleece of the Lamb of God, and of a cut and make that an angel would not be ashamed to wear. If I snatch from you the black, mouldy bread that you are munching, it is only to give you the bread made out of the finest wheat that grows on the celestial hills, and baked in the fires of the cross, and one crumb of which would be enough to make all heaven a banquet. Hear it, one and all, and tell it to your friends when you go home, that the Lord Jesus Christ can make the heart right.

I. First we need

A REPENTING HEART.

If for the last ten, twenty, or forty years of life we have been going on in the wrong way, it is time that we turned around and started in the opposite direction. If we offend our friends, we are glad to apologize. God is our best friend, and yet how many of us have never apologized for the wrongs we have done Him!

There is nothing that we so much need to get rid of as sin. It is a horrible black monster. It polluted Eden. It killed Christ. It has blasted the world. Men keep dogs in kennels, and rabbits in a warren, and cattle in a pen. What a man that would be who would shut them up in his parlor. But this foul dog of sin, and these herds of transgression, we have entertained for many a long year in our heart, which should be the cleanest, brightest room in all our nature. Out with the vile herd! Begone, ye befoulers of an immortal nature! Turn out the beasts, and let Christ come in!

A heathen came to an early Christian who had the reputation of curing diseases. The Christian said, "You must have all your idols destroyed." The heathen gave to the Christian the key to his house, that he might go in and destroy the idols. He battered to pieces all he saw, but still the man did not get well. The Christian said to him, "There must be some idol in your house not yet destroyed." The heathen confessed that there was one idol of beaten gold that he could not bear to give up. After a while, when that was destroyed, in answer to the prayer of the Christian the sick man got well.

Many a man has awakened in his dying hour to find his sins all about him. They clambered up on the right side of the bed, and on the left side, and over the headboard, and over the footboard, and horribly devoured the soul.

"Repent! the voice celestial cries;
Nor longer dare delay;
The wretch that scorns the mandate, dies,
And meets a fiery day."

II. Again, we need

A BELIEVING HEART.

A good many years ago a weary one went up one of the hills of Asia Minor, and with two logs on his back cried out to all the world, offering to carry their sins and sorrows. They pursued Him. They slapped Him in the face. They mocked Him. When He groaned they groaned. They shook their fists at Him. They spit on Him. They hounded Him as though He were a wild beast. His healing of the sick, His sight-giving to the blind, His mercy to the outcast silenced not the revenge of the world. His prayers and benedictions were lost in that whirlwind of execration. Away with Him! Away with Him!

Ah! it was not merely the two pieces of wood that he carried: it was the transgressions of the race, the anguish of the ages, the wrath of God, the sorrows of hell, the stupendous interests of an unending eternity. No wonder His back bent. No wonder the blood started from every pore. No wonder that He crouched under a torture that made the sun faint, and the everlasting hills tremble, and the dead rush up in their winding-sheets as He cried, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." But the cup did not pass. None to comfort!

THERE HE HANGS!

What has that hand done that it should be thus crushed in the palm? It has been healing the lame and wiping away tears. What has that foot been doing that it should be so lacerated? It has been going about doing good. Of what has the victim been guilty? Guilty of saving a world. Tell me, ye heavens and earth, was there ever such another criminal? Was there ever such a crime? On that hill of carnage, that sunless day, amid those howling rioters, may not your sins and mine have perished? I believe it.

Oh, the ransom has been paid. Those arms of Jesus were stretched out so wide that when He brought them together again they might embrace the world. Oh that I might, out of the blossoms of the spring, or the flaming foliage of the autumn, make one wreath for my Lord! Oh that all the triumphal arches of the world could be swung in one gateway, where the King of Glory might come in! Oh that all the harps and trumpets and organs of earthly music might, in one anthem, speak His praise!

But what were earthly flowers to Him who walketh amid the snow of the white lilies of Heaven! What were arches of earthly masonry to Him who hath about His throne a rainbow spun out of everlasting sunshine! What were all earthly music to Him when the hundred and forty and four thousand on one side, and the cherbuim, and seraphim, and archangels stand on the other side, and all the space between is filled with the doxologies of eternal jubilee!—the hosannah of a redeemed earth, the hallelujah of unfallen angels, song after song rising about the throne of God and of the Lamb. In that pure, high place, let Him hear us.

STOP! HARPS OF HEAVEN, that our poor cry may be heard.

Oh, my Lord Jesus! it will not hurt Thee for one hour to step out from the shining throng. They will make it all up when Thou goest back again. Come hither, O Blessed One, that we may kiss Thy feet. Our hearts, too long withheld, we now surrender into Thy keeping. When Thou goest back, tell it to all the immortals that the lost are found, and let Thy Father's house ring with the music and the dance.

They have some old wine in Heaven, not used except in rare festivities. In this world, those who are accustomed to use wine on great occasions bring out the beverage and say, "This wine is thirty years old," or "forty years old." But the wine of Heaven is more than eighteen centuries old. It was prepared at the time when Christ trod the wine-press alone. When such grievous sinners as we come back, methinks the chamberlain of Heaven cries out to the servants, "This is unusual joy! Bring up from the vaults of Heaven that old wine. Fill all the tankards. Let all the white-robed guests drink to the immortal health of these new-born sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty." There is joy in Heaven among the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth; and God grant that that one may be you!

III. Again, in order to have a right heart it must be

A FORGIVING HEART.

An old writer says, "To render good for evil is God-like; good for good is man-like; evil for good is devil-like." Which of these natures have we? Christ will have nothing to do with us as long as we keep any old grudge. We have all been cheated and lied about. There are people who dislike us so much that if we should come down to poverty and disgrace, they would say, "Good for him! Didn't I tell you so?" They never have understood us, and never will. They do not want to understand us.

Unsanctified human nature says, Wait till you get a good crack at him, and when at last you find him in a tight place, give it to him. Flay him alive. No quarter. Leave not a rag of reputation. Jump on him with both feet. Pay him in his own coin—sarcasm for sarcasm, scorn for scorn, abuse for abuse. But, my friends, that is not the right kind of heart. No man ever did so mean a thing toward us as we have done toward God. And if we cannot forgive others, how can we expect God to forgive us? Thousands of men have been kept out of Heaven by an unforgiving heart.

Here is some one who says, "I will forgive that man the wrong he did me about that house and lot; I will forgive that man who overreached me in a bargain; I will forgive that man who sold me a shoddy overcoat; I forgive them—all but one. That man I cannot forgive. The villain—I can hardly keep my hands off of him. If my going to Heaven depends on my forgiving Him, then I will stay out." Wrong feeling! If a man lie to me once, I am not called to trust him again. If a man betray me once, I am not called to put confidence in him again. But I would not dare to go to sleep at night if I could not offer a sincere prayer for the temporal and everlasting welfare of all men, whatever meannesses and outrage they have inflicted upon me. If you want to get your heart right, strike a match, and burn up all your old grudges, and blow the ashes away. "If you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive you your trespasses."

An old Christian black woman was going along the streets of New York with a basket of apples that she had for sale. A rough sailor ran against her and upset the basket, and stood back expecting to hear her scold frightfully; but she stooped down and picked up the apples, and said, "God forgive you, my son, as I do." The sailor saw the meanness of what he had done, and felt in his pocket for his money, and insisted that she should take it all. Though she was black, he called her mother, and said, "Forgive me, mother; I will never do anything so mean again."

Ah! there is a power in a forgiving spirit to overcome all hardness. There is no way of conquering men like that of bestowing upon them your pardon, whether they will accept it or not.

IV. Again, a right heart is

AN EXPECTANT HEART.

It is a poor business to be building castles in the air. Enjoy what you have now. Don't spoil your comfort in the small house because you expect a larger one. Don't fret about your income when it is three or four dollars per day, because you expect to have after a while ten dollars per day; or ten thousand a year, because you expect it to be twenty thousand a year. But about heavenly things, the more we think the better. Those castles are not in the air, but on the hills, and we have a deed of them in our possession.

I like to see a man all full of Heaven. He talks Heaven. He sings Heaven. He prays Heaven. He dreams Heaven. Some of us in our sleep have had the good place open to us. We saw the pinnacles in the sky. We heard the click of the hoofs of the white horses on which victors rode, and the clapping of the cymbals of eternal triumph. And while in our sleep we were glad that all of our sorrows were over, and burdens done with, the throne of God grew whiter, whiter and whiter, till we opened our eyes and saw that it was only the sun of the earthly morning shining on our pillow. To have a right heart you need to be filled with this expectancy. It would make your privations and annoyances more bearable.

In the midst of the city of Paris stands, or did stand, a statue of the good, but broken-hearted Josephine. I never imagined that marble could be smitten into such tenderness. It seems not lifeless. If the spirit of Josephine be disentabernacled, the soul of the Empress has taken possession of this figure. I am not yet satisfied that it is stone. The puff of the dress on the arm seems to need but the pressure of the finger to indent it. The figure at the bottom of the robe, the ruffle at the neck, the fur lining on the dress, the embroidery of the satin, the cluster of lily and leaf and rose in her hand, the poise of her body as she seems to come sailing out of the sky, her face calm, humble, beautiful, but yet sad—attest the genius of the sculptor and the beauty of the heroine he celebrates. Looking up through the rifts of the coronet that encircles her brow, I could see the sky beyond, the great heavens where all woman's wrongs shall be righted, and the story of endurance and resignation shall be told to all the ages. The rose and the lily in the hand of Josephine will never drop their petals.

The children of God, whether they suffer on earth, in palaces, or in hovels, shall come to that glorious rest.

at thy gate we set down all our burdens and griefs. The place will be full. Here there are vacant chairs at the hearth, and at the table, but there are no vacant chairs in Heaven. The crowns all worn; the thrones all mounted.

Some talk of Heaven as though it were a very handsome church, where a few favored spirits would come in and sit down on finely-cushioned seats all by themselves, and sing psalms to all eternity. No, no. "I saw a great multitude that no man could number, standing before the throne. He that talked with me had a golden reed to measure the city, and it was twelve thousand furlongs"—that is, fifteen hundred miles in circumference. Ah! Heaven is not a little colony, at one corner of God's dominion, where a man's entrance depends upon what kind of clothes he has on his back, and how much money he has in his purse; but a vast empire. God grant that the light of that blessed world may shine upon us in our last moment.

The roughest time we had in crossing the ocean was at the mouth of Liverpool harbor. We arrived at nightfall, and were obliged to lie there till the morning, waiting for the rising of the tide, before we could go up to the city. How the vessel pitched and writhed in the water. So sometimes the last illness of the Christian is a struggle. He is almost through the voyage. The waves of temptation toss his soul, but he waits for the morning.

At last the light dawns, and the tides of joy rise in his soul, and he sails up and casts anchor within the veil.

ARE YOU READY?

Is thine heart right? Have you within you a repenting heart, a believing heart, a forgiving heart, an expectant heart? If not, I must write upon your soul what George Whitefield wrote upon the window-pane with his diamond ring. He tarried in an elegant house over night, but found that there was no God recognized in that house. Before he left his room in the morning, with his ring he wrote upon the window-pane, "One thing thou lackest." After the guest was gone, the housewife came up and looked at the window, and saw the inscription, and called her husband and her children; and God, through that ministry of the window-glass, brought them all to Jesus. Though you may to-day be surrounded by comforts and luxuries, and feel that you have need of nothing, if you are not the children of God, with the signet-ring of Christ's love, let me inscribe upon your souls, "One thing thou lackest."

I pray you that, whatever else you may miss, you may not miss Heaven. It is too bright a home to lose. Your soul has been bought at too dear a price. I preach to you of the blood that cleanseth from all sin. Casting all your sins behind you. I beg of you to start this morning for the Kingdom. "Yes," you say, "I will start, but not now."

William III. made proclamation, when there was a revolution in the north of Scotland, that all who came and took the oath of allegiance by the 31st of December should be pardoned. MacIan, a chieftain of a prominent clan, resolved to return with the rest of the rebels, but had some pride in being the very last one that should take the oath. He postponed starting for this purpose until two days before the expiration of the term.

A snow-storm impeded his way, and before he got up to take the oath and receive a pardon from the throne the time was up and past. While the others were set free, MacIan was miserably put to death. He started too late and arrived too late. In like manner some of you are in prospect of losing forever the amnesty of the Gospel. Many of you are going to be forever too late. Remember the irreparable mistake of MacIan!

A BROKEN VOW.

Wearisome months had passed since Jane Seaforth had been compelled to acknowledge herself a hopeless invalid. Months, alas! of unsubmissive repining. How could she endure this blighting of every hope, in the very spring-time of her existence? A darkened room, days and nights of suffering, instead of the cheerful sunshine and eager partaking of earthly pleasure, which had once filled up her life. Why was she singled out to bear this affliction, while her young companions were rejoicing in health and happiness? These were the thoughts which filled her mind. She could not discern the hand of a kind Father, removing every obstacle that she might throw herself into His loving arms; taking away the poor passing joys of earth that she might seek those which are forevermore at God's right hand.

In answer to fervent prayer, the Holy Spirit was poured out upon the community where Jane resided, and her young friends who had been converted became deeply anxious that she too might be a subject of renewing grace. She was grateful to them for the kindness with which they had ministered to her bodily wants, and now, when her spiritual necessity was the source of their solicitude, she listened to their appeals with attention and respect, but alas! with utter indifference.

Her companions requested the privilege of holding their weekly prayer-meeting in her room. She coldly gave her consent, but it was evident that they were irksome to her. At length, at the third meeting, when her friends, discouraged, were almost persuaded that she was given over to hardness of heart, she seemed moved by the fervent prayers on her behalf, especially by those which related to the restoration of her health, and said, "If God will give me back my health, I will serve Him the rest of my days."

Did He take her at her word? Certain it is that from this time, to the astonishment of all, she began slowly to recover from what was considered a hopeless disease. She seemed for a time full of love and gratitude to God for His mercy, and gave evidence of having yielded her heart to Him. And now came the time for her companions to make a public profession of their faith in Christ. They urged her, although she was still too feeble to leave the house, to send in her name as a candidate for admission, but she declined, saying, "The first Sabbath I am able to be in church I shall certainly unite with it."

Time passed on; she was fully recovered, and had been in church, not once but many times, and yet she showed no inclination to fulfil her promise. Having thus broken her solemn covenant to unite with His people, she took the next step away from God and His service by absenting herself from the sanctuary, and spending the day in pleasure. Her religious friends prayed for her, remonstrated with her in vain. Her reply to them was that she had changed her mind, and she now thought herself too young to settle down to a religious life.

They turned away in sadness. God had visited their friend in chastisement by a distressing illness, and then in great mercy by restoring her health, and neither the rod nor the blessing had won her to His service; what remained but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation?

How soon these forebodings were realized! While Jane was looking forward to years of earthly happiness, and confidently counting upon the convenient season when she would prepare for death, the decree had gone forth, "This night thy soul shall be required of thee." While riding with a party of gay companions her horse became unmanageable, and threw her with great violence to the ground; she was taken up insensible, remained in that state a short time, and then reviving uttered the cry, "Mercy, my God," and passed into eternity.

Did the gracious Saviour hear that last despairing cry, or had she scorned His discipline of judgment and of mercy until she was suddenly destroyed, and that without remedy? We cannot tell, but the lesson of this providence is written as in characters of fire, "To-day, if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts."

JAMES GRAHAM'S BUSH LIFE IN AUSTRALIA.

Home Ties Broken—Family Prayer on the Last Morning—Good-by to Mother—A Robin's Encouragement—A Providential Escape—A Captain's Orgies—The Black Squall—A Partnership Dissolved—Landing in a New Country.

It was by the early dawn of an autumn morning, in the year 1832, that James Graham left his father's house, in one of the counties of Ulster, Ireland to emigrate to Australia. He had spent twenty-two years in the warm home under that straw-thatched roof. There his spirit had opened to the love of father, mother, brothers, and sisters, and he could not leave it without tender movements of the heart.

No one, except the two youngest boys, went to bed on that night before "James's convoy" left Sycamore farm-house; and both these were up hours before day to hear the talk of servants and gossips around the ingle-nook in the kitchen, and to mix with cousins, uncles, aunts, and neighbors in the parlor festivities. Nearly all the talk was about James's past, present, and future. He himself divided his attentions between both circles till the hour came for departing, for he had to walk some five miles to the nearest post-town to say farewell to his sister, and take coach for his seaport to embark for Liverpool.

His form was erect and vigorous, as usual; but his tones were in a minor key, and his countenance thoughtful. Indeed, as he patted the dusky head of his faithful old friend "Dragon," and looked for the last time into the affectionate face of the old dog, the tears gathered in his eyes. The loudly expressed parting sorrows of servants and neighbors he bore right manfully; but to bid farewell to his mother, that was the test of strength.

The usually strong voice of his father led in prayer, asking a valedictory blessing on the eldest son then leaving the family circle. That firm voice was rather husky and more than once trembled; but the act and attitude of prayer gave a much-coveted opportunity for relief by tears to mother and son.

The elder Graham, true to his paradoxical nature—of hiding love where most he loved—soon appeared quite calm, if not joyful, and with soldierly promptitude—for he was an old soldier—told his son it was time to go, or he would not have time to say farewell to Mary. James screwed his courage up, and bade adieu to his two younger brothers and all who were not to be of "the convoy." He embraced his mother and broke down into tears, for he felt it like rending his heart to part with that best and wisest and ever-loving friend.

Agnes Graham, amid sobs and tears, told her son if he did not do well to be sure to return soon to his father and mother's house, and make God his friend. What a picture of grief and love was that mother, standing with clasped hands and streaming eyes, looking after her son and the company that escorted him, till a turn in the road hid him from her eyes! Her youngest two sons wept in sympathy by her side. She soon, however, went to her stronghold—that little closet off the parlor, where she often found a throne of grace and a Father that seeth in secret.

There she formed the resolution to pray thrice a day for her first-born son, till either he returned home or she should be called to her home in heaven. She had long been acquainted with grief. She was the last survivor of her father's once numerous family. She had mourned over the early death of her second daughter; and by the golden locks had, with her own hand, drawn her third daughter out of the well where she was drowned.

To use a borrowed figure, Mrs. Graham's "heart was a passion-flower that inclosed the crown of thorns and the cross of Christ." She took her sorrows, however, as the appointment of far-reaching paternal love; and this additional one, inflicted by the departure of her manly, loving, yet impulsive, inexperienced James, was another thorn that touched the quick, but for the bearing of which she sought grace to help in time of need.

While the two brothers next in age to James, with his father and friends, accompanied him, a trifling incident somewhat diverted his grief. A redbreast came out of the holly hedge and hopped at the distance of a few paces before them for upward of a furlong, then, mounting the topmost spray of a bush in the hedge, poured forth his hearty song in the sun's rising beams, as if saying to the pensive company, and especially to the young emigrant, "Cheer up. He who feeds me without storehouse or barn will care for and sustain thee, O thou of little faith."

James knew the little favorite, and had long held sacred its nest under the root of the great white poplar in the bank over the horse-pond. Had his heart uttered itself it would have replied, "Farewell, little friend—a long farewell. You are near your nest, but I am going to put the ocean between me and mine; your sun is rising, but clouds are in my sky."

Every step helped to take him from the old familiar scenes that had woven their memories into the vital tissues of his warm heart. In another hour he had bidden his only sister adieu with a tenderness next to that of parting with his mother. She thrust into his hand a gift of money he would need; and, taking his seat on the mail-coach, he waved his last adieu to the hearts that in this wide world loved him best. Next evening, with Jerrold Lock, the companion of his travel, he saw the shores of Derry Lough recede from the ship that left Ireland and home behind. Never before did he feel as he felt then. With his last view of the country he said, what often he had sung, "Erin mavourneen, Erin go-bragh."

The following is the account of his voyage given by James Graham some years afterward:

It was a great disappointment to us that we did not get by the vessel that bore our country's name—the Hibernia; but it was providential for us we did not, for she was burnt on the voyage. We could not wait for the unexpected delay of the Hibernia, and the agent in Liverpool would not return our passage money till we applied to the mayor of the town.

The next vessel bound for Australia was the ship William, belonging to A. E. S. & Co. She was a poor little craft of 350 tons burden, but buffeted the waves nobly, or rather was badly cuffed and shaken by them; and, after a passage of four months and four days, landed us safely at Hobart Town, Van Diemen's Land. We sailed on November 6th, 1832, and landed March 10th of the next year, being rather more than four months on the voyage.

To old sailors the voyage would, I suppose, have appeared nothing extraordinary; to me it was all new then, and it still seems checkered with the awful, the horrible, and the amusing. We encountered a stiff gale in the Bay of Biscay, which carried away our jibboom and part of our bulwarks. It also carried away, from living graves to Davy's locker, several vociferous Irish pigs, and a lot of poultry and ducks which Neptune snatched from first cabin passengers; but both cabin and steerage passengers (Lock and I were of the latter) were too sick to perceive how the sea-god was working toward the equality, though not to the liberty and fraternity, of us mortals.

When the gale abated, and all was again made snug, we got on tolerably well till, when nearing the Cape, our captain died. He was as much the votary of Bacchus as of Neptune; indeed, he appeared only to serve the one that he might worship the other day and night. He did not make his appearance on deck for days, and when at last he came up, with bloated purple cheeks and eyes like boiled gooseberries, he appeared very ill able to take either himself or us to port. His brother, however, was first mate, and a good sailor, and kept the vessel right.

The next time the captain came up the Union Jack was wrapped round him; and, with weights to head and feet, there was launched on his last voyage another victim of the bottle. It was really horrible to think of the wreck of such a noble-looking fellow, and to hear the sullen plunge that consigned him to the gulfs and monsters of the deep. It was also horrible to reflect on what might be our own fate under the care of his brother, a comparatively untried man. Not long before he had been carpenter, and was now raised over the second mate, who, on the ground of longer service, clamorously contended to take the command. It might have risen to a mutiny but that we, the passengers, firmly took side with the first mate, and turned the scale in his favor.

Something still more frightful awaited us; for in a few days after the captain's death we were caught in a "black squall," as the sailors called it. The wind suddenly changed and backed the sails, and carried away our three topmasts and part of our rigging over the ship's side, while she was running sternways at the rate of seven knots an hour. The old boatswain, a very clever sailor, told me if they had been three minutes longer cutting away the wreck, we must all have gone to the bottom, as the ship's gunwales were under water, and the water was pouring down the main hatch in torrents, and to all human appearance every hope of safety had vanished.

But our brave sailors got the rigging and spars cut clear of the ship in a few minutes. She was got before the wind, and the stay and mainsail kept her clear of the heavy sea until the topmasts were put right again. Fortunately we had two carpenters aboard, who were passengers, and they greatly helped to expedite repairs. There were seventy-four souls on board, including crew and passengers; and this number, with their luggage, created not a little confusion in such small space. Indeed, our poor little craft was like a feather in the tempest, and we were shaken, and tossed about most unmercifully by the waves.

I never got such an awful idea of God as in that squall. What poor creatures were we in the grip of the ocean? and what is the ocean but a drop to Him? We reeled to and fro over the dreadful dance of the billows, and staggered from wave to wave like drunken men. And yet, there was something more sublime than the ocean in the collectedness of our old boatswain and the men in their efforts to set the ship right. Indeed, as often in scenes of danger I afterward proved, a power seems to awake and rise up in the soul that bids defiance to danger and death—a power that seems to say to them in the words of Christ, "Ye can only kill the body, but have no more that ye can do."

I must say I never have been calmer in all my life than when death appeared near, and I take no credit for it; for the narration is more exciting than the reality. Is it that danger stuns fear, or awakens a power not needed at other times? In fact, mosquitoes by land are worse than tigers, and the troubles of cooking are worse to steerage passengers than storms by sea. But if conscience be awakened and guilty, then there are two storms at once, and that in the bosom is the more terrible of the two.

I should tell you that my mate, Lock, and I dissolved partnership, after the gale in the Bay of Biscay. I need not say on what intimate terms we were, and how we had all things common as to sea-store and utensils. The sorrows of leaving home, and the pains of seasickness, for a while made our communion tolerable; but sympathy was too weak in us, and number one too strong in us for this to last.

Besides, as he was nearly twenty years older, and twice twenty years more prudent than I was, he thought I ought to defer and obey. It is true I was a soft fish, that kept my shell wide open; but he put in his finger too far, and got nipped. He was dreadfully seasick, and uttered by turns all sounds in the scale of human woe.

By the law of contradiction, this made me bear my sickness in silence. Passengers and sailors laughed at him as he rolled and roared. I sometimes laughed a ghastly laugh, but was angry at his drawing such unpleasant attention to us. Lock thought I ought to dissolve in sympathy for him, and would not believe I could be ill at all, as I made no noise.

I told him if I were to die, I should do so quietly, decently as a Christian; he did not think me one, or think I could do so. He daily taxed my humility by servile work, till I thought, as his appetite was improving, he should share the toils of cooking and cleaning. He persisted; and we came to division of luxuries and utensils. He would claim this, that, and the other thing, that I did not need, that he thought he did. I stood before him and said, "Jerrold, if there be a division it must go right through, or——" Through it went, and we parted; but soon I saw his superior diplomacy, which I often saw afterward.

He had lately, when recovering, been much in the society of an old gentleman and his daughter, who belonged to the Society of Friends, and were second-cabin passengers. Old Jeremiah and Miss Larder were fond of good tea and its savory etceteras, and had not only taste, but faculty, as the Yankees call it. Lock had similar taste and talent. I was deficient in the latter. He often made presents of our honey and raspberry vinegar to the Larders, and on the same principle as the prudent steward in the Gospel; for when he left me, as there was a berth in the second cabin vacant, he made all right with the steward of the ship, and the Larders took him into their more comfortable habitation. He had premeditated secession, and fixed his plan.

How fond he was of that word "plan!" He always had half a dozen "plans" hatching in his brain, which he carried so steadily leaning forward. From his gait you could know that he was afraid of injuring his "plans" by any violent motion. I was at first a little chagrined at being left without several articles I used, when we had all things common; but the removal of himself and his boxes left me more space, and took away part of the groanings of the creation. I soon grew social with my shipmates, many of whom proved unselfish, obliging fellows, whom I afterward met in the colonies.

The first mate, then captain, became my friend, and ordered all my cooking to be done for me, and let me walk on quarter-deck; and all things went smooth enough. After we crossed the line, we felt in want of part of that gale that we had got in surplus before. The prodigal wind was spent, and became insolvent. We got becalmed. Some of us rejoiced in swimming. One day I was out, and heard the old boatswain shouting to us to come on board. A boat was lowered for the others. I made my way, and was hauled up the vessel's side. The old tar had seen the shark's companion—or rather forerunner—a little fish swimming near the ship. In less than three minutes the water was bristling with the great coulter-like back-fins of a dozen of these ocean tigers, that I suppose smelt us from afar as vultures do their prey.

A piece of meat was put on a great hook, and by a line fastened to the capstain a huge shark was drawn on board. This was exciting play, and there was some danger in shunning the snap of the monster's teeth, and the strokes of his tail. Finally his great head was cut off, and a little tailor on board, who had a great knowledge of Scripture, proved the possibility of Jonah's going down the fish's throat; for he really passed through the open jaws of the shark, though not into "the fish's belly."

It was very pleasant, after spending more than the third of a year on board our little vessel, to pass up by Bruny Island one fine morning, and sailing through Storm Bay, perfectly calm, to drop anchor in the broad, beautiful Derwent, beside Hobart Town, and to hail mother earth and stretch one's crippled legs on shore.

Thomas Carlyle's Rebuke to an Irishman who complained of "Saxon oppression" is worthy of note at this time when the complaint is again a prominent subject of debate. The man moaning under his grievances was not a sober man, and Carlyle said to him: "No one oppresses thee, O free and independent franchiser; but does not this stupid pewter-pot oppress thee? No son of Adam can bid thee come or go; but this absurd pot of heavy wet, this can and does! Thou art the thrall, not of Cedric the Saxon, but of thy own brutal appetites and this scoured dish of liquor; and thou dost protest of thy liberty! Thou entire blockhead!"

DISTRESS OF NATIONS WITH PERPLEXITY.

"Ye can discern the face of the sky," our Lord said to the Pharisees and Sadducees, "but can ye not discern the signs of the times." He pointed out to them that though they were able to prognosticate what weather would probably follow certain appearances in the sky, and thus be prepared for a coming storm, in the more weighty matters of life the warnings were unheeded, because not understood. They had watched the sky until they observed that the red and lowering hue was followed by foul weather, but they had not noticed that in the government of the world God had established moral laws which operated with unchanging regularity, and effect followed cause in Providence as certainly as in nature. In short, that the God of creation adopted like methods in His government of men to those which He adopts in the regulation of the elements.

Our Lord's reproof implied the charge of a lack of intelligence as well as a lack of piety. Had they given to Moses and the prophets the same intelligent study they had given to the movements of the winds and clouds, they would not have been looking for an earthly king as a Messiah; and had they given a like intelligent study to the events occurring in their time, they would have known that the time had come when the Prince of Peace should appear. They would have been looking for Him, and they would have known by what signs to recognize Him when He came.

The same principle Christ adopted in dealing with John the Baptist. John was in prison, and could not see for himself what was going on, so he sent messengers to ask Jesus, "Art thou He that should come?" Jesus did not say, I am. He kept the messengers by His side, while He performed many wonderful works, and then said to them, "Go and shew John those things which ye do hear and see." He was confident that John would understand the signs. Can we suppose that when the report was given to John in his prison that the great preacher had any doubt who Jesus was? But of the world it was true that "The Light was shining in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not," and though "He came unto His own, His own received Him not."

Has a like blindness fallen on the Church and the world in our day? Again our Lord is coming; will He again find the Church and the world unprepared to receive Him? With a minuteness of detail as explicit as that of Old Testament prophecy, the circumstances which would herald His coming are described, and the manner of His coming is explained with equal exactness. As the brilliant assembly which filled the Capitol at Washington on the fourth of March knew that the inaugural procession had commenced its march when at half-past ten the sound of the first gun was heard, so we who await the coming of the Son of man should know from the signs of the times when He is about to appear, to summon those who are looking for Him to meet Him in the air. Not only ought the prophecies to be closely and anxiously studied with prayer for Divine light, but the events of our time ought to be watched, that we may see at what point in the line of predicted occurrences we stand.

Among other indications which were communicated to us to guide us in this matter, and to intimate to us that the first stage of the Second Coming would be near at hand, was the assurance that immediately before He came there would be a time, when "upon the earth" there would be "distress of nations, with perplexity . . . , men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." Such is the state of the world to-day.

A general sense of insecurity broods on the earth. Nation is moved against nation, and there is no land which does not contain within itself the elements of a social upheaval which threatens the overturn of order and government. Dangers external and internal menace the peace of every government. It is as if a ship with dynamite on board and containing among her crew mutinous and desparate men, is being driven by a gale toward a coast bristling with rocks. This view of the condition of the world is not held alone by men who are more familiar with their Bible than the newspaper. Observers who occupy a point of view purely secular are equally impressed with the same aspect of affairs. And it would seem that the more opportunities they have for forming an accurate estimate of the state of society throughout the world, the more forcibly is that opinion forced upon them.

The following extracts from an editorial in the New York Herald of April 1st, 1881, supplies abundant proof of the fact. That journal has trained correspondents in every land, whose duty it is to send reports of the state of affairs in the country where they are placed, and it may be supposed that upon those reports the editor based his comprehensive survey.

"The strained relations between Turkey and Greece have a special importance now, when we consider the assassination of the Czar and the advent to the imperial power of a sovereign who is believed to have ambitious plans for the development of his nation, and who is known to be a soldier of approved courage. If the question between Turkey and Greece related simply to the boundary lines between the two nations it might be easily adjusted. Nothing seems more certain (unless we misread the decrees of fate) than that the Turkish Empire in Europe must come to an end.

"With Greece fighting Turkey alone, it is in the power of the Sultan to destroy Greece. If Russia or Austria interferes, then there is no knowing where the contest may end. In fact,

EUROPE IS NOW IN A CRITICAL CONDITION.

The spirit of revolution is abroad. The Continent is burdened with standing armies, every peasant in Germany (as it is said) carrying a soldier on his back. France adds taxes to her budget in order that she may have greater armaments. Russia throbs with revolution, and is in the hands of a young and intrepid prince. It will need the wisdom and strength of conservative nations like England to prevent a conflict which may result in the most destructive and disastrous war of modern times.

"England should preserve herself for the struggle that cannot much longer be postponed in Europe. The peace of the world depends more on the strength of England, her moral force, and the wisdom of her ministers, than upon any other influence. The world sees now that if England had been wise at the close of the Franco-German war, or even at the beginning of that unfortunate strife, she might have forced upon the contending nations a peace which would have lasted as long as that which came after the battle of Waterloo.

"So long as France is in an unsatisfied mood, so long as her people feel that her honor was sacrificed at the time her territory was despoiled, so long as every Frenchman feels that his highest aim is to save money and buy arms, the contest on the Continent is adjourned. Russia may provoke it by new adventures in Turkey. Austria may be drawn in by an attempt to govern her newly acquired provinces with a strong hand; Germany may strike, as she wished to do not long since, the first blow in self-defence; Italy scarcely conceals her desire for Trieste and the Austrian provinces on the Adriatic; Greece, highly gifted, intellectual, flushed with new life, strong and animated by the memory of an ancient and illustrious lineage, may rashly bring on what may be the most desolating war of modern times. If England exercises her influence on the Continent, this war may be postponed. It may even be adjourned forever. As it is the outlook is dark enough, and it would be well for Americans to expect the worst and prepare for it."

A Missionary to New York.—It is Announced that Rev. Edward Judson, of Orange, N. J., has resigned his pastorate there in order to devote his energies to agressive missionary work in the lower part of New York City. Those who know the squalor and wretchedness, the depravity and practical heathenism abounding in those neighborhoods will appreciate very highly the sacrifice made by Mr. Judson in giving up a flourishing church to take up so arduous a task. Mr. Judson is the son of the famous missionary to Burmah.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Deadlock in the Senate is Causing Serious inconvenience throughout the country. While the contest over the offices continues, the nominations remain in abeyance, and several of the district courts are closed and business suspended because there are no judges. Meanwhile the speeches of Senators are made up of personal and sectional accusation and recrimination. An unsuccessful attempt was made last week to induce Judge Robertson to withdraw from the collectorship contest. The Stalwarts are believed to be as firmly resolved as ever to oppose his confirmation; but there is an influential section in the Senate, steadily increasing in numbers, and comprising members of both parties, who are resolved to oppose the power of party bosses whenever it rears its head. That section will support the President in the Robertson matter, not because they care one way or the other about this particular nomination, but because they desire to see the Executive untrammeled in the exercise of its legitimate functions. The growth of this independent party will, it is hoped, secure to the people appointments of men whose claims are based on administrative ability instead of on services they have rendered to the party. That will certainly be a beneficial change, if it can be effected, although it is matter for regret that the struggle should take place over nominations doubtful in themselves, as are some of those made by President Garfield.

The Triumph of Filth.—The Politicians at Albany accepted a substitute for the New York Street Cleaning Bill, on Thursday, April 7th, which deprives the scheme of all beneficial power. The vote by which this decision was carried was 66 against 55, all but ten of the latter being Democrats, and all of the former being Republicans. The men who spend their lives in the service of the people often complain that their services are forgotten by an ungrateful public; but the sixty-six Assemblymen who recorded their votes on Thursday are not likely to to have that cause for complaint; they will not be forgotten. When the heat of a summer sun is poured on the heaps of filth and decaying garbage in the streets of the city, and when the citizens are living in daily dread of the outbreak of pestilence, if not actually witnessing its deadly work, the names of the men who refused them permission to clean the streets will be remembered. Our political system seems to have reached the culmination of absurdity when the streets of a great city must remain reeking in filth, poisoning the inhabitants and visitors from other localities brought hither by business necessities, because the man whom the citizens have selected to undertake their purification happens to be a Democrat and not a Republican.

But while the citizens condemn the Albany politicians, they must not stifle the accusations of their own consciences. It is by virtue of the votes of citizens that men have the power to sit at Albany. And this consideration suggests another thought which lies at the root of still wider evils. An Albany politician knows that though he was elected by the people he was nominated by the machine. He is consequently under the impression that when the people and the machine are in antagonism, his loyalty is due to the machine. Not until the source of political power is derived directly from the people and the machine is smashed will the duty of a representative to his constituency be fully realized and performed.

The Necessity for Adopting Some Expedient of a temporary character to relieve the treasury of the excessive interest now being paid on the bonds approaching maturity, is fully realized by the administration. The Democratic party has cleared itself of responsibility in the matter by the bill passed last session. That bill might not have proved practicable, and many experienced financiers, some of whom were Democrats, believed it could not have been executed with advantage; but it was nevertheless an attempt to solve the question. The veto of the Republican President removed the onus to the Republican party, and that party has now to face the alternative of continuing the present high rate of interest, which would seriously injure the character of the party in the country, or to make an arrangement with the national creditors on its own responsibility. It is believed that the administration have chosen the latter alternative, and that they will shortly announce their plan. Its principal feature is understood to be that Secretary Windom shall call for all or the larger part of the six per cent bonds, and state that holders may, if they so desire, retain them by voluntarily undertaking to accept three and a half per cent in lieu of six per cent, until Congress settles the permanent rate. If holders decline this offer, the Government will redeem the bonds, and procure means for the purpose by the sale of the four and a half per cents.

An Extraordinary Case is Occupying the Attention of the police of New York. In December last year a wealthy Hebrew jeweller received notice that the Nihilist Executive Committee in Third Avenue had sentenced him to pay a fine of sixty thousand dollars. He regarded the letter as an attempt at blackmail, and applied for protection to the police. Various efforts have been made since that time by the writers of the notice to extort payment. They tried to kidnap the jeweller's daughter, and that plot being foiled, threatened his wife that unless the money were paid her husband would be assassinated. On Thursday, April 7th, a demand was made that the money should be inclosed in an envelope and dropped in the street when a preconcerted signal was made. An envelope was so dropped, and a detective, who was watching, saw a man stoop to pick it up. He attempted to arrest him, but as he assumed a threatening attitude and cautioned the detective not to approach him, the detective drew his pistol and shot him dead. A man supposed to be a confederate of the dead man has since been arrested, and efforts are being made to unravel the whole plot.

The Resignation of Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, D.D., of the rectorship of Holy Trinity, New York, will cause deep regret throughout the land, especially when it is known that the cause of his resignation is a complete break-down in health. Dr. Tyng was compelled to take a long rest last year, in the hope that his overworked system might regain vigor and elasticity. He returned much improved, but still weak. After a few months' labor he has come to the conclusion that an extended season of retirement from ministerial work is imperative. He is suffering from nervous prostration, the result of incessant labor in the cause of Christ. Not only in the pulpit but in numerous works of benevolence and missionary enterprise connected with his church, Dr. Tyng's efforts have been unceasing, and his nervous system has broken down under the strain.

"It is like a mother leaving her children," he said in a recent interview. "I never was called to this church. I built it. I came to New York when I was only twenty-two years old, without a dollar or a friend, and I have built this church. I have raised over $1,500,000 in that time, for church work, and besides paying our church expenses we have $500,000 of it left, in real estate."

"I cannot trust myself," Dr. Tyng wrote in his letter of farewell, "to express the sorrow I have experienced in withdrawing for a time from public ministry. I have submitted to what I believe to be the ordering of a glorious Lord, who "doeth all things well," and I continue to follow that leadership, which has supplied the inspiration of my life and labors hitherto. It cannot be under such guidance I shall be constrained to retire from the active work of the ministry altogether. To friends everywhere, by whose fidelity, charity, and prayers I have been upheld during twenty years of public life and service, I can offer only the poor thanks of one weary in work, but not of the work."

Many prayers will be offered by Christians everywhere—by many who have never listened to the eminent preacher, but who have read with profit his works on prophecy and on the second coming of our Lord, and have learned to love him, that God's blessing may be upon him in retirement, and that, if consistent with God's will, he may be speedily restored to health.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Left San Francisco, according to a telegram received from that city, on April 8th. They were expected to spend last Monday in Los Angelos, the following Sunday in Denver, and the next Sunday in Chicago. At the closing meeting, on April 7th, eighty-two thousand dollars were raised to pay off the debt on the Young Men's Christian Association building. The Association was reorganized, with new officers and directors, and Thomas K. Cree, travelling secretary of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, was placed in charge of it. In addition to the entire debt being raised, a gentleman subscribed six thousand dollars for the use of the Association in evangelistic work. The evangelists have been laboring continuously on the Pacific coast for six months, and the result is said to have been the addition of over one thousand members to the various churches, and a general revival among experienced Christians.

The Kansas Prohibition Law Has Been the subject of some misconception, which Governor St. John corrects in a letter to the Woman's Temperance Union of Chicago. The Governor writes: "That many of the whiskey dealers in this State are moving to Kansas City, Mo., is true, but for every saloon-keeper that goes out of Kansas on account of our prohibitory law, a sufficient number of sober, industrious, energetic families come into the State to build a school-house, and Kansas can always afford to trade her saloons for school-houses, and drunkenness for sobriety. That part of the charge which alleges that the law interferes with the free and unrestricted sale of tinctures or compounds that are used solely for medicine, is not true, nor does the law directly or indirectly interfere with the right to administer or partake of wine at communion services.* All such stories are instigated and circulated by the whiskey ring in order to break the force of the prohibitory law in this State, for the advocates of free whiskey well know that when it has been thoroughly tested and proved, which it will be, that prohibition in Kansas is a grand success, other States will follow our example, and eventually the policy of prohibition will be a fundamental law of the United States. Notwithstanding the law does not take effect until the 1st of May next, already the saloons have closed in most of the interior towns of the State, and after the 1st of May we will not have an open bar in Kansas; nor will Kansas ever again be guilty of giving the sanction of law to that which everybody knows to be wrong."

The Oneida Community Rooted Out of the States with so much difficulty, has established itself, with all its immoral characteristics, on the Canadian side of Niagara Falls. The British authorities will probably take action against the community, for although they are represented as industrious and enterprising people, the presence of such a society while they practice open immorality cries to God for vengeance on any government tolerating them.

An Earnest Temperance Movement has been inaugurated in the Episcopal Church, partially the result of the visit of the eminent temperance advocate, Dr. Graham, of Great Britain, to this country. It is proposed to make the entire Church a great temperance society, in fact as well as in doctrine. To that end a number of prominent members of the Church recently met in this city and determined to organize "The Church Temperance Society." A temporary Executive Committee of twenty gentlemen was appointed to draw up a constitution and plan of organization. The object of the society is to enlist the aid of all persons interested in the effort to remedy the evils of intemperance. It is intended to admit to membership any person who at all sympathizes with the work of the society, without regard to his own habits. He may sign a pledge, or not, just as he chooses. The total abstinence pledge is recommended, but not made obligatory, to three classes—to those who are intemperate as a matter of policy and self-preservation, to those who believe their example will help weaker brethren, and to children as a means of avoiding temptation. The payment of two dollars and an expression of sympathy with the society's work qualifies for membership. Rev. B. F. De Costa, the Secretary of the society, said that it was the intention of the founders to make the Church Temperance Society general throughout the Church in this country. Copies of the constitution were to be printed at once and sent to every Diocesan Convention, and Bishop Smith had been invited to prepare a letter to be sent to each diocese on the subject.

A Letter from Mr. Jerry McAuley Appears in an evening journal pleading for Christian men to aid him in securing employment for converted gamblers and men who having relinquished sinful courses are without the means of life. Mr. McAuley says: "Very many formerly well-known men of irregular lives, criminals and drunkards, have been reclaimed from their unhappy condition by the good influences brought to bear on them in the Water Street Mission, and to-day they may be found in positions of responsibility all over the city in corporations and business houses, respected and trusted. Jack McGinnis, a gambler and rumseller of some notoriety in the Eighth and Fourteenth Wards, recently made a public recantation of his past life, and we have reason to believe that his late conversion is stirring up his associates in a manner which may result in their amendment. There is an appalling amount of vice in this city, and any steps which tend to lessen the ranks of those who prey upon society, and transform them into law-abiding citizens, merit the earnest attention of thinking men."

The Suicide of a Beautiful Girl Last Week in a hotel in New York is another illustration of the apostolic warning that the end of sin is death (James 1 : 15). She had come to this city from San Francisco, and had been leading a life of gayety and dissipation. Her parents are wealthy, and the girl had in her possession when she committed her deplorable crime a considerable sum of money. Letters found in her room after her death and a diary written in French proved that the consequences of her reckless life had driven her to despair and death. She had previously attempted suicide at another hotel by going to bed and leaving the gas turned on, but her effort on that occasion had been frustrated by a servant who noticed the smell of the gas in passing her door. Last week she procured morphine, and with that ended her wasted life.

A Life was Saved by a Rose-bush Three weeks ago, near Portland, Oregon. An exploring party were examining a wild section of country near Multnomah Falls. The gorges, ravines, and rugged mountain-sides were covered deeply with snow, upon the surface of which was a heavy crust as smooth as a sea of ice. The party was making slow progress along the backbone of a divide. On the right-hand side was a slope of about 100 feet to an abrupt cliff, beneath which, about 40 feet below, was a chasm filled with immense rocks. One of the party, while looking over the valley beneath, lost his footing and fell, rolling toward the edge of the precipice with frightful velocity. When within a few feet of the edge he grasped a rose-bush, the only tree or shrub within reach, and as it tore through his hand, lacerating his fingers, he was brought to a stop nearly upon the brink. It was a moment of horror lest the shrub give way and he be dashed to death upon the rocks below. His companions made all haste, and, throwing him a rope, he managed to crawl back to a place of safety, leaving a track of blood upon the snow as it streamed from his lacerated hands. It was a narrow escape, and the providential circumstance of a rose-bush growing in so unusual a place renders it still more remarkable. We cannot forget that the rose is used in the Bible as an emblem of Christ, and that in the slippery and dangerous places of life many have been saved from eternal destruction by Him, who has said, "I am the Rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys."

A Remarkable Church Record is that of a church at Dorset, Vt. The pastor has been minister for twenty-five years; his chorister has started the tunes for thirty years or more; his deacons have held office, one for forty years and the other for twenty years; the Sunday-school superintendent has presided sixteen years, and one of the teachers has taught fifty-two years.

Gratitude of Crossing-Sweepers.—Some Years ago a minister of one of the New York City churches, who had the Sunday before preached in a tent at the Five Points, where religious services were being carried on, was crossing the well-swept walk across Broadway at Worth Street. He held out some pennies to one of the little sweepers, but the boy promptly declined the gift, saying, "Oh no, sir; we heard you preach in the big tent on Sunday, and we don't want you to give us pennies." He had given them something better than pennies, and they were glad to make a clean path for him. Soon afterward a lady, well known at the mission, came to the crossing, and a little girl exclaimed, "Here comes Mrs. ——; sweep the walk clean for her." And when the lady handed her a three-cent piece, another poor little girl interfered, saying to the first, "Ain't you ashamed to take money from our teacher? No, ma'am, we don't want you to pay us."

A Will Lost Nineteen Years Ago was Found a few days since in an old book. An old New York lawyer, named Gabriel Winter, who died on February 27th, 1862, was believed to have left a will, disposing of his property, but it could not be found. The estate was consequently divided among the heirs-at-law; but the other day a son-in-law of the dead man, on taking down from his library an old quarto volume of the very early statutes of the State of New York, which had belonged to Mr. Winter, discovered in it a sealed package, which, on being opened, was found to contain the long-lost will. Although nearly twenty years had elapsed, and the property had during that time been regarded as belonging to other people, the directions of the original holder were promptly carried out as soon as the will was discovered. The incident reminds us that although God's will in the government of the world is apparently thwarted, yet the day will come when it will be executed faithfully in all its righteousness (Isa. 14 : 24).

A Sensational Account of a Convict's Escape comes from Goldsborough, N. C. It appears that two prisoners were confined in the same cell. One of them was taken sick and died. The corpse was shrouded and placed in a coffin, and left in the cell all night, ready to be taken away for interment the following morning. The surviving convict removed the corpse to his own bed, and having forced out some knots from the coffin-lid to admit the air, he lay down in the coffin and was carried away by the burial party in the morning. In a lonely part of the road he commenced a series of noises, which so alarmed the driver that he ran away in terror, and the convict breaking open the coffin-lid made his escape. The convict's adroitness in thus utilizing his comrade's death to escape punishment shows that he was possessed of remarkable powers of invention and resource. Probably the next time he is inclosed in a coffin his spirit will have gone to a doom which all his clever tricks will not help him to elude. Only by virtue of the life and death of Jesus and by faith in Him can deliverance come in that day (Rom. 3 : 25).

A HASTY EXPRESSION PENITENTLY RETRACTED.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes: nevertheless thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee."—Ps. 31 : 22.

A Bit of Genuine Experience—The Imperfections of Eminent Men—I. An Utterance of Unbelief—Unbelief Generally Talkative—Its Utterances Generally Hasty—The Result of Temper—Often Exaggerated—They Dishonor God—II. An Effort of Struggling Faith—David Prayed Distinctly—In Downright Earnest—God Heard his Prayer—III. A Testimony of Gratitude—God Did not Speak—Nor Show Haste—Nor Exaggerate—Nor Dishonor His Servant—Sundry Lessons—Repent of Every Hard Thought—Put a Check on our Language—Continue to Pray—Speak Well of God's Mercy.

THAT is a bit of genuine experience, honestly told in the most natural manner. How glad we ought to be that David never fell into the hand of an ordinary biographer, for such a piece of weakness as this text records would have been carefully repressed, lest the good man's reputation should suffer. It was only a hasty expression, and every friendly biographer would have felt that it ought to be taken as unspoken. Here, however, stands this piece of human weakness upon David's life-page, and we are glad of it: it is a comfort to us little folks to perceive the champions were men of like passions with ourselves.

Take heed, however, when you are reading the histories of the saints, that you use them with prudence, for it is not all the experience of a Christian that is Christian experience. A believer may experience much which he does not experience as a believer, but because his believing is failing him. Sometimes we are rather to regard the experience of good men as beacons to warn us from rocks than as lighthouses to show us where the harbor may be. Rheumatism is certainly a human disease, but I would by no means recommend a person to seek after it in order to prove his manhood. We can well do without some things which were characteristic of certain eminent men, since they did not adorn or strengthen them, but rather disfigured and weakened them.

In David's case, it is well to follow David, but it is better to follow David's son; for David sometimes went astray like a lost sheep, but David's son was that great Shepherd of the sheep whose every step it is safe for the flock to follow. Do not let us imitate David in his speaking in haste, or in his saying, "I am cut off from before thine eyes;" but at the same time, let us take care that we closely copy him in confessing conscious fault, as he here does; in crying to God in the hour of trouble, as he tells us he did; and also in bearing witness to the exceeding goodness of God, notwithstanding our faultiness, as he here bears witness when he says, "Nevertheless thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee."

For our edification we will consider the text thus: Here is, first, an utterance of unbelief—"I am cut off from before thine eyes;" secondly, here is incidentally mentioned an effort of struggling faith—he says, "Thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee;" and, thirdly, here is a testimony of gratitude, for David joyfully declares that, notwithstanding his unbelief, the Lord heard and answered his cries. O for the touch of the Holy Spirit to make this outline into a living sermon. Here are the altar and the wood: O Holy Ghost, be thou the fire!

I. Let us begin by listening to

AN UTTERANCE OF UNBELIEF—

"I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes."

Note here, first, that unbelief is generally talkative—"I said." It had been better for him not to have thought it even, but when he did think thus wrongly it was most unwise to speak the thought. I have heard it said, "If it is in the mind it may as well come out," but this is not true. If I had a rattlesnake in a box on this platform, I think you would none of you vote for the creature's being let loose. Poison in a phial is deadly, but it will hurt no one until the cork is drawn, and then we cannot tell how far the mischief may go. Lions and tigers and vipers are best shut up; the wider range you give them the more you empower them to do mischief.

If thou hast an ill thought, repent of it, but do not repeat it: it may harm thee, but it will not harm others if thou let it die within doors. If thou hast a hard thought of God, utter it not in the presence of His own children. Wouldst thou grieve thy brethren? Utter it not in the presence of His enemies. Wouldst thou open their mouths to speak against Him? Where wilt thou utter it? Speak it not upon earth, for it is His footstool. Say it not in prayer, for thou art bowing at His throne. Say it nowhere, for God will hear it if none else should.

Yes, unbelief will prattle. I have known believing men slow of speech, but when a man has anything to complain of he is fluent even to overflowing; he will go from one neighbor to another, and lament the badness of trade, how the crops are failing, how ill he is himself, what a sickly family he has, and a legion of other griefs. The gazette of sorrow has long columns, and is generally crowded with items; it is published every hour of the day, and you can get a new edition at almost any house, for unbelief must publish its inventions.

Our next observation shall be that the utterances of unbelief are generally hasty—"I said in my haste." There was no reason for saying such a thing at all, and certainly not for being in a hurry to say it; for he said unto God, "I am cut off from before thine eyes." Look at this statement well. It is a very solemn thing to make such a declaration. See if it be founded on fact. Do you think it is true? Search a little more. Set your supposed condition in another light, and see whether, after all, you may not have made a mistake. But no. Unbelief blunders it out, right or wrong: "I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes." I suppose the reason for the hot haste is this—that when a man's mind is much distracted and driven to and fro he wants to come to some sort of conclusion; and, though that conclusion may be totally false, and may be as far from right as possible, yet some sort of a conclusion his troubled thoughts require.

John Bunyan says of the pilgrim that he was much tumbled up and down in his thoughts. It is a forcible Saxon expression, and most of you know what it signifies. You do not know whether you are on your head or your heels, as the old saying is; you are in a horrible confusion, and countless difficulties surround you; and so it is that you blunder at a conclusion, and say in your haste what should not be said. But why in such haste to write bitter things against yourself? Why in such haste to write your own condemnation? Why in such haste to misjudge your God? Stop a bit, brother. Stop a bit!

There is

for this when the worst has come to the worst. Wait awhile, for when the brain is heated waiting will cool the brow, and prepare a place for wisdom. Why are you so desperately eager to play the fool? Know that the utterances of unbelief are hasty; and hasty things are raw and sour, and cannot display the maturity of prudence. What a man says in his haste he generally has to repent in his leisure. If it is a good thing, say it at once; but if it be a doubtful thing, stop; then stop again; then stop again; and if the stopping should end in your not speaking, there will be a little more of golden silence in the world.

I have heard say that one of the greatest points in good speaking is to know when to pause. I do not know about that, but I am sure that one of the wisest things in good living is to know when to pause, to stop, to question, and to deliberate. To go blindly on as though it were neck or nothing with you is to make sure shipwreck some day or other. Do nothing till you are sure that it is right to do it, and say nothing till you know that what you say is true. Hasty deeds and hasty words make up the most horrible parts of human history: the warnings of the past forbid all recklessness. Nevertheless, when once we grow despondent this is our temptation, and it will be well to bit and bridle both mind and tongue lest we fall into the evil.

Frequently when a man speaks in haste his expressions are the result of his temper. "We are quick tempered," some will say. If you are quick tempered it is very likely that you are also quick tongued, and this is a great pity. You speak in a moment what you cannot unsay in a century. Now, it is very ill when we are

IN A TEMPER WITH GOD.

Is that ever the case? Oh, yes. I fear that often professing Christians are out of temper with God. A good woman was wearing deep mourning years after the loss of him whom she mourned; and a Quaker said to her, "Friend, I perceive thou hast not forgiven God yet." There he hit the nail on the head. Many have not forgiven God yet: they have taken umbrage against Him either because of bereavement, or loss of property, or sickness, or disappointment, or trial, and they keep on sulking because they cannot have their own way.

Surely they have never heard the question, "Should it be according to thy mind?" Wilt thou sit on the throne and judge thy God? Wilt thou

"Snatch from his hands the balance and the rod, Rejudge his judgment, be the God of God"?

This is blasphemy; and yet too often such blasphemy enters into the human heart. Who is to be master? Are we to be lords over all? Who is to order providence? In whose hands should be the issues from death? Is God to wait on us, and ask our will, and do our bidding? That is, indeed, the turning of things upside down, and it cannot, must not be. It is because we get into wayward, foolish, rebellious tempers with God that therefore we speak in our haste what we ought not even to think. Thus David penitently confesses, "I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes."

Again, it is very clear from the text that the utterances of unbelief are frequently exaggerated. "I am cut off from before thine eyes." No, David; no, no. It is not so: you are cut off from the esteem of men through slander, and you are cut off from the friendship of those who once professed to love you, whose minds have been soured by an evil report; but you are not cut off from God. It is true you are cut off from the public services of God's house, and obliged to hide away in the rocks and caves of the earth: that is true; but you are not cut off from before God's eyes. You know you are not, and why do you say you are?

Oh, but some people always talk big about everything; and it is a great pity, because it is so near lying that I do not know whether it is not the same thing. There must be a very narrow line, fine as a razor's edge, between a lie and the unguarded expressions of exaggeration. Some people talk about their trials on a scale which allows a mile for every inch. Their afflictions are awful, they are dreadful, they are without parallel. There were never any like them, and there never will be again. They endure the most extraordinary pains, and the most wonderful afflictions, and they are altogether quite equal to Job and Jeremiah rolled into one. Never did any persons undergo sufferings comparable to theirs. You cannot sit down by their side to comfort them but they will tell you at once that you do not know anything about the great deeps whereon they are doing business: you are only knee-deep in the waters of trouble, while all God's waves and billows have gone over them.

I meet with some who are almost impossibly afflicted; their tribulations exceed that which is common to man, and that which is uncommon too; but this may be accounted for by the large organ of imagination with which they are endowed. By using this imagination to paint their spectacles they are soon able to see all manner of dreadful visions, and they talk accordingly. That is the way of our unbelief: it will talk at random about trials and troubles.

May I ask if any friend here has been exaggerating his trouble? Is there any sister here who is fretting out of all reason—making a great deal out of what may be much, but is not everything? Then stand rebuked at this hour. Your cup is not all gall. Your bread is not all turned to ashes. All your comforts have not fled; many a mercy is left you. Come, come, friend, we are not quite cut off from before the Lord; let us leave off exaggeration lest we be guilty of falsehood.

Once more, the utterances of unbelief dishonor God. "I am cut off," says David, "from before thine eyes." He does, as it were, blame the Lord. Before thy very eyes have I suffered this; thou hast so forsaken me and given me over to the enemy, that I am cut off from before thine eyes. Why dost thou not deliver me? He spoke in his haste, as if God, at the very least, had been forgetful, even if He had not been untender and unfaithful. "I am cut off from before thine eyes." It would greatly dishonor God if He did suffer one that could say, "In thee, O Lord, have I put my trust," to be cut off from before His eyes. It would be contrary to His promise; for He has said that He will not suffer the righteous to perish.

"The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and His ears are open to their cry;" there never was a godly man cut off from God yet, and there never will be till time shall be no more. All the attributes of God forbid the destruction of a soul that is resting on the Almighty arm; and yet the unbelieving heart declares that such a destruction has taken place in its own case. Oh, wondrous unbelief, to think the Lord to be so unrighteous as to forget our work of faith and labor of love, to forget His children, to cast away His own, His covenanted ones, with whom He has entered into solemn league by oath, saying, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." He puts His promise very strongly in that passage, using many negatives in the original tongue. "I will not, not, not—never, never leave thee. I will not, not forsake thee:" many times over negativing the idea that He could possibly forsake one of His own.

II. So much, then, upon the first head—an utterance of unbelief; we are now ready to look within the sorrowing heart, and mark the signs that grace is still living there. We have not far to search; for, secondly, in the text there is mentioned

AN EFFORT OF STRUGGLING FAITH.

Though David said, "I am cut off from before thine eyes," yet he prayed, and prayed distinctly to God. He says, "Thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee." O child of God, cry to a smiting God. Cry to God even when He seems to cast thee off; for where else canst thou go? What remains for thee but to cry to Him, even if He shut His ear to thy plea? What if He frown upon thee? Still cling to Him. Where else canst thou espy a hope? To whom or whither could you go if you should turn from God? What if His providences seem hard? What if He use the rod upon thee till thy whole head is sick and thy whole heart faint? What if He even appears to put His hand to His scabbard to draw out the sword to slay thee? Even then there remains no resort for thee so hopeful as believing prayer. Say thou with Job, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

Sink or swim, live or die, do not doubt thy God, but still pray. When Bunyan's pilgrim went through the valley-of-the-shadow-of-death, he found that he had no weapon with which he could smite the fiends that surrounded him except the weapon of all-prayer. The adversaries were too impalpable for sword or spear, too mysterious for battle-axe or bow; but prayer could find them out and smite them to the heart. Believer, this is the most convenient and useful of all the weapons in our heavenly panoply. All-prayer will help you against man or devil. It will help you to bear up under trials that come from God and tribulations, that mysteriously approach you from earth or hell. Long as you live should you pray, for while you can pray you cannot perish. You must under no pressure cease from prayer, my brother. It is your last resort. "Men ought always to pray, and not to faint."

Please notice that David prayed in downright earnest, for he says, "Thou heardest the voice of my supplications," so that he offered many prayers—prayers with voices to them, and he describes them under the term, "I cried." His was a crying prayer. Those are the very best prayers. Our eyes sometimes light upon "prayers to be said or sung;" we have no wish to depreciate such compositions for others, but they are of no possible use to us who delight to tell our desires to our heavenly Father in our own broken speech. That is the prayer which is neither said nor sung, but cried: it drops from the eyes in tears, it breaks forth from the lips in moans, and from the breast in groanings that cannot be uttered.

Those prayers of ours which we could not endure for any human ear to hear are among the best of prayers. Even in his despair, I say, David prayed, and that praying took the form of an earnest and passionate cry.

Note well that God heard his prayer. We sometimes fancy that God will not hear us if any measure of unbelief is mixed with our prayers. If that were the case I am afraid that the Lord would not often hear us, for there is a measure of unbelief even in our strongest faith. It is a great mercy that even when we are lamenting, "I am cut off from before thine eyes," yet if at the same time we can pray, our petition is accepted of the Lord.

My friend, thou who art in trouble, whoever thou mayest be, let me urge, persuade, entreat thee, not to listen to the voice of Satan who tempts thee to cease from prayer. Do not say, "God will not hear me because I am in this wretched condition." Remember the words, "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord." Cry to Him wherever you may be, or whoever you may be. However desperate your plight, you shall survive it if you pray; however dire your danger, a way of escape shall be made for you if you cry unto the Lord. Cannons have been styled "the last arguments of kings;" but I may better call prayers the last arguments of needy sinners. Cling to the mercy-seat when you can cling nowhere else. Cling to the mercy-seat when justice lifts her sword to slay thee. Increase your earnestness in proportion as you are tempted to cease from prayer; and may God the Holy Ghost, who is the God of grace and of supplications, intensify your desires, help your infirmities, and teach you how to pray, and what to pray for, as you ought.

III. Our text next supplies us with

A TESTIMONY OF GRATITUDE.

The Psalmist says, "Nevertheless thou heardest the voice of my supplications."

Notice that God acted in directly the opposite manner from that in which the Psalmist's unbelief acted; for, first, his unbelief spoke and said this and that; but God did not speak. He was a listener; "Thou heardest." Not a word came from God; there had been too many words in the business already. When we begin to grumble with anybody, it takes two to make a quarrel, and if number two answers to our murmuring we soon stir up a fierce quarrel. Oh, the marvellous patience of God. He says nothing. There was the strength of Christ, that "as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not His mouth" in the midst of His accusers; and here is a part of the marvellous power of God—the omnipotence which restrains omnipotence, so that He is not provoked, or being provoked, speaks not in anger, and deals not with His servants in wrath, else had we long ago been consumed. Oh, how sweet to look back and think, He did not answer me according to my folly, or walk frowardly with me because I walked frowardly with Him. His word says, "With the froward thou wilt show thyself froward;" but He did not fulfil that threat to me, nor walk contrary to me, though I walked contrary to Him. In gentleness and patience He regarded not my evil words, and answered me not according to my folly.

You see then the difference between the quiet of God and the clamor of our unbelief. David bears cheerful testimony to the fact that he was in error when he spoke so hastily, and that God was exceeding gracious in taking so little notice of his foolish complaint.

The next contrast is seen in the fact that though David spoke in a hurry, there was no haste in God. "I said in my haste." Yes, but God did not reply in haste. Notice the glorious leisure of infinite love, for it is written, "Thou heardest the voice of my supplications." God was quietly hearing while His petulant servant was fiercely complaining.

We had a meeting of ministers a short time ago, at which it was agreed that for five minutes each one should relate a piece of experience. One of the brethren gave us this thought, which I shall not soon forget. He said, "It is a great thing for a minister who visits his people to be a good listener. The afflicted value this faculty above gold. Perhaps the pastor calls upon a poor woman who is in great trouble, and he sits down, and she tells him her mournful tale. Bless her heart! He has heard that tale a dozen times before, but he sits quite still and takes it all in, listening most earnestly. He has not perhaps the power to help her at all, but she feels very thankful to him because he has heard her case, and it has comforted her to tell it." It is a great thing to be willing to sit and listen, and hear a story which perhaps is very badly told, and is not at all pleasant to hear, which even creates sorrow in your own mind as you hearken to it. Such hearing displays tender sympathy. Hence the Scriptures say of God, "O thou that hearest prayer."

Let us go a little farther in our contrast between David and his Lord. There was no exaggeration with God. Unbelief exaggerates, as we have shown; but God does not. On the contrary, He diminishes the evil of His servants till it comes to nothing, putting it all away. He heard the feeble cry of faith in David's heart, and did not allow the voice of his unbelief to drown it; He did not look upon His servant's fault till it hid his grace; but He smiled upon the work of grace, little as it was.

And though, as we have said, unbelief dishonored God, yet God did not dishonor His servant's prayer for all that. No; He might have said to David's prayer, "Go thy way, I will not hear thee. Doth the same fountain send forth sweet water and bitter? I heard David say just now, 'I am cut off from before thine eyes.' Am I going to hear out of the same mouth a charge against my faithfulness and a cry for help? If He thinks I have forsaken Him, let it be so." But not so our God. He will not dishonor prayer, even though prayer be very feeble, and though there be an unbelief in it which is grievous in his sight. It never shall be said that faith and prayer came back from the throne of God with blushing faces: He will maintain His memorial untouched, and the motto of that memorial is, the God that heareth prayer. "Thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee."

We dare not make much out of our English version by way of dogmatic teaching, and yet somehow I feel inclined to pull each little word of the text in pieces just for a minute. Look at it. "Nevertheless thou heardest the voice." "Nevertheless," as much as to say, Though I had spoken as I ought not to do, yet thou didst not lessen thine attention to me, but thou didst just as much hear my prayer as if I had never sinned with my tongue. Not one jot the less was thy pity or thy bounty: thine ear did not in any measure lose its readiness to hear my prayer, nor thy heart its willingness to feel for me. Not one particle the less for all my transgressing "thou heardest the voice of my supplications."

The time has come for me to wind up with

in a few words.

The first is, let us repent heartily of every hard thought we have ever had of our God and Father. I am forced to look back upon some such sins of thought with much distress of mind. They have come from me in serious pain and depression of spirit; and now I pray the Lord of His great mercy to look at them as though I had never thought them, for I do heartily abhor them, and I loathe myself in His sight that I should ever have questioned His tender love and gracious care. If you have similarly transgressed, dear friends, in your dark nights of trouble, come now, and bow your heads, and pray the Lord to forgive His servants concerning this thing; for He is so good, so gracious, that it is a wanton cruelty to think of Him as otherwise than overflowing with love.

In the next place, let us earnestly pray that, if ever we shall be tempted again to hard, mistrustful thoughts, we may be able to put a check upon our language, and to keep our mouth as with a bridle. Oh that our tongue, which is given us to praise our God with, may never be perverted into an instrument of complaint against our greatest benefactor. O thou vile tongue, how couldst thou ever in thy hottest haste let slip an angry word against the Lord?

The next lesson is this: let us always continue to pray, come what will. Brethren, never cease praying. What I have said before, I say again, continue in prayer. Call upon your God. Cry to Him. Cry to Him. While breath lasts, and life gives power to feel a desire, never cease to supplicate the Lord.

Last of all, let us always speak well of His mercy. If we have bitterly complained, let us with equal vigor declare His goodness. I wish that you who are given to grumble would make up your minds that the time past will suffice you to have grumbled, and now you are going to growl backward, to and to praise God as much as you have formerly complained against Him. I should like farmers to break into a wonderful excitement of gratitude, so that all the nation would ring with it, and all men would confess, "Whenever you meet a farmer, you meet with a man who is always praising God for the weather." It will be a wonderful change if that should ever come to be the general remark.

I wish you tradesmen would suddenly put a new leaf into your books, and become the most thankful set of men alive, so that it would be universally said, "Whenever we meet a tradesman, we always find him praising God for His goodness to him in his business." For many years most traders have done the other thing, and it is time they should pitch a new tune, and sing another song. There have been "very bad times—dreadfully bad times," quite long enough. Are there no better times coming? Bad as times are, these grumblers live, and live in comfort too. They ought to praise God now for those wonderful seasons four, five, or six years ago, when things were so marvellously good that they were able to lay up store for the years of famine.

God give us a happy, childlike, rejoicing spirit. We have done enough murmuring to last a lifetime; let us change the tune. Suppose that you were to say, "I will make up my mind that just as much as I have ever disbelieved, mistrusted, murmured, so much will I do in the way of trusting and praising the Lord." But suppose you were actually to do as much, that would be a poor life of which you could merely say, "There was as much praise of God in that man's life as there was of murmuring." Shall we be content with such a summary? No, no, no, we must rise to something better than that. We must praise God a thousand times to every complaint. No; we must get above that; we must have done with all complaining. God deliver us from it, and lift us right out of unbelief; and when we do speak in our haste again, may it only be to exclaim, "Bless the Lord, hallelujah!"

If somebody sincerely remarks, "That was a bit of enthusiasm," you may reply, "Oh yes; but as I am a hasty man, and rather quick-tempered, that is the way in which I show my hastiness; I bless the Lord while my heart is hot, and then keep on doing so till I have cooled down." Lift up a hallelujah when nobody is prepared for such a word of praise. Startle your friends by crying, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless His holy name." The Lord lift you all up to this, and keep you there, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MR. J. B. GOUGH IN BROOKLYN.

Lecture on Platform and Personal Experiences.

On Monday, April 4th, Mr. Gough delivered an interesting and humorous address on his platform and personal experiences, in the course of which he recounted the following incidents:

"I bring you," Mr. Gough said,

"A PIECE OF PATCHWORK.

"It will necessarily be personal, but I trust you will not think me egotistical. I propose to give myself the largest liberty in wandering and to offer no apology for it. I never had any great ambitions until I visited a theatre, when I became completely stage-struck. After my visit to the Old Bowery Theatre, in New York, in 1832, I made up my mind I would strut my brief hour on the stage. I envied the very stick upon it—the very meanest of its ornaments, and with my stage-struck companions made myself ridiculous. We infused tragedy into the most trivial conversations." Mr. Gough gave an amusing imitation of the bombastic attitudes and modes of expression which are considered true acting at some theatres. He strode across the platform with a dignified step, saying, as a bit of tragic dialogue:

"Milord, wilt hand me the paste pot?"

"Ay, by the mass, Gonzales, thou shalt have it!"

"I stand here to-night sixty-three years of age, and I thank God from my innermost soul that I have for forty years been a temperance lecturer. Without reflecting on the stage, I say I would rather be a door-keeper at a temperance lecture than the grandest actor that ever trod the stage.

"I cannot remember the time," confessed Mr. Gough, "that I did not dread an audience. You may say that—after 8000 lectures—that is affectation; but there is always something like the trip-hammer beating of the heart that there was when I first faced an audience. It is gone the moment I feel that I have the sympathy of my hearers, replaced by a consciousness of power that exhilarates and excites, producing a sensation of delight for which I afterward have to pay. To lead devotional exercises is always a source of serious embarrassment to me. Why it is so I know not. I cannot understand it; I cannot help it.

"I am asked, 'Do you see your audience as individually or in the aggregate?' Well, when I rise there is an involuntary selection of the persons to whom I shall speak and the will has "NOTHING TO DO WITH THE CHOICE.

"I select you, talk to you, and I would know you afterward on the street. If I get your sympathy I am glad, if you are dull I am sad. I may have selected a dull, vinegary sort of person, but I have no will to make a change.

"I am asked, 'Do you prepare your lectures?' For the first seventeen years of my life I spoke entirely on temperance, and I never read a line on a temperance subject and never committed a sentence to my memory. In travelling or reading I am on the lookout, but I do not store my mind with anything. I let it float upon the surface.

"People will say—I have heard it, and so have you—'Gough is a mere story-teller.' Well, what else should he be? I glory in the name. My early life was one of privation. When I could lift a pound I lifted it for bread. When I was twenty-five years of age I had never read a book on history or science. When I put my name to a temperance pledge, I had no beautiful thoughts, no beautiful language, but I had a story to tell, and the people listened to it. It was a story of privation, a story of struggle, a story of despair, and a story of victory, and I thank God that I have so told my story as to make better the story of other people's lives.

"People say, 'Gough, you are a mere retailer of anecdotes.' Well, I have a keen sense of the ridiculous, and one of the most ridiculous things I know of is the attempt of certain sapient critics to analyze me. They say, 'Gough is not a thinker.' Well, I am not a thinker, a deep or original and profound thinker. I use my stories for illustration, and you know as well as I do that a good story will illustrate a point as well as half an hour's argument. Suppose I wish to illustrate false sympathy. I can tell the story of the boy, who, seeing a picture of the Christian among the lions, said he was sorry for the Christian, but he was sorry 'for that little lion over there that had not got a Christian.' But the finest stories may be ineffective. I have never been entirely put down, though I have been sorely tried. Argument is of no use with the man who means to annoy you; but if you can make a point against him in a good story you will have him.

"I was never so thoroughly nonplussed as once at a children's meeting by

"SOME CIGARS.

"I was engaged to address a large number of children in the afternoon, the meeting to be held on the lawn back of the Baptist Church. In the forenoon a friend met me, and after a few words said, 'I have some first-rate cigars; will you have a few?' "No, I thank you.' 'Do take half a dozen.' 'I have nowhere to put them.' 'You can put half a dozen in your pocket.' I wore a cap in those days, and to please him I put the cigars into it, and at the appointed time I went to the meeting. I ascended the platform and faced an audience of more than two thousand children. As it was out of doors I kept my cap on for fear of taking cold, and in the excitement of my remarks against forming bad habits I forgot all about the cigars.

"Toward the close of my speech I became more earnest, and after warning the boys against bad company, tobacco, drink, bad habits, and the bar-room saloons, I said, 'Now, boys, let us give three rousing cheers for temperance in all things. Now, then, three cheers, Hurrah!' And taking off my cap I waved it most vigorously, when away went the cigars right into the midst of the audience. The remaining cheers were very faint, and were nearly drowned in the laughter of the crowd. I was mortified and ashamed, and should have been relieved could I have sunk through the platform out of sight. My feelings were still more aggravated by a boy coming up the steps of the platform with one of those dreadful cigars, saying, in the hearing of every one there, 'Here's one of your cigars, Mr. Gough.'"

Mr. Gough related some experiences he had had in connection with clergymen here and across the Atlantic. Among these he described an interview to which he had listened in a child's sick-room at the Stockwell Orphanage. Standing by the bed of a child hopelessly ill was

REV. C. H. SPURGEON.

Holding the boy's hand, the great preacher said: "You have some precious promises in sight all round the room. Now, my dear boy, you are going to die, and you are very tired of lying here, but soon you will be free from all pain, and will enjoy rest. Nurse, did he rest last night?"—"Yes; but he coughed very much."—"Ah, my dear boy, it seems very hard for you to lie here all day in pain, and cough all night, but remember Jesus loves you. He bought you with His precious blood, and He knows what is best for you. It seems hard for you to lie here and listen to the shouts of the healthy boys outside at play; but soon Jesus will take you home, and then He will tell you the reason, and you will be so glad."

Then, laying his hand on the boy, he said: "O Jesus, Master, this dear child is reaching out his thin hand to find thine. Touch him, dear Saviour, with thy loving, warm clasp. Lift him as he passes the cold river that his feet be not chilled by the water of death; take him home in thine own good time. Comfort and cherish him till that good time comes, show him thyself as he lies here, and let him see thee and know thee more and more as his loving Saviour."

After a moment's pause, Mr. Spurgeon added, "Now, dear boy, is there anything you would like? If you would like a little canary in a cage to hear him sing in the morning, you shall have one. Good-bye, my dear boy; you will see the Saviour perhaps before I shall." In relating this Mr. Gough added: "I had seen Mr. Spurgeon holding by his power 5000 persons in a breathless interest; I knew him as a great man universally esteemed and beloved; but as he sat by the bedside of this dying child, whom his beneficence had rescued, he was to me a greater and grander man than when swaying the multitude at his will.

"Spurgeon's education," said Mr. Gough, "consisted of four years' attendance in a common school, and a few months in an agricultural college. He preached his first sermon at sixteen years of age, under peculiar circumstances, and without five minutes' consideration. To me personally he is fascinating. In personal appearance he is not attractive, but he is full of wit and humor, with rollicking laughter and fun, and yet with all no unbecoming levity. I cannot imitate Mr. Spurgeon—he is inimitable. He has no pulpit tricks. Standing sometimes perfectly still, he will utter wonderful sentences. Take him for all in all, we shall not see his like again."

In conclusion Mr. Gough drew a picture of a young man whom he had loved as a boy, and who, at thirty, maddened with drink, shot himself through the head. The contrast between the young man, clean, pure, and wholesome, and the drunkard with his furnace mouth and surging blood was drawn with startling vividness. "Would I have given him his first glass of wine," cried Mr. Gough. "No; I would rather have given him the last one which drove him to the rash deed, which sent him to the other world, for if there had been no first glass there would have been no last one."

SECRET DISCIPLESHIP.

"A disciple of Jesus, but secretly."—John 19: 38.

Joseph of Arimathea—His Spirit Roused—Nicodemus—His Love Kindled—Secret Foes and Secret Friends—An Open Profession—It is Due to One's Self—Due to Others—Due to Jesus—Badness of Secret Discipleship—Conviction or Fear?—Losses of Secret Discipleship—Fear of Others—Fear of Self—Dishonor to Christ—A Worse Thing—No Disciple at All.

These words are spoken of Joseph of Arimathea. Of this person we learn several things, as he is mentioned by all the Evangelists.

He was "of Arimathea," probably Rama, or Ramathaim, in Ephraim, where Samuel was born. He was rich. This circumstance was considered worth perpetuating in the inspired records. Sometimes it is good for a man to be rich; sometimes it is not. If he uses his wealth for the accomplishment of God's purposes, it is an honor; if not, it becomes a disgrace.

This man held a very high position. He was a member of the Grand Council of the nation, and had a voice in the decisions of the Sanhedrin. But even that might have been a disgrace to him. Office is not proof of goodness. Unless a man be faithful in his office it is a reproach to him. We know, in our own day, that to hold office under government is a presumption against a man, which, however, he can overcome by being a just and a good man, and then the office becomes resplendent with the light of his virtues.

This Joseph was a "just" man. He was more than that: he was "good." By these words the inspired historians probably meant that he was not only careful to meet all the requirements of justice, but ready also to follow all the suggestions of benevolence. He was disposed to do right and to do more. He seems to have been present when the Sanhedrin sat on the case of Jesus. He did not sympathize with their rancor. He would not consent to their wicked counsel. He would not partake their wicked deed. He seems to have been in a very small minority, Nicodemus alone voting with him, if really Nicodemus did, against the killing of Jesus.

He was not only a moralist, striving to keep the letter of the law, but he was pious; he was waiting for the kingdom of God, according to St. Luke's account.

Such a man—so wise, so good, so just, in such a social position—had watched the progress of Jesus, had studied His words and actions, had compared them with the Holy Scriptures of the Old

* Seven persons are known to have been converted through this sermon. May its publication here be equally instrumental in the saving of souls!

Testament, and reached the conclusion that this man was the promised Messiah.

And yet, so great was the hold of caste on him, so fearful was he of the loss of his position, official and social, that he did not manfully declare his convictions and take the side to which, in his heart, he belonged. He was a "disciple" "secretly," "for fear of the Jews."

But when the catastrophe came, and Jesus expired on the cross, this man's love overflowed and filled his whole nature. He had no fear of Pilate and the Roman power. Jesus was dead. In an hour He might be cast into a trench with the corpses of the crucified thieves. And Joseph could not brook that indignity. He had not been associated with Jesus, had probably never spent as much time with Him as Nicodemus, but he believed in Him, he was striving privately to live by His teachings, and he could not endure to know that the precious remains of Jesus, the body that had held such a soul, should be buried with common rogues. So he went hastily back to the city, and boldly in to Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus.

There was another man, in the same station in life, named Nicodemus, who also had been deeply interested in Jesus, perhaps not so much as Joseph of Arimathea, to the extent of being His disciple even secretly. He must, however, have been convinced that Jesus was a prophet. In a night-interview which he had with our blessed Lord in the early part of His ministry, Nicodemus confessed that our Lord was a Teacher sent from God, and that no man could do those miracles unless God were with him. But such was his constitutional timidity that he never publicly acknowledged even that conviction. When the Sanhedrin were unjustly seeking to destroy Jesus, without even the show of a trial, Nicodemus interposed a few feeble words, uttering a general principle, but was immediately silenced by a sneer.

But now that Jesus was dead, the affection of this Sanhedrist came out more warmly, and when he saw Joseph, his colleague in the Council, going to beg the dead body—an office generally performed by the kinsmen of the executed—Nicodemus joined him, bringing a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes.

What a striking picture does this burial present us! The dead Jesus has no kinsman, no kinswoman, no professed friend, no disciple, to go and beg His body; none but this man, who had probably admired and loved Him at a distance, but had had no intimacy with him; and there was no one to bring what was necessary for a decent burial, but a man who had once come to Him by night, and never came again. Peter, and John, and James, and Andrew, and Thomas, and all the others, have left Him to be thrown into a ditch like a Barabbas. But Joseph and Nicodemus save His body and carry it reverently and tenderly to Joseph's new sepulchre.

Probably in the case of every man, most probably in the case of every public man, there are

SECRET FOES AND SECRET FRIENDS.

When a man has succeeded in attaching others to him, they cannot see how it is possible that virtues which are so manifest to them, and beautiful in their eyes, are not equally conspicuous and splendid to others. We cannot see how others can hate our friends. But those others cannot see how we, who seem so honest, can love the people whom they so hate. Every public man may lay his plans and work them with the assurance that some one will secretly oppose their accomplishment.

But, on the other hand, there is this consolation, that every man of positive character, who leads an active life, has many secret friends. There are often reasons why they do not approach him. Modesty, timidity, the opposition of friends, the surroundings of a man, may keep him years from declaring his real sentiments toward one whose silent friend he is. But let an emergency arise where he is needed, and how nobly the secret friend comes to the front!

Who could have predicted that Joseph and Nicodemus, two members of the Council that had hunted Him down, would have performed the rites of sepulture for Jesus? It should have fallen to others, but they took the duty and the honor.

They were certainly disciples. They believed in Jesus. They loved Jesus. There can be no mistake, it would seem, in those points. They did not believe sufficiently to come down from their seats in the Sanhedrin and follow the lonely Teacher on His circuits of preaching and beneficence. But they loved Him, and probably He was never so beautiful in their eyes as when He was enduring the torturing inquisition of the high priest as when He was suffering under Pontius Pilate, as when He hung thorn-crowned and pierced and dead on the cross of Golgotha. There must then have come to these good men a painful repentance of the secrecy of their discipleship. They had refused that dead Man what was His due when He was living.

Always in the sight of the dead our shortcomings toward them become most poignant recollections. We are recalled from our carelessness by the fact that we never can repair the wrongs we have done them, nor pay them the attentions which we have thoughtlessly or heartlessly withheld. Blessed is the man who can look into the face of his dead friend with none of this bitterness in his grief! Perhaps the devotion of Joseph and Nicodemus was all the more devout because they had so signally failed of their duty while the Master was alive. Their discipleship had been sincere but defective.

Let not your discipleship be thus defective. There are multitudes who, like Joseph and Nicodemus, are disciples, but secretly. It cannot be that the hundreds of men who have never made a confession of their faith, but who are frequent listeners to the Gospel, can have heard so much of Jesus, can have paid even ordinary attention to the presentation of His character in the Bible and from the pulpit, can have watched the progress of His teaching and spirit through the world, and witnessed the effect of a sincere belief in Jesus on the whole nature of any man so believing, and not have somewhat joined themselves to His cause in their hearts.

We all know men and women who are conscientious and devout and charitable, to whom there is nothing so divine as Jesus, who are most sensitive to whatever pertains to His interests and His honor, and are prayerfully striving to copy His life, while they are humbly trusting in Him for salvation—men and women who, in our judgment, are even more disciples at heart than were Joseph and Nicodemus; and yet their discipleship is secret: and the discovery of evidences of it by their intimate friends is without their knowledge. Such are some of the hearers of these words. If you are such, you are besought to make your discipleship open, as our dear Lord has made His love.

1. You owe it to yourselves. The secrecy of your discipleship must be damaging to your whole character. There can possibly be no reason for it, worth stating in words, or that can satisfy a man's conscience or his God. To suppose that there are, is to suppose that there is something disgraceful or sinful in this discipleship; and, if there be such a thing, then no man ought to be a disciple of Jesus even secretly. It is wrong to belong to any society, or combination of men, membership in which one must conceal.

How can an honest man hold such a relation? It is wrong to be married to any woman under any circumstances which make you wish to keep the marriage a secret. There is no other man than Jesus whose friend you would be and yet be careful to hide the fact from other friends. It begins to make you doubtful of truth, and of honor, and of Jesus, and of yourself. It increases the cowardice of your character. He that will not openly espouse the cause of Jesus, when all his convictions are for Jesus, and when in secret he has really some love for Jesus, can never be a comrade to be relied upon in any great undertaking.

This secrecy will diffuse its baleful influence through all parts of your character. Few things can be more injurious than to hold well-formed opinions which have produced settled convictions, and then conceal those opinions and fail to act resolutely on those convictions. All the world unites to condemn cowardice and despise cowards. But what is cowardice but an unwillingness to take all the consequences of doing right, whether those consequences be pleasant to flesh and blood or otherwise? It is quite certain that even where there is real discipleship in the heart, if it be not open the discipleship will destroy the secrecy and become apparent and pronounced, or else the secrecy will destroy the discipleship; and it may require prompt action on your part to prevent this last result, which would be a dire catastrophe. You owe it to yourselves, to your own manliness, to come out openly for Jesus.

2. And, you owe it to others. There are men and women, some of the best in the world, who have embarked character, and reputation, and fortune, and life in the cause of Jesus. They believe Him to be the Saviour of the world, and they take Him to be their personal Saviour. And they believe that the hope of men for the future is with Jesus. They openly commit themselves to His cause for weal or for woe.

THEY ARE RIGHT OR WRONG.

You cannot say that they are wrong, for, as a secret disciple, you believe that they are right. If they are right, every honorable man in the world, who believes as they do, is bound to stand by them. You do believe as they do. It will be most unmanly to let others go out and fight your battles, risking everything for a cause in the success of which you are as deeply interested as they, and for which you are not willing to risk anything. Open disciples may be supposed to have little claims on unbelievers, but they have great claims on you.

Then there are the non-confessors in your circle: and they are of two classes—those who, like yourself, are disciples secretly, and those who are not disciples at all.

The former may need only that one of their station in life should step into the ranks, and they would then promptly enlist in the sacramental host of the Lord's elect. It was so in the case we have been considering. If Joseph of Arimathea had not espoused the cause of Jesus when he did, there is no probability that Nicodemus would have done so. It was late for both. If one had not moved forward at that very time, perhaps both would have died outside the pale of discipleship. There may be some Nicodemus waiting for your example. You owe it to him. Although you have so much weakened yourself by your concealment of your convictions, he is weaker than you.

His timidity may be constitutional, and all he waits for is a companion in this great step of a public adhesion to Jesus. Give him that help. Pastors will tell you how frequently they find husbands who are waiting for their wives, and wives who are waiting for their husbands. Sometimes one will conceal the state of his or her heart from the other, and this secret discipleship is hurtful to both. If you are ever to take Jesus for your Saviour, do it now, and you will find that others have been waiting for you, needing only your example to throw them into an active Christian life, ready to bring their hundredweight of myrrh and aloes the moment you go to crave the body of Jesus.

You owe it to those non-confessors who are not disciples of Jesus in any way. They fail to see their need of Jesus. You may never have thought what an argument against Jesus your position affords them. They do not know that you have any love for Jesus, that you are striving to live by His precepts, and that in your hearts you trust in Him as your Saviour. They do see that you are faithful, honorable, pure, and charitable, that your life is growing in beauty and in strength, and it never occurs to them that you owe all of this to Jesus. Nay, they hold that Jesus is unnecessary, because in your case they think they have proof that all goodliness of living may be achieved apart from Jesus. Your discipleship is honorable and useful to you, but your concealment is weak and hurtful both to yourself and to others.

You owe it to these non-believers to take away that confirmation in infidelity which your example affords them. It would startle them to hear from your own lips that you owe all to Jesus. It would direct their thoughts to the Saviour. It would be another man taken from the ranks of the wicked, the unbelieving, the thoughtless, and added to the company of Jesus. It would be putting your influence on the right side, whereas it is now on the wrong side.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

SUMMARY OF THE STORY.

[The scene is laid in the English village of Shenstone, and in the town of Thornham in the same county. Both places were notorious for the dissipated habits of the working-men living there; and there was consequently much poverty in both places. The aristocratic family at Shenstone Hall avoided the villagers on account of their rough manners, but after Arthur Fennecker, the eldest son, died, his sister Etta commenced visiting the poor and sick among the people. She received a hearty welcome from a poor aged Christian, Michael Bateman. Arthur Fennecker had received no religious instruction at home, and when he was ill, Edgar Harcourt, a clergyman, Arthur's cousin was sent for, at the dying young man's request, to speak to him of Jesus. The rector of the village, Mr. Habershon, performed his duties in a perfunctory manner, and made no active effort to spread the knowledge of Christ among the people. He had one young daughter, named Aleth. His gardener, Mr. Hutton, and a few other Christian men used to meet for prayer in an empty shed, but some mischievous drunken loafers burned it down in a frolic. At Thornham we are introduced to mechanics, of whom the foreman is Harry King, called by his mates King Hal. They are all addicted to drinking, and Albert Eldridge, the son of the builder for whom they work, is desirous of improving their habits. Lady Isabel Hamilton, who resides at Lionel Court, near the town, establishes a coffee-room as a rival to the beer saloon. She persuades a drinking man named James Hardcastle, whose sick daughter she occasionally visited, to attend it. Mr. Loudon is the manager of the coffee-room. Mr. Jardine is an acquaintance of the Hamiltons, living in London and absorbed in worldly pursuits.]

A Shy Guest—The Grog-Seller's Own—Inaugural Ceremonies—Lady Isabel's Welcome—An Inappropriate Speech.

THERE came into the coffee-room among others a young fellow who had the shyest and most sensitive of dispositions. He was always fancying some one was laughing at him, some one was looking at him, some one was cross to him, or some one "didn't want him." He was never at his ease, never thoroughly comfortable, except when, hod in hand, he was carrying the mortar up and down the ladder at his work. Then he was thoroughly absorbed, and therefore happy; his morbid tendencies being less at liberty to trouble him.

Of course his peculiar weakness was known and recognized, and, if I must confess the truth—in spite of my strong partiality for his race!—it was made a handle of by almost everybody he came across. As a sickly bird is pecked by all stronger ones, so poor Joe Timkins "led a life of it." But had you or I dared to bully Tim, my reader, it would "have been the worse for us!" that is all I can say. The fellow-feeling among these men is so strong, that if you hurt one you hurt all, and their very instinct of self-preservation will lead them to stand by a comrade, even though in a good-natured way they may tease him themselves.

Two or three hundred men came in their very best that night. Many were in their working clothes, it is true; but they were "cleaned up," face and hands washed, clean shirt, tidy hair. Such might stand for a surface description of the majority who appeared on the occasion. Of course, just at the last some rough-haired, wild individuals mingled with the more decent crowd. But they were welcome too.

Very welcome was their presence, for they had just come straight from the haunt of drunkenness. "The Grogseller's Own" they might have been called; and so they were. He relied upon them, counted his wife's dresses, and his children's bread from their pockets, and knew almost to a penny what he might derive from their custom during the year. He knew that if they earned twenty, twenty-five, or thirty shillings by the week, he might safely reckon on fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five as his due share of the wage; and this he could congratulate himself was due either to his own skilful tactics, or to their lucky and unaccountable, though praiseworthy, taste for intoxicating liquor! To him it was "praiseworthy," because it kept him in a good house, well furnished, and provided him with many a little dainty that he could not otherwise have obtained.

At seven o'clock that evening the large close carriage might have been seen driving out of the gates, and into the main street of the town. Arriving beneath the lamp that decorated and distinguished the one door from all others, the front seat of the carriage was soon relieved of the superfluity of odds and ends that were to compose a finishing-touch to the bright picture.

By eight o'clock most of the guests had arrived, and the room was full. The bar, with its shining apparatus of coffee urns, plates and cups, and dainties, varied in character and quantity, looked like business. So the proceedings were not to be long, and simply initiatory. After prayer from the Vicar, and a few sentences in which he bid the people a pleasant welcome, Mr. Hamilton stood up, and was received with very hearty applause. His speech was short and to the point.

"My friends!" he said, "the house to which we have invited you to-night is the fulfilment of a desire we have long cherished. You have encouraged us by your cordial sympathy and by your support in thus giving us your presence at our first outset. If you will continue to do so, we shall be encouraged to use our utmost powers for the success of this movement which as you know well is an effort in the cause of temperance." (At this word there was much and general applause, mingled with very evident demurrings and shakings of the head of the known frequenters of several taverns.) Mr. Hamilton continued, "I do not want to make a long speech to you, but I do want my wife to say a few words to you, for she has had much to do with the originating of this scheme, as well as with the detail of its completion."

This suggestion was received with much clapping, but when Lady Isabel stood before them, her winning manner provoked the men to an absolute enthusiasm. They rose to their feet and cheered her. If she had not said a word, her presence alone, coupled with the respect they bore her, would have gone far towards the real success of this preliminary occasion, as well as to the ultimate success of the scheme.

When she opened her lips, an instant silence took possession of the room, while all listened earnestly for her first words. She said—

"You have received me very kindly. I know you a little, but not as well as I ought to know you. I see some of my friends among the men that work up at the new red house, and others too." (Here there was much smiling, and immense applause, by way of returning the recognition.) "We are neighbors; and in the Bible we are told what to do to one another. 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,' Jesus says. What a blessed command! what a happy duty! and a very easy one too. Don't you think so?" (Claps and smiles testified "not very hard.") "But it means a great deal.

"We all should like to think we were going to heaven! None of us would wish to think we were not going there when we die, or when the Lord comes to call away His own people. Then we must help one other towards heaven. That is a great part, and indeed the chief part, of this neighborly friendship. Shall we try to help each other?" (Feet and hands said "yes." Such was the present feeling evidently. Lady Isabel was undoubtedly right in her theory—this all were ready to acknowledge, however difficult might be the practice it inculcated.) "Then will you often come and meet us here? and we can have a talk together, or singing, and we can read of different countries, and hear what is going on in the world, and think of our Saviour, too, and of His bright Home."

The response was cordial and prolonged when she had finished her simple, appealing words. The audience saw that she was in earnest, and that she wanted to be their friend; and it was quite sufficient for the moment, at any rate, to place them on her side.

She had no sooner finished, than, unfortunately a neighboring squir "George Hardman Esq.," stood up to speak. He never before had shown the slightest interest in the people beyond giving rather easy sentences at the Bench (which after all gained him neither respect nor love); but on this occasion, possibly from good-nature or perhaps because he had a spare half-hour to wile away in the town that night, he had come in, felt taken with the bright cheery aspect of things generally, seeing the crowd in front of him had been reminded of some bits of electioneering that he had done at different times and had offered to Mr. Hamilton to contribute a speech to the evening's entertainment.

"By all means," had been Mr. Hamilton's good-natured reply; and this was what he said after a few preliminary remarks to the effect that he often drove through their town: "We all know that you have small uncomfortable homes and consequently many temptations. A number of dirty children perhaps all crowded together and perhaps a slovenly wife or at any rate a very poor one. While sickly or untrained you are oppressed by toil we sink into the well-cushioned chair of ease, our walls adorned with costly pictures and the best of food spread upon our tables."

("The best of fiddlesticks!" said one impatient hearer. "Shut up!" politely remarked another; and in fact the speech caused friction.) It was folly embodied and certainly could not foster the progress of temperance or coffee-houses or indeed any other good cause. These half-expressed interpolations were courteously suppressed—"This gov'nor don't know what he's a-talking about!" whispered one man to another; while a third, less amiably disposed, said almost audibly "Go it! that'll do now;" and all faces began to lower like a gathering cloud, promising anything but favorably for the budding coffee-room—Mr. Hamilton and Lady Isabel sat on thorns.

The speaker hesitated and then stammered on. "Of course if we had such discomforts, we too might wish to frequent the saloon. There is no saying. The fumes of the wash-tub, a smoky stove, and children crying for bread might have upon us the same effect they have upon you. But your richer neighbors are not unsympathizing. They have chosen this opportunity to testify to you their heartfelt desires that, instead of sinking still deeper into the degradation of drunkenness, you may be led into paths of higher ambition, and that as men of the town you may become representatives of a better class of feeling than at present can be said to exist.

"Look at the drinking-houses. Look at the gambling saloons. When we, surrounded by every luxury, and not, like"——

The cat's back had been rubbed the wrong way, and the sparks were appearing, but after a whisper from Mr. Hamilton, Lady Isabel said—

"Now the proceedings are over; as far as speaking is concerned. And now I want you to know the manager. He will always be a friend to you, and always glad to see you; and I hope you will be friends to—his coffee urns!" (Laughter, and "Yes! we will!")

Good humor was restored again; and the meeting broke up, the men dividing into groups at the different tables, some calling for coffee, some for tea or cocoa, and others taking up a paper to wait till their turn came. While this process was going on, Lady Isabel and her friends were flitting about the large room talking to one and another.

"You are James Hardcastle, are you not? How is Lucy! Dear Lucy! I am so fond of her. She has taught me many a sweet lesson."

"She likes you, uncommon, my lady," replied Jem, making a sort of nod, by way of a bow. "She's always a-lookin' out for you to come in."

"How is she to-night?"

"I think she is rather better, thank ye. She said I was to be sure and tell her everything when I went back to-night."

Lady Isabel whispered to him, "I don't know the names of many of the men. Will you tell me some of them?"

"Oh, ay, my lady. I can tell you most of 'em. That's Peter Makeshift. He works down at the gravel pits. And that 'un with the big beard—his old 'ooman's bad—Carter Andrew they call him; I don't know no other name for him but that."

"Thank you," said Lady Isabel, "that is a great help."

And in the course of her peregrinations from one to another, she made use of her information by addressing these men accordingly.

"Is your name Andrew?" she said to the latter.

"Wall, that's my Chrissun name."

"And what is the other?" she asked. "I want to know you. And perhaps some day you would let me come and see you."

"Shouldn't mind," said the man. "D'you know that 'ere little place up by the meadows, where there's some trees? Well, it ain't there; but it's before you get to that—just down in the hollow. It runs in a street. Hollows is the name of the place. 'Tain't so very far off."

"I think I know where it must be," said Lady Isabel. "I will go and call on your wife some day."

She shook hands with him, getting a good grip from his brawny fist, and thus a new friendship was compacted. And every new friendship formed in addition to those already made was a new link in the chain of the coffee-room's success. Very important these friendships were. For, besides being obedience to her Saviour's command, and therefore a source of happiness to herself, they were very important for the sake of the general welfare, temporal and spiritual, of the little town in which she felt so great an interest.

The smoking coffee went round. Loudon was in full work; with the extemporized assistance of a young man whom he had summoned to his aid, he contrived to supply all demands, and to give universal satisfaction with his viands.

COVETOUSNESS.

S. S. Lesson for April 24. Luke 12, 13-31. Golden text, ver. 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"THE wicked boasteth of his heart's desire, the covetous blesseth himself, he abhorreth the Lord" (Ps. 10: 3, margin). His heart's desire, himself, his own way, this fills the heart of covetous man, and this is the direct contrary to the life of Christ, to the love which "seeketh not her own" (1 Cor. 13: 5). Even in the Old Testament we have abundant proof of God's hatred of covetousness. When Jethro persuaded Moses to set rulers over the people of Israel, he said, "Thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness" (Ex. 18: 21). Men who had not learned to put aside personal advantages were not fit to be rulers of God's people. Again, where the Lord of hosts complains of the people that they had committed abomination, He says, "From the least of them even unto the greatest of them every one of them is given to covetousness" (Jer. 6: 13-15; 8: 10). This was the sin of which God accused Shallum or Jehoahaz, son of Josiah, and which brought him to his ruin, "Thine eyes and thine heart are not but for thy covetousness" (Jer. 22: 17).

In the New Testament God's hatred against covetousness is as strongly expressed, if not more so. Paul mentions it among the other sins with which those are filled whom God has given over to a reprobate mind (Rom. 1: 28, 29). He declares that no covetous man shall inherit the Kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6: 10), and that "no covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the Kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. 5: 5), he exhorts us, moreover, that "if any man that is called a brother be covetous," . . . "with such an one no not to eat" (1 Cor. 5: 11). Again we are called upon to mortify covetousness as one of our members which is upon the earth (Col. 3: 5).

Yet men in general look upon covetousness as no sin, only a peculiarity of character; it is the ruling law of the world that all shall seek their own. Christ and His immediate followers manifested a spirit the direct opposite of that which obtains in the world, and as long as the Church of Christ was disinterested and lifted above the low selfishness of the world around her, there was mighty power in her. "The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and one soul: neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." Lying could not take root among them then, as we see in the case of Ananias and Sapphira; half-hearted men dared not join themselves to them; multitudes were added to the Lord, and all the sick were healed.

How stands the matter with us now? We are sometimes put into difficult circumstances; for instance, a doctor has ordered us something in the way of treatment which will inconvenience some one else if it is carried out. There is perhaps one sofa, and we are ordered always to lie down, and thus to monopolize the sofa whether any one else is tired or not. The family drink tea for breakfast; we are ordered perhaps cocoa, which adds, if ever so little, to the trouble. Again we are ordered only to eat certain things and to have meals at certain hours. Now why should we at the bidding of a poor fallible man, whose treatment can only succeed if God blesses it, why should we give ourselves over to a selfishness which comes from the same root as this covetousness which is so abhorrent to God? "But I must obey the doctor," you say. The first Apostle said: "We ought to obey God rather than man" (Acts 5: 29), and if we do so, God will not let the consequences be hurtful. Let us never make the doctor an excuse for an undue regard to self.

Again, there are others who make their position in society an excuse for selfishness, which, in the main, is the same as covetousness. A young lady who has little pocket-money will say: "I must travel first class; my position requires it of me," and thus she gives to her position in society that which she might give to the work of God. "I must always have my maid with me," when, if she could go hither and thither alone, she would reach the hearts of the people better by not letting them feel the worldly difference which exists between them and her. Then there is the extremely false idea that to do a little housework is derogatory. O how we need simplicity, that we may be freed from covetousness. Again, how often believers seek the best places in meetings, the best seats in the train, without regard to the accommodation of others, and all this savors of covetousness. "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth," but eternal life, on the contrary, consists in being possessed by Christ.

In our subject we read that as Jesus was teaching, "one of the company said unto Him, Master, speak unto my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me." The man had remarked the power of Jesus's words, and being unable to overcome his brother by any other means, he sought to make use of Jesus for his own ends. Just as a certain mistress whose own Christian life had been so wanting in power that she had been unable to win her servant to Christ, seized the first earnest Christian she met with, and said: "O do speak to my servant," and in the depth of her heart she sought her own ends, for she wanted to have an easier time with her servant, and it was not the poor girl's salvation which she sought. The servant felt that her mistress had selfish ends in view, and her heart was steeled against the Gospel. In order that we may have power with God we must put our own ends out of the question, and seek only His glory. It is needless to say the man's request was not granted, the Lord was not sent to be a divider of earthly goods.

Then Jesus spake a parable to the people. He told them of a rich man in trouble. The bank had not broken, there had been no failure in the harvest, his health was good; what then was his trouble? God had given him more than he needed and he had nowhere to stow it away. But why should he? why not give it away? The man was unreasonable; he resolved to pull down his barns, and build greater, but even then he could not eat more than his daily portion, he could not sit in more than one room at a time, and if he had a hundred suits of clothes, it could only give him anxiety as to which he should wear, for he could not wear two together. O if he had been free from covetousness and had gone to visit a widow in the neighborhood and brought her a sack of flour for her winter store, if he had gone to a neighboring young farmer only just married who had a hard struggle to pull through, and had said: "Brother, I hear your difficulties are not at an end. God has prospered me on purpose that I should help you and I regard it as a privilege;" if he had found out all the old couples past work in the neighborhood and sent them a store for present need and then with the rest paid for the schooling of a few children, his heart would have been warmed by all who greeted him and he would have been looked upon as the father of the neighborhood. All which God gives us of earthly goods is a mere stewardship, He is the real proprietor.

This man, however, of whom Jesus spoke, came to the decision that he would pull down his barns and build greater and there bestow all his fruits and his goods and then he would say to his soul: "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." And this was all. No reference to God, and none to his fellow-creatures. "Such a life is earthly, sensual, devilish" (James 3: 15). But God, whom he had left out of his reckoning, broke suddenly in upon him, and asserted the claim which was His due; a claim upon the life which He had given. The unhappy, miserable, mean man counted on God's forbearance and reckoned on a long lease of life, in which he should live as though the God who gave it had no voice in the disposal of it. But though he might ignore God, God did not ignore such fearful unrighteousness. His life had been spent without any attempt to seek or to find God, and now he must have to do with God, whether he would or no. O how awful it is, that the first words of God which he is forced against his will to hear, are these: "Thou fool!" Jesus's first words to the paralytic were: "Son, be of good cheer;" to the widow of Nain, "Weep not;" to the leper, "I will, be thou clean." But all these expected something from Jesus. This man, however, had not God in all his thoughts, and God said to him: "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" God overrules all things, "to the sinner He giveth travail, to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God," and the sinner has "no end of all his labor; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, For whom do I labor, and bereave my soul of good?" (Ecc. 2: 26; 4: 8).

The Lord drew a lesson from the parable, "So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God." It is a rule in temporal and in spiritual things, that what we do for ourselves God will not do for us. While we try to save ourselves, the Lord will not save us; while we try to conquer sin by our own efforts, the Lord will not deliver us; while we come to His word as though we were masters of it, the Lord will not teach us; when we doctor our own bodies, the Lord will not heal us. Whatever treasure we lay up for ourselves, whatever work we do for our own credit, impoverishes us before God. Paul beautifully explains the true riches of a child of God, when he says: "As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things" (2 Cor. 6: 10).

Our beloved Lord proceeds to teach His disciples a lesson of entire trust in the most practical way: "Take no thought (be not anxious, Gr.) for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment." If the life and the body are the special care of our Heavenly Father, and if He is equal to the charge, what have we to do with anxiety?" "But," says perhaps some father of a family, "if I do not work my children will starve." This is perfectly true. Paul says of those who do not work: "Now to them that are such, we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread" (2 Thess. 3: 12), and he says further "Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content" (1 Tim. 6: 8). But there are so many who are not "therewith content," who will insist on having a certain style of dress, certain useless luxuries, a certain position, etc., and this it is, for the most part, which causes the anxious thought, "What shall we eat? or what shall we drink? wherewithal shall we be clothed?"

Mr. Gladstone Explained to the House of Commons the Ministerial measure for the relief of Ireland, which is known as the Land Bill, on April 7th. The bill is in two parts; of which one is directed toward the amelioration of the condition of Irish tenants, and the other to providing money to assist them to purchase land or to emigrate. The cable reports of the bill are somewhat obscure, and the measure itself appears to be of a somewhat complicated character. Its chief feature is the institution of arbitration courts, with the power to assess the rent value of farms and to protect tenants from capricious eviction. Appeal to the courts will be optional, but a tenant can have the amount of rent fixed by the courts, and can hold the farm for fifteen years at that rent, providing he observes certain specified covenants of the lease. The Land Commission is also empowered to purchase lands from owners desiring to sell, and to resell them to the tenants. The Commission may also lend to intending purchasers on mortgage three fourths of the purchase money, the principal and interest being repaid in thirty-five annual installments, each of them to be a twentieth part of the sum advanced. Persons desiring to emigrate to British colonies may obtain loans for the payment of expenses and the purchase of land, repayment to be secured by mortgage on the colonial farm they acquire.

These are the main provisions of the bill, so far as can be gathered from the cable summary. It will be seen that they are a long way from the demands of the Land League, and it may be doubted whether the people it is designed to benefit are sufficiently educated to understand it. It is, however, generally accepted as an evidence of an honest and sincere desire on the part of the Government to ameliorate the condition of the people. Mr. Gladstone in introducing the bill said that this was the most difficult question he ever had to deal with in the course of his political life, "and," he added, "nothing that can be legitimately done by a government for the promotion of legislation shall we hesitate to do to procure the passing of an effective measure to deal with the land question of Ireland." He also expressed the hope that by continuing to do justice Ireland would become reconciled to England, and "would gradually acquire self-government." The measure will be energetically opposed, both in the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

A Significant Commentary on the Character of the Irish Land Bill is furnished by the resignation of the Duke of Argyll, who held the office of Lord Privy Seal in Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet. The Duke of Argyll, who is the father of the Marquis of Lorne, is a prominent Liberal, and has held office in every Liberal administration of late years; he is also a close personal friend of the Premier's. We may therefore conclude that the Land Bill must be a very radical measure or it would not have separated the Duke from his colleagues. The Duke, in announcing his resignation, said: "I think the Government scheme will tend to paralyze the ownership of land by placing it under limitations unknown in any civilized country. Under this scheme neither landlord nor tenant will be the owner. The ownership will be in the commission, or in abeyance. This would result injuriously to the agricultural interests of any country, especially of Ireland. I felt that I could not, as an honest man, be responsible in recommending the scheme as a whole to Parliament. I regret to have separated from my friends, especially from Mr. Gladstone, with whom I have had connection of ever-increasing respect during twenty-nine years."

Riots Have Resulted in Ireland from the wholesale evictions which followed the enactment of the Coercion Bill. Process-servers, going from place to place escorted by the police, have been attacked, and several fatalities are reported. On April 2d a party was met by a mob at Clogher, in County Mayo, and a fight ensued in which the police were ordered to fire on the mob. They obeyed, and two men were shot and five others wounded. The sergeant in command fired the first shot, and he was immediately felled by a huge stone hurled at him. The mob afterward drove off the rest of the party, and falling upon the wounded sergeant with great ferocity, beat him to death. Another horrible affray is reported from the same county. A process server was attacked by two hundred women, armed with sticks and stones, at Ballinamore. His police escort fired on the women, mortally wounding a girl named Byrne and severely injuring another. The girl who was killed was twenty years old.

The death of the police sergeant has been made the subject of a demonstration almost unequalled in the history of Ireland. When the fatal result was announced, the country for miles around was lit up by bonfires, burning on every eminence in celebration of the event. From Ballaghdereen to French Park, and from Clogher to Loughglyn the whole population turned out to celebrate in this fashion the sad occurrence. These and other affrays have sprung directly from the serving of processes, which are being applied for and obtained by the thousand at various quarter sessions now being held throughout the country. In a few weeks the evictions, unless they are stayed by the retrospective action of Mr. Gladstone's bill, must follow, and then the country will be almost in the condition of civil war.

The Trial of the Nihilists Charged with complicity in the crime of the late Czar's assassination commenced in St. Petersburg on April 7th. The prisoners are five in all—namely, Russakoff, who threw one of the bombs; Jeliaboff, a conspirator-in-chief, arrested before the assassination, but known to have planned it, and to have arranged all the details; Michailoff, the young man arrested on entering the house where the police were lying in wait; Hessy Helfmann, and Sophie Pieoffsky. The last two are aristocratic young ladies who have been suspected by the police for a long time of being Nihilists. The father and grandfather of Sophie Pieoffsky have both held high office in the Czar's service. She herself fully acknowledged her participation in the criminal proceedings of the party, and admitted having given the signal to Hartmann for exploding the mine under the imperial train, and also the signal to Russakoff, when the Emperor's carriage drove into the canal road, in both cases by waving a pocket-handkerchief. She is described as small in stature and modest in demeanor, not at all like the typical Nihilists in outward appearance. The trials were concluded on April 9; all five of the prisoners being sentenced to death by hanging. Sophia Pieoffsky being of noble blood, her sentence will need confirmation by the Czar.

The rumor that Russian political prisoners are subjected to torture is denied by the St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Daily News, who says that if such an ordeal had been used he must have known of it, having seen and talked privately with several Nihilists before their execution.

Mr. Bradlaugh was Re-elected Member of the British Parliament at Northampton on Saturday last, 3378 votes being recorded for him and 3353 for his Conservative rival. As Mr. Varley's name is not mentioned in the telegram announcing the result, it may be supposed that the evangelist retired from the contest. The Conservatives announce their intention to oppose Mr. Bradlaugh taking the oath, as he has publicly stated that he regards it as an unmeaning formula.

An Earthquake Desolated Chios, the Capital of the island of Chios, or Scio, in the Greek Archipelago, on Sunday, April 3d. It is feared that over eight thousand persons were killed, and more than seven thousand seriously injured. The island is thirty-two miles long, and eighteen at its greatest breadth, with an area of about 500 square miles. It is one of the richest and most beautiful islands in the Greek Archipelago, producing wine, oranges, figs, and other fruit. The town is built of stone and defended by a castle. It possesses manufactures of velvet, and carries on a large export trade. A correspondent of the London Times reports that the first shock was felt on Sunday afternoon at about half-past one o'clock. Immediately houses began to fall. Wild shrieks were heard on every side. Then followed an awful silence of some minutes. The terrified survivors gradually ventured into the narrow lanes and reached the open spaces. Shortly afterward another terrible shock completed the devastation. Then it remained quiet until sunset, when it again began to shake the island throughout as severely as before. All night the shocks succeeded each other at short intervals. Since that frequent shocks have been felt. The old Genoese fortress, containing about four hundred houses, inhabited by Mussulmans and Jews, suffered more than the rest of the town. The ground there sank about two feet, and nearly all the houses were immediately destroyed, and several hundred persons must have perished. It is known that about thirty Mussulman women were assembled in one of the houses, not one of whom escaped.

The town is described as looking as if it had been terribly bombarded. Hundreds of houses are transformed into a shapeless mass of ruins, under which lie buried an unknown number of victims. A majority of the remaining houses are already cracked and roofless, and may fall at any moment. Nearly every building in the town has suffered more or less. The inhabitants wander about anxious to search for missing relatives or lost property, but are afraid to risk their lives in the perilous work of clearing away the rubbish. Forty thousand persons are reported to be in need of immediate relief.

News of a Disastrous Inundation at Seville is cabled from Madrid. The Guadalquiver River has swollen and overflowed its banks, covering four square miles of Seville and forty miles of the country around its mouth. The suburbs and streets have from one to twenty-seven feet of water in them. The people are living in the upper stories. The police are taking food and provisions by boat. All the valley and country beyond seems an immense lake. The tops of trees, churches, and roofs appear just above the waters, which sweep along cattle and crops, and the river is rushing over gardens and quays, entering the lovely St. Elmo Palace. The authorities already estimate the loss at Seville to be over $1,000,000, and in the country districts it is impossible to make any estimate at present. King Alfonso has sent royal engineers to superintend repairs to the embankments, and has placed his own private purse at the disposal of the authorities to relieve the sufferers.

Surrey Chapel, London, of which a Picture appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 20th, was closed on the evening of March 21st, its doors having been thrown open for Divine service for upward of five thousand Sabbaths. The building is inseparably associated with the name of Rowland Hill, the friend and contemporary of Whitefield, who, like the great revivalist preacher, took Holy Orders in the Church of England at the commencement of his public ministerial work. For fifty years he remained the pastor of Surrey Chapel, and died at the age of eighty-nine. His remains were interred under the pulpit. The first Sunday-school in London was started in connection with Rowland Hill's Church. The succeeding ministers of the chapel have been the Revs. James Sherman and Newman Hall. Some years ago in view of the expiration of the lease, Mr. Hall's congregation erected Christ Church, in Westminster Road, and migrated thither, and since then Old Surrey Chapel has been occupied by the Methodists, whose work will now be conducted in the Alexandra Hall close by. Surrey Chapel is either to be pulled down or diverted to other uses.

A Girl in Edinburgh, Scotland, who had Just arrived at a railway station there, was decoyed by persons who lurk about, and taken to a place of ruin and death. She discovered the kind of place she was in, rushed out of it, and appealed to a policeman for assistance. He said he had no place to send her to. Singular that in a city like Edinburgh there should be no place to send her to, or do anything for her protection; but the policeman sent her to the New Assembly Hall, where Major Whittle was conducting revival services. He probably thought that because the Gospel of Christ was being preached in the hall that aid and counsel would be given to her. She was left at the hall with her bandboxes and wraps, and there she found Christian help. It is hoped that she has found a refuge in the blood of Christ.

THE thrilling events which during the past two years have occurred in Russia, and especially the assassination of the Czar last month, have directed public attention to the affairs of that land, and many inquiries are made as to the cause of the bitter hostility manifested by a considerable portion of the Czar's subjects to Imperial rule. Some details of the life of Mr. John Venning, an Englishman, who from philanthropic motives visited Russian prisons and did much to ameliorate the condition of the unhappy inmates, will therefore be acceptable. He was a brother of the Walter Venning whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 8th, 1880.

Mr. John Venning was born at Totnes, Devonshire, England, May 20th, 1776, and died at Norwich, April 11th, 1858. His parents were pious and excellent people who manifested great concern for the temporal and spiritual welfare of their children, and gave John, who was their second son, a superior education at the grammar-school of his native town. At about fourteen years of age he was sent up to London, where he entered upon mercantile life in the counting-house of Messrs. Jackson & Co., Russian merchants. At this time he had

A MARVELLOUS ESCAPE.

"One morning," he writes, "I was playing with the ram-head of a crane of four stories high, when the man wound it up, not knowing I was clinging to it, and only saw me when at the top, and most miraculously caught me in at the top warehouse." The narrow escape, however, did not lead him to religious decision. The influences of home had, indeed, kept him from the coarser vices, but as yet he gave no signs of becoming a Christian.

In 1793, he first landed at St. Petersburg. By his business capacity and energy he soon attained a high position among the English residents in the Russian capital, becoming also well and favorably known to many of the Russian nobility. After his marriage, which took place in 1805, his social circle was constantly widened, and ultimately he had the honor of being introduced to the Imperial family, and received many invitations to balls and other Royal entertainments. His natural vivacity, open countenance, agreeable manners, and high business character, made him welcome wherever he went. Even when war broke out between Russia and Great Britain in 1806, Mr. Venning was still treated with kind and respectful consideration.

In 1815 his brother, Mr. Walter Venning, inspired by the example of Howard, resolved to relinquish commercial pursuits and give himself up entirely to philanthropic work among the Russian prisons. He went to St. Petersburg, where he received a cordial welcome from his brother John. Intercourse between the two on the greatest of all subjects seems to have led to deep impressions on the mind of John, and it was not long before he became a decided follower of Christ. He now manifested in Christian labors the zeal and energy which had hitherto been mainly conspicuous in business pursuits. Several bereavements which he afterwards sustained, including the death of his brother Walter, deepened and made more strongly-marked the spirituality and moral steadfastness, which henceforth were among his most striking characteristics. Meanwhile the uncle of the Czar recently assassinated, professed to have undergone a change of heart. The following account he gave to Bishop Eylert of Berlin. The Czar said:

"I felt a void in my heart, and a vague misgiving haunted my soul. I went on my way, I sought after diversions. But the great European struggle with Napoleon I., in which Moscow was burned in 1814, gave light to my spirit, and the judgment of God filled my heart with a warmth of faith I had never before experienced. I learned to know God as He is revealed in the Bible. I apprehended and continue to apprehend what is His mind and will. The resolution to devote myself and my reign to God and His glory ripened and grew strong within me. From that time I became a new man. . . . It is only since the Christian religion has been to me momentous above all things else, and since faith in the Redeemer has been powerfully felt, that peace (thank God) has found an entrance to my heart." After this profession the Czar often visited the Venning brothers.

One of these visits is thus described in the diary of Mr. John Venning: "On his last visit (Friday, July 27, 1823), the Emperor opened his heart to Mrs. Venning and myself as to his own experience of Divine things, in a manner which surprised and delighted us both. It was a most solemn season, and so delightful that I wrote down some of the particulars that very night, and I shall never forget it. The conversation flagged not for one moment, and he remained till eleven o'clock, although he had to return to his palace at Tzarskoïe-Celo, about twenty miles, the same night. The good monarch spoke with uncommon vivacity and earnestness. I was astonished at his advancement in the truth. He said that he recommended above all things continual prayer; that he undertook no one thing without first asking his Father's will, and endeavoring then always to act in accordance with it; and that sometimes when the turn which affairs took staggered him, he returned again to the Source of wisdom and grace for fresh guidance. The Emperor also strongly recommended united and mutual prayer, and said that he knew it by sweet experience to be attended with great blessings.

"He tenderly addressed Mrs. Venning in reference to the loss of our little boy, saying, 'When affliction first assails us, the Christian is alarmed; by and by he perceives that it is the Lord; and eventually falls down and blesses the hand that afflicts him.' 'I speak,' he said, 'by blessed experience.' He observed that in all his measures he heeded very little the opinion of the worldly with all their unjust censures, though he was shocked with some of the members of the Opposition in the English Parliament for attaching such motives as they did to his conduct. I told His Majesty that the language used by the best men in England was more than a set-off against such violent abuse, and mentioned Mr. Wilberforce's address at the Missionary meeting of the last year, 'I speak not of Alexander the Great, the destroyer of men, but of the great Alexander, the friend of men.' His Majesty was much affected and changed the subject.

"The conversation afterward took a most solemn turn. In the course of it I made the observation that the greatest saint on earth had no other resource in the hour of death than application to and reliance on the death of Christ. His Majesty in the most solemn and affecting manner with a look full of feeling and life, gave his heartfelt assent to this great truth. At this moment the scene was too affecting to be described. At eleven o'clock His Majesty rose from his chair and shook us most cordially by the hand, when Mrs. Venning gave the Emperor a pair of bell-ropes sent over by Mrs. Fry. He left us, I need not add, overwhelmed with love and joy, on beholding the grace of God shining with such lustre in the heart of the great and good monarch."

There is only too much evidence that in his spiritual progress, the Czar was greatly harassed and impeded by the wily priests of the Greek Church, of which he was a member. His natural timidity and feeble health made him scarcely a match for the astute and energetic defenders of superstition who surrounded him on every hand, but there is reason to hope that he built upon the Rock of Ages and died in the faith and hope of the Gospel.

When Walter Venning had completed the inspection of the prisons, an enterprise to which the Czar gave his cordial approval, a report was presented to Alexander, who promptly ordered the suggestions of Mr. Venning to be carried into effect.

THE STATE OF RUSSIAN PRISONS

at this time is said to have been so bad as to make description of them impossible. They were scenes of utter and hopeless disorder and nurseries of physical diseases and moral distempers. "Many of them," says the author of "Memorials of Mr. Venning," from which our summary of the facts of his life is drawn, "were without lazarettes or sick wards; and even where such had been provided, they were rarely, if ever, used. The tried and the untried were subjected to the same usage. The healthy and the sick, the sane and the insane, were crowded together. Men, women, and children, were promiscuously congregated. The hardened ruffian, the accomplished villain, the cunning rogue, the profligate, the drunkard, were to be seen in close association with the impoverished debtor, the passportless wanderer, the novice in crime, nay, even with the young apprentice or maidservant, innocent of further offence than that of having fallen under the displeasure of some prejudiced master or vindictive mistress.

"In these hot-beds of pestilence, these nests of vice, contagion of all sorts was spreading, and no hand had been out-stretched to arrest its baneful progress. From these, as from so many centres of evil, the poison was extending far and wide. A servant, incarcerated for some petty offence, was known on his release to carry back the jail-fever to his master's house, and bring death to more than one of its inhabitants, while multitudes were discharged from their captivity far riper for social mischief than when first immured."

On the death of Mr. Walter Venning, in 1821, his brother, the subject of this sketch, felt more than ever called upon to redouble his exertions to eradicate the evils, of which the above is an imperfect description, and gradually succeeded in introducing many beneficent changes.

In order to make himself more fully acquainted with the different phases of the work he had taken in hand, Mr. Venning visited Sweden, Germany, France, and England, everywhere instituting inquiries and making comparisons. The results of these travels and investigations were afterward seen in the extensive and practical reforms which Mr. Venning suggested to the Imperial government.

Whatever may have been the weakness, the vacillation, or the yet graver defects of Alexander I. as a monarch, he gave evidence at this period of a desire to promote the interests of his subjects, and Mr. Venning found in him a warm friend to every good and elevating measure. But in 1825 a new monarch ascended the throne, and Mr. Venning had many misgivings that might prove less favorable to philanthropic projects than his brother had been. Doubtless the new Czar lacked some of the good qualities of Alexander, although in point of energy and administrative ability the younger brother greatly surpassed the elder. However unscrupulous and unprincipled the foreign policy of the latter often was, it is but due to his memory to record that Mr. Venning always bore grateful testimony to the personal kindness of Nicholas and his interest in the alleviation of suffering and distress. Notwithstanding the turmoil which characterized a considerable part of his reign, His Majesty found time personally to inspect many of the prisons; on which occasions he was often accompanied by Mr. Venning, of whom he would make many kind inquiries about the prisoners. One of our illustrations depicts at Mr. Venning's sugestion. The scene is thus described in his "Memorials:"

THE CZAR PARDONING THREE AGED DEBTORS

"On entering the debtors' side, three very aged men with white locks cast themselves at the Emperor's feet, crying, 'Father, have mercy on us'—a most affecting sight. I saw it went to the monarch's heart. 'These are not prisoners,' he said. 'Imprisoned for debt, your Majesty; one for the last thirty years, and the other forty years.' 'No, they are no longer prisoners,' he said; then, waving his hand, he added; 'Arise, I will pay your debts'—and that without knowing the amount, which in all was considerable. I seized the opportunity of asking the Emperor whether the Scriptures might still be given to the prisoners. His Majesty replied, 'Most certainly; and as I see Jews here, I hope you give them to this class also, for they are very much to be pitied,' adding, 'Their obstinacy of unbelief is remarkable.'"

Besides his prison labors, Mr. Venning devoted much time and attention to schools, and was the main instrument in the establishment of a House of Refuge, which, to this day opens its gates to the afflicted and destitute.

EXPOSING A SHAM BEGGAR.

But kind as was Mr. Venning's heart, he was not to be imposed upon by mendacity or fraud. The following case, related by himself, may be taken as a sample of many others: "At one time, an old man of above seventy, and of venerable appearance, was received on account of his lamentable tale of destitution and distress, which was confirmed by his shattered appearance and the state of his clothes. I was soon informed by one of the inmates that he had coffee and other luxuries of an evening, which the Refuge had not the means of allowing any one. This induced me to watch him, and I found that a woman was daily employed by him to traverse the town with a document, declaring that she collected the charities of the benevolent for this man, giving a feigned name, and stating that he was bedridden. Some days she brought him fifteen roubles. I further discovered that he had in the town a brother and a nephew, men of great respectability and ample means, who had in vain offered to provide for him comfortably for the remainder of his days, but he preferred a beggar's life, and resisted all their attempts to turn him from his lazy career.

"One morning I called him into the office, and said, 'I have a great favor to beg of you!' He stared. I asked, 'Can you lend me for a short time 10,000 roubles?' He became angry. I then said, 'If you have not that sum, you can get it.' He declared that he knew not a soul in the town. 'You can get it,' I said, 'from your brother or your nephew; they are distressed beyond measure at your disgraceful conduct; you see I know the whole.' He denied everything in the most boisterous and insolent manner. I said, 'Go to your room, and I shall take other measures to-morrow;' but on my return to the refuge the following morning he had decamped."

FRUSTRATING A PLOT.

Notwithstanding his ardent philanthropy and ceaseless self-devotion, Mr. Venning encountered at different times bitterest opposition from designing men who hated him for his evangelical faith or his bold exposure of their deception and cunning. Occasionally they succeeded in thwarting some of his plans, but generally, as in the following instance, he was enabled with well doing to put to silence their ignorance and defeat their intrigues.

Not far from Mr. Venning's residence was a church, in the immediate neighborhood of which a small hospital was once projected. The village priest wrote a letter to Mr. Venning, urging its necessity. The influx of field laborers in the summer, and of Poles employed during the autumn in the unhealthy occupation of cleansing the canals and ditches, showed it to be a highly desirable thing; while the number of untaught children suggested the idea of establishing at the same time a village-school. It seemed likely that the wealthy owners of the adjacent villas and estates would feel an interest in both objects, and take a share in promoting them. Mr. Venning submitted the plans to the Princes Galitzin and Mestchersky, as also to the Princess Sherbatoff, who was his nearest neighbor; and he did not forget to include among the proposed managers the priest who had originated the idea. The sanction of the Emperor Nicholas was obtained, and a document was brought to Mr. Venning for his signature.

Accustomed to give his attestation in acknowledgment of an Imperial grant, and not suspecting a snare, he joyfully glanced at the paper, and without minutely examining its every clause, he hastily appended his name. In the evening a friendly ecclesiastic called on him with the inquiry, "What paper was it you signed today?" "Only a document acknowledging the receipt of the Emperor's order." "More than that," was the sorrowful reply; "you have taken upon yourself the whole responsibility of executing it; and the Metropolitan has positively declared that there shall be no hospital or school at all!" Mr. Venning saw the difficulty of his position. It was not simply an affair of monetary responsibility. He perceived the full force of what his friend added, "You will be taxed on the one hand with not executing the Emperor's designs, while on the other hand you will be deprived of the power to fulfil them." There seemed no way of escape, no possibility of revoking the pledge, no chance of cancelling the signature.

But the adverse party made a false move. Eager to make assurance doubly sure, and counting upon the trustfulness which had already been evinced, they sent back the officer of the district next morning with a second document drawn up in yet stronger terms. "Let me look at the one I signed yesterday," said Mr. Venning, quietly. It was handed to him. Without a moment's hesitation he coolly tore it in pieces, and threw it into the fire, before the astonished official could interfere. "Joann Vladimirovitch! what have you done?" cried the messenger, frantic with rage and terror; "and what will become of me? How can I return without that paper?" "That is my business," Mr. Venning replied; "go and tell those who sent you that I shall sign no document of the kind." The snare was broken.

IN DANGER FROM LUNATICS.

Mr. Venning also took great interest in lunatic asylums, into which he was the means of introducing many greatly-needed and beneficent reforms. Illustration 5 depicts the scene, as referred to by Mr. Venning in the following words: "During my visits, three or four times a week, the lunatics would sometimes take my arm and walk with me, and talk of their 'great plans,' or sometimes they would have me play at backgammon with them. Surrounded by them as I have been, I never received any injury; and when in imminent peril, which happened only once, the Lord delivered me. The brother of General R— had lost his senses from over-application to his studies at the University, and one day on my entering the room he cried out, 'Your name is Venning,' and then ran toward me foaming like a mad dog. Providentially two soldiers were near, and seized him, though he knocked down one of them in the scuffle. I retreated into the female ward. An hour afterward, he came up to me with tears in his eyes, held out his hand and begged my pardon.

ADDRESSING SOLDIERS AND PRESENTING BIBLES.

The last twenty-eight years of Mr. Venning's life were spent in Norfolk, England, where, especially at Norwich, his labors were numerous and varied, both as regards general and local efforts of benevolence. To the London Missionary Society he subscribed, and on one occasion gave £600, the annual interest of which was to be devoted for the support of native teachers in India. His zeal for the circulation of the Scriptures never grew slack; he at one time employed a person to keep a stall in the market-place for the sale of Bibles and Testaments; and he was among the foremost of those who, in the year 1853, promoted the gift of Bibles to the West Norfolk Militia, when quartered in the town. "Oh, how cheering," wrote Mr. Knill, "to see his silver locks in 'the hollow square,' and to hear his voice at seventy-seven haranguing the soldiers!"

It would be impossible in the space at our disposal to enter into details of the numerous ways in which Mr. Venning fulfilled the high responsibilities which Providence had committed to him. It must suffice to say that he was the means of removing many of the worst features of prison life in Russia, and introducing into many a foul den of iniquity a humane and Christian spirit.

He died at Norwich, April 11th, 1858, in the eighty-second year of his age, beloved and honored by all who knew him. The close of his life was marked by sweet tranquillity and Christian resignation. Shortly before his death he expressed the desire that the following verse might be put on his tombstone:

"A guilty, weak, and helpless worm,
On Thy kind arms I fall;
Be thou my strength and righteousness,
My Jesus and my all."

THE LAST DAYS OF THOMAS PAINE.

The notorious Thomas Paine, who has directed so many thousands of persons into "the broad road that leadeth to destruction," died at the village of Greenwich, near New York, in 1809. At the time of his death Greenwich was the temporary residence of Stephen Grellet, the distinguished member of the Society of Friends, who labored so heroically as a preacher of the Gospel for more than half a century in France and America; and he recorded in his journal the following account of the last days of the great infidel:—

"A few days previous to my leaving home on my last religious visit, on hearing that he was ill and in a very destitute condition, I went to see him and found him in a wretched state; for he had been so neglected and forsaken by his pretended friends that the common attentions to a sick man had been withheld from him. The skin of his body was in some places worn off, which greatly increased his sufferings. A nurse was provided for him, and some needful comforts were supplied. He was mostly in a state of stupor, but something that had passed between us had made such an impression upon him that some days after my departure he sent for me, and on being told that I was gone, he sent for another Friend.

"This induced a valuable young Friend, Mary Roscoe, who had resided in my family, and continued at Greenwich during part of my absence, frequently to go and take him some little refreshment suitable for an invalid, furnished by a neighbor. Once when she was there three of his deistical associates came to the door, and in a loud, unfeeling manner said, 'Tom Paine, it is said you are turning Christian, but we hope you will die as you have lived;' and then went away. On which, turning to Mary Roscoe, he said: 'You see what miserable comforters they are!'

"Once he asked her if she had ever read any of his writings. And on being told that she had read but very little of them, he inquired what she thought of them, adding, 'From such a one as you I expect a correct answer.' She told him that when very young, his 'Age of Reason' was put into her hands; but that the more she read in it, the more dark and distressed she felt, and she threw the book into the fire. 'I wish all had done as you,' he replied; 'for if the devil has ever had any agency in any work, he has had it in my writing that book.' When going to carry him some refreshment, she repeatedly heard him uttering the language, 'O Lord! Lord God!' or, 'Lord Jesus, have mercy upon me.'

"It is well known that during some weeks of his illness, when a little free from bodily pain, he wrote a great deal. This his nurse told me; and Mary Roscoe repeatedly saw him writing. If his companions in infidelity had found anything to support the idea that he continued on his deathbed to espouse their cause, would they not have eagerly published it? But not a word is said; there is a secrecy as to what has become of these writings."

A Liberal Journal in Madrid, that is, a Secular journal opposed to the Roman Catholic party, thus describes how the holy days of the Church are celebrated: "The night of the Last Supper is celebrated by eating fried mullet, at an unseasonable hour of the night; the memory of the dead with an orgie of buns; the memorable Ash Wednesday, with the burial of sardines; the day of Christ's death in street perambulations, with gaudy colored veils, the afternoon presenting a scene of general clamor; the Resurrection day with the first bull-fight of the season; the feast of St. Joseph with exquisitely prepared flummery; that of San Isidro with whistles; that of St. John and St. Peter with a night's carouse, perfumed with fried oil and brandy; next the procession of a great god and a little god, celebrated with hallelujahs."

EASTER LILIES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Delivered Last Sunday Morning, April 17, 1881.

[The Tabernacle was tastefully decorated with flowers presented by the ladies of the congregation. In the centre of the platform, upon a carved stand, stood a large fancy straw basket filled with yellow and red roses, with a row of callas about the edge. On either side were semi-circular stands of five steps, each filled with growing plants of many kinds. Beyond these were parlor stands covered with large bouquets and then two other semi-circular stands for potted plants. Upon the corners of the rostrum stood rustic stands with plants and bouquets. In front of these, all around the edge of the platform, was a double row of potted plants, filling up all the interstices and giving the rostrum the appearance of an impenetrable barricade of flowers. There were roses of every hue, numbers of rich foliage plants, pale and deep-dyed fuchsias, red, yellow, and white tulips, spring-breathing crocuses, forget-me-nots, broad-branched azaleas, gorgeous rhododendrons, geraniums of every variety, petunias and carnations in profusion, double hyacinths, and a hundred other representatives of the floral kingdom, with sprigs of refreshing evergreen and smilax breaking out here and there through the glowing mass. Above against the organ pipes was a life-size cross of pure white roses entwined together so as to appear in the distance like a frame of immortelles. Beneath in letters of red and white roses was the Easter symbol: "He is risen."]

The lily is the queen of Bible flowers. The rose may have disputed her throne in modern times, and won it; but the rose originally had only five petals. It was under the long-continued and intense gaze of the world that the rose blushed into its present beauty. In the Bible train, cassia and hyssop and frankincense and myrrh and spikenard and camphire and the rose follow the lily. Fourteen times in the Bible is the lily mentioned; only twice the rose. The rose may now have wider empire, but the lily reigned in the time of Esther, in the time of Solomon, in the time of Christ.

Cæsar had his throne on the hills. The lily had her throne in the valley. In the greatest sermon that was ever preached, there was only one flower, and that a lily. The Bedford dreamer, John Bunyan, entered the house of the interpreter, and was shown a cluster of flowers, and was told to "consider the lilies."

We may study or reject other sciences at our option. It is so with astronomy, it is so with chemistry, it is so with jurisprudence, it is so with physiology, it is so with geology; but the science of botany Christ commands us to study when He says, "Consider the lilies." Measure them from root to tip of petal. Inhale their breath. Notice the gracefulness of their poise. Hear the whisper of the white lips of the Eastern and of the red lips of the American lily.

Belonging to this royal family of lilies is the lily of the Nile, the Japan lily, the Lady Washington of the Sierras, the Golden Band lily, the Giant lily of Nepaul, the Turk's cap lily, the African lily from the Cape of Good Hope. All these lilies have the royal blood in their veins. But I take the lilies of my text this morning as typical of all flowers, and this Easter day, garlanded with all this opulence of floral beauty seems to address us, saying, "Consider the lilies, consider the azalias, consider the fuchsias, consider the geraniums, consider the ivies, consider the hyacinths, consider the heliotropes, consider the oleanders. With deferential and grateful and intelligent and worshipful souls, consider them. Not with insipid sentimentalism, or with sophomoric vaporing, but for grand and practical and every-day, and, if need be, homely uses, consider them.

The flowers are

THE ANGELS OF THE GRASS.

They all have voices. When the clouds speak, they thunder; when the whirlwinds speak, they scream; when the cataracts speak, they roar; but when the flowers speak, they always whisper. I stand here to interpret their message. What have you to say, O ye angels of the grass, to this worshipful multitude?

This morning I mean to discuss what flowers are good for. That is my subject: What are flowers good for?

I. I remark, in the first place, they are good for lessons of God's

PROVIDENTIAL CARE.

That was Christ's first thought when He said, "Consider the lilies." All these flowers seem to address us to-day, saying, "God will give you apparel and food. We have no wheel with which to spin, no loom with which to weave, no sickle with which to harvest, no well-sweep with which to draw water; but God slakes our thirst with the dew, and God feeds us with the bread of the sunshine, and God has apparelled us with more than Solomonic regality. We are prophetesses of adequate wardrobe. If God so clothed us, the grass of the field, will He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?"

Men and women of worldly anxieties, take this message home with you. How long has God taken care of you? Quarter of the journey of life? half the journey of life? three quarters the journey of life? Can you not trust Him the rest of the way? God does not promise you anything like that which the Roman emperor had on his table at vast expense—five hundred nightingales' tongues—but He has promised to take care of you. He has promised you the necessities, not the luxuries—bread, not cake. If God so luxuriantly clothes the grass of the field, will He not provide for you, His living and immortal children? He will.

No wonder Martin Luther always had a flower on his writing-desk for inspiration. Through the cracks of the prison floor a flower grew up to cheer Picciola. Mungo Park, the great traveller and explorer, had his life saved by a flower. He sank down in the desert to die, but seeing a flower near by, it suggested God's merciful care, and he got up with new courage and travelled on to safety. I said the flowers are the angels of the grass. I add now, they are the evangels of the sky.

II. If you insist on asking me the question, What are flowers good for? I respond, they are good

FOR THE BRIDAL DAY.

The bride must have them on her brow, and she must have them in her hand. The marriage altar must be covered with them. A wedding without flowers would be as inappropriate as a wedding without music. At such a time they are for congratulation and prophecies of good. So much of the pathway of life is covered up with thorns, we ought to cover the beginning with orange-blossoms.

Flowers are appropriate on such occasions, for in ninety-nine out of a hundred cases it is the very best thing that could have happened. The world may criticise and pronounce it an inaptitude, and may lift its eyebrows in surprise and think it might suggest something better; but the God who sees the twenty, forty, fifty years of wedded life before they have begun, arranges all for the best. So that flowers, in almost all cases, are appropriate for the marriage day. The divergences of disposition will become correspondences, recklessness will become prudence, frivolity will be turned into practicality.

There has been many an aged widowed soul who had a carefully locked bureau, and in the bureau a box, and in the box a folded paper, and in the folded paper a half-blown rose, slightly fragrant, discolored, carefully pressed. She put it there forty or fifty years ago. On the anniversary day of her wedding she will go to the bureau, she will lift the box, she will unfold the paper, and to her eyes will be exposed the half-blown bud, and the memories of the past will rush upon her, and a tear will drop upon the flower; and suddenly it is transfigured, and there is a stir in the dust of the anther, and it rounds out, and it is full of life, and it begins to tremble in the procession up the church aisle, and the dead music of a half century ago comes throbbing through the air; and vanished faces reappear, and right hands are joined, and a manly voice promises, "I will, for better or for worse," and the wedding march thunders a salvo of joy at the departing crowd; but a sigh on that anniversary day scatters the scene. Under the deep-fetched breath, the altar, the flowers, the congratulating groups are scattered, and there is nothing left but a trembling hand holding a faded rosebud, which is put into the paper, and then into the box, and the box carefully placed in the bureau, and with a sharp, sudden click of the lock the scene is over.

Ah, my friends, let not the prophecies of the flowers on your wedding day be false prophecies. Be blind to each other's faults. Make the most of each other's excellences. Above all, do not both get mad at once! Remember the vows, the ring on the third finger of the left hand, and the benediction of the calla-lilies.

III. If you insist on asking me the question, What are flowers good for? I answer, they are good

TO HONOR AND COMFORT THE OBSEQUIES.

The worst gash ever made into the side of our poor earth is the gash of the grave. It is so deep, it is so cruel, it is so incurable that it needs something to cover it up. Flowers for the casket, flowers for the hearse, flowers for the cemetery.

What a contrast between the grave in the country churchyard, with the fence broken down and the tombstone aslant, and the neighboring cattle browsing amid the mullein-stalks and the Canada thistles, and a June morning in Greenwood, the wave of roseate bloom rolling to the top of the mounds, and then breaking into foaming crests of white flowers all around the pillows of dust. It is the difference between sleeping under rags and sleeping under an embroidered blanket. We want Old Mortality with his chisel to go through all the graveyards of Christendom, and while he carries a chisel in one hand, we want Old Mortality to have some flower-seed in the palm of the other hand.

"Oh," you say, "the dead don't know; it makes no difference to them." I think you are mistaken. There are not so many steamers and rail trains coming to any living city as there are convoys coming from heaven to earth; and if there be instantaneous and constant communication between this world and the better world, do you not suppose your departed friends know what you do with their bodies? Why has God planted "golden-rod" and wild flowers in the forest and on the prairie where no human eye ever sees them? He planted them there for invisible intelligences to look at and admire, and when invisible intelligences come to look at the wild flowers of the woods and the table-lands, will they not make excursion and see the flowers which you have planted in affectionate remembrance of them?

When I am dead, I would like to have a handful of violets—any one could pluck them out of the grass, or some one could lift from the edge of the pond a water-lily—nothing rarely expensive or insane display, as sometimes at funeral rites where the display takes the bread from the children's mouths, and the clothes from their backs, but something from the great democracy of flowers. Rather than imperial catafalque of Russian Czar, I ask some one whom I may have helped by Gospel sermon or Christian deed to bring a sprig of arbutus or a handful of China asters.

It was left for modern times to spell respect for the departed and comfort for the living in letters of floral Gospel. Pillow of flowers, meaning rest for the pilgrim who has got to the end of his journey. Anchor of flowers, suggesting the Christian hope which we have as an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast. Cross of flowers, suggesting the tree on which our sins were slain.

If I had my way, I would cover up all the dreamless sleepers, whether in golden-handled casket or pine box, whether in king's mausoleum or Potter's Field, with radiant and aromatic arbo-escence. The Bible says, in the midst of the garden there was a sepulchre. I wish that every sepulchre might be in the midst of a garden.

IV. If you insist on asking me the question, What are flowers good for? I answer,

FOR RELIGIOUS SYMBOLISM.

Have you ever studied scriptural flora? The Bible is an arbetum, it is a divine conservatory, it is a herbarium of exquisite beauty. If you want to illustrate the brevity of the brightest human life, you will quote from Job: "A man cometh forth as a flower, and is cut down." Or you will quote from the Psalmist: "As the flower of the field, so he perisheth; the wind passeth over it, and it is gone." Or you will quote from Isaiah: "All flesh is grass, and the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field." Or you will quote from James the Apostle: "As the flower of the grass, so he passeth away." What graphic Bible symbolism!

All the cut flowers of this Easter day will soon be dead, whatever care you take of them. Though morning and night you baptize them in the name of the shower, the baptism will not be to them a saving ordinance. They have been fatally wounded with the knife that cut them. They are bleeding their life away; they are dying now. The fragrance in the air is their departing and ascending spirits.

Oh, yes! flowers are almost human. Botanists tell us that flowers breathe, they take nourishment, they eat, they drink. They are sensitive. They have their likes and dislikes. They sleep, they wake. They live in families. They have their ancestors and their descendants, their birth, their burial, their cradle, their grave. The zephyr rocks the one, and the storm digs the trench for the other. The cowslip must leave its gold, the lily must leave its silver, the rose must leave its diamond necklace of morning dew. Dust to dust. So we come up, we prosper, we spread abroad, we die, as the flower—as the flower!

Change and decay on all around I see;
O Thou who changest not, abide with me!

Flowers also afford mighty

SYMBOLISM OF CHRIST,

who compared Himself to the ancient queen, the lily, and the modern queen, the rose, when He said, "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys." Redolent like the one, humble like the other. Like both, appropriate for the sad who want sympathizers, and for the rejoicing who want banqueters. Hovering over the marriage ceremony like a wedding bell, or folded like a chaplet on the pulseless heart of the dead.

Oh, Christ! let the perfume of thy name be wafted all around the earth—lily and rose, lily and rose—until the wildernesses crimson into a garden, and the round earth turn into one great bud of immortal beauty laid against the warm heart of God. Snatch down from the world's banners eagle and lion, and put on lily and rose, lily and rose.

But, my friends, flowers have no grander use than when on Easter morning we celebrate the reanimation of Christ from the catacombs. All the flowers of to-day spell resurrection. There is not a nook or corner in all the building but is touched with the incense. The women carried spices to the tomb of Christ, and they dropped spices all around about the tomb, and from those spices have grown all the flowers of Easter morn. The two white-robed angels that hurled the stone away from the door of the tomb, hurled it with such violence down the hill that it crashed in the door of the world's sepulchre, and millions of the stark and dead shall come forth.

However labyrinthian the mausoleum, however costly the sarcophagus, however architecturally grand the necropolis, however beautifully parterred the family grounds, we want them all broken up by the Lord of the resurrection. The forms that we laid away with our broken hearts must rise again. Father and mother—they must come out. Husband and wife—they must come out. Brothers and sisters—they must come out. Our darling children—they must come out. The eyes that with trembling fingers we closed must open in the lustre of resurrection morn. The arms that we folded in death must join ours in embrace of reunion. The beloved voice that was hushed must be returned. The beloved form must come up without its infirmities, without its fatigues—it must come up.

Oh, how long it seems for some of you. Waiting—waiting for the resurrection. How long! how long! I make for your broken hearts to-day a cool, soft bandage of Easter lilies. Last night we had come in the mails a beautiful Easter card, on the top of it a representation of that exquisite flower called the "trumpet creeper," and under it the inscription, "The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised." I comfort you this day with the thought of resurrection.

When Lord Nelson was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral in London, the heart of all England was stirred. The procession passed on amid the sobbing of a nation. There were thirty trumpeters stationed at the door of the cathedral, with instruments of music in hand, waiting for the signal, and when the illustrious dead arrived at the gates of St. Paul's Cathedral, these thirty trumpeters gave one united blast, and then all was silent. Yet the trumpets did not wake the dead. He slept right on.

But I have to tell you, what thirty trumpeters could not do for one man, one trumpeter will do for all nations. The ages have rolled on, and the clock of the world's destiny strikes nine, ten, eleven, twelve, and time shall be no longer!

hovering. He takes the trumpet, points it this way, puts its lips to his lips, and then blows one long, loud, terrific, thunderous, reverberating and resurrectionary blast. Look! Look! They rise! The dead! The dead! Some coming forth from the family vault. Some from the city cemetery. Some from the country graveyard. Here a spirit is joined to its body, and there another spirit is joined to another body, and millions of departed spirits are assorting the bodies and then reclothing themselves in forms now radiant for ascension.

The earth begins to burn—the bonfire of a great victory. All ready now for the procession of reconstructed humanity! Upward and away! Christ leads, and all the Christian dead follow, battalion after battalion, nation after nation. Up, up! On, on! Forward, ye ranks of God Almighty! Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates, and let the conquerors come in! Resurrection! Resurrection!

And so I twist all the festal flowers of this church with all the festal flowers of chapels and cathedrals of all Christendom into one great chain, and with that chain I bind the Easter morning of 1881 with the closing Easter of the world's history—Resurrection! May the God of peace that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will.

A NIGHT ADVENTURE IN A SNOW-STORM.

GEOFFREY EASTON had been suddenly summoned from his chambers in the Temple in London, where so many barristers have their quarters, to the bedside of his dying father. The affection cherished between them was of no ordinary character. Geoffrey had never known his mother, and as he grew up toward manhood his father lavished upon him all the tender affection and solicitude that he would have received had he enjoyed the felicity of knowing both his parents, and father and son were worthy of each other.

It was a memorably bitter night. The distance to be traversed was twenty miles ere Geoffrey could reach his father's house, where even now he was being anxiously awaited; and he had already accomplished one-half of the journey, when, on passing the residence of a fellow-barrister, he alighted from his horse for a few moments that he might pay him a friendly visit. When he again appeared at the door a wave of sleet and snow, impelled by the rushing wind, swept over him, whistling and whirring with a wailing and melancholy sound.

"Why, my dear fellow, can't you wait until the morning before you finish your journey?" said Harold Stanley.

"I tell you I must go on to-night!" Geoffrey exclaimed. "Then, Heaven be with you and protect you!" said his friend.

The traveller sprang into the saddle, and speedily left the village of Bushey far behind, but presently the speed and the heavy roads began to tell upon his gallant mare. The horseman had soon passed beyond the pale of human habitations, save for a few straggling farm-houses lying away from the main road, and which could not be discerned in the almost Cimmerian darkness that now enveloped all. Down came the snow in large flakes, beating against the traveller, and increasing in volume. As the wind shrieked about his ears, reflection convinced him of the prudence of seeking some temporary shelter. But no haven of refuge was visible.

Peering as best he could into the haze and the darkness, Geoffrey urged forward his horse, hoping every moment to be rewarded by the appearance of some friendly resting-place. Absolute exhaustion, however, was now beginning to overtake his steed, and this fact at last aroused the rider to a sense of his personal danger. Coming to a turn in the road, he decided to dismount, and, after tethering his faithful animal to a tree, to search on foot for some place of shelter. But just at this moment he descried in the distance a light streaming from a window in a cottage. Nerving himself and his horse to another effort, the latter plunged forward with his remaining energy, and had almost reached the desired goal, when his foot stepped into a small gully, running at the end of the garden attached to the cottage.

Geoffrey was thrown forward out of the saddle, and came in contact with a piece of rude stonework, and for a considerable time lay upon the ground utterly unconscious.

The noise of the horse's hoofs had been heard by the inmates of the cottage during a lull in the storm, and the door was quickly opened, and two persons made their appearance. One of these was a middle-aged man, and the other a girl just bordering upon womanhood. On reaching the foot of the garden they discovered the body of a man lying upon the ground, and his horse standing near him. Speechless and motionless, the stranger made no response whatever to his questioners.

"Oh, father, father, he is dead!" exclaimed the girl, as she bent over the fallen body, and perceived blood oozing from the traveller's head upon the snow. "I will go and fetch a lantern."

She immediately returned with a light, and knelt down in the snow. By the aid of the flickering gleam the man removed the horseman's cap, and saw that his eyes were closed. Throwing himself upon the ground, he unfastened Geoffrey's clothing, and after a few moments' examination, said, "He's living! he breathes, thank Heaven!"

Geoffrey was carried into the cottage, and restoratives applied to him. At length he was left in a small apartment by himself. He could not sleep, but he reflected with profound satisfaction upon his escape from imminent peril. Death can rarely be regarded with equanimity; but it wears a terrible aspect when encountered in the highways of life away from those whose love should tend the couch of suffering. His own unpreparedness for eternity also flashed upon his mind as a new revelation, and he resolved that if his life were spared, it should be devoted primarily and in all things to the glory of God and the good of men.

It was nearly three months before the journey was completed, which commenced on that eventful night. Meanwhile, Geoffrey's father had, contrary to the expectations of everybody, recovered from the worst phases of the malady which threatened to carry him to the grave, and father and son together rejoiced at the goodness and sparing mercy of God. As a memento of his escape from imminent death, Geoffrey, with the concurrence and cordial approval of his father, purchased the property on which the cottage stood in which he passed three months of pain and weariness; and in which he was led by the ministry of sanctified suffering to Christ, and there now stands upon its site a neat little village sanctuary, erected at the Eastons' expense, in which many a broken heart has found a solace, and many a heavy-laden sinner has stepped forth into the blessed freedom and peace of the sons of God.

After a Fruitless Journey of 240 Miles Returns to Hobart Town—Thoughts of his Mother—Meets an Old Liverpool Friend and Joins Him at Work—Becomes Farm Manager—Difficulties with the Convicts—Rents a Farm with a City Man—Tasmanian Animals.

I LANDED in Hobart Town, March 10th, 1833, just twenty-eight years after Collins, with his convicts, founded a settlement there and built the nucleus of the present capital. I landed six years after it had become a colony distinct from those on the larger island, and about three years before the founding of the Port Philip colony with its capital, Melbourne, which was then a waste. I landed some eighteen years before the world's great gold scramble began, causing a rush toward the South Pole. When I landed the energetic and despotic Colonel George Arthur ruled over a population in which the convict element was the largest.

The first sight I saw on landing was a gang of some two hundred convicts working in cross-irons. That is, a bar of iron between their ankles and from it a chain fastened to a belt round their loins. The clank and rattle of the irons were incessant as they wrought, and it drowned every other sound. It was anything but like what travellers describe as the lulling sounds of sheep and cattle bells in sweet Alpine valleys. Alas! it was the wolf-bell rather than the sheep-bell.

The convicts were dressed in piebald costume, the one half white down one side and the one half black down the other. Nature makes a kind of uniformity between the color of grouse and stubble, and between fish and the river bottom, to help them to escape; but I suppose government equips its servants on the opposite principle. I was struck with despondency at sight of these degraded-looking fellow-creatures. Their low, scowling, animal looks gave me a better idea of the fall of man than could Boston's Fourfold Estate. And yet, I could not but reflect that if I were in those irons for a few months, I might be as degraded or desperate as they; and that many have been transported for shooting a stray hare, a pheasant, or a deer. "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone."

After this I saw gang after gang, most of them in yellow, till I got familiar with such sights. Indeed, at that time Colonel Arthur was employing convict labor largely on the River Derwent, making roads, especially that toward Launceston and the great bridge that spans the noble river. It was, perhaps, the very best way that convict labor could be applied, and it laid the foundation of prosperity for the colonies, and set other labor free for other purposes.

Jerrold Lock left for Sydney; and, as my funds were low and there appeared no suitable work in Hobart Town, I and two shipmates set off for a cruise in the interior. Our object was to get some permanent employment, where we could at once earn wages and colonial experience. We went up the Derwent for some ten miles the first day. Here we reached the little road-side inn whose sign was a great black snake. I suppose it was intended to show either that snakes had once been there, or that the inn was a refuge for them. A teetotaller would affirm the venomous reptile to be the emblem of the fiery serpent of alcohol housed there—the serpent that kills more immigrants than the literal black snakes. The day was very hot, and as our feet were swollen after confinement so long on the little ship, we were glad of the inn to give us some rest and refreshment.

Having spent a restful night at the little inn, we arose next morning with the sun, and in the best of spirits and full of hope, resumed the march. We went some ten miles farther up the Derwent, to its junction with the Clyde, where stands on a hill the town of New Norfolk. Up the banks of this latter river we made a journey of about a hundred miles, through the settled districts and nearly to its source. The country looked picturesque and fertile. As it was an agricultural district, settlements were nearer to each other than in a pastoral country. There were on all sides abundant crops of every kind. Apples, peaches, nectarines, apricots, and water melons were fine and plentiful.

I was greatly struck with the transparency of the air and the fineness of the climate of Van Diemen's Land. The vegetation appeared very different from that of Ireland. In Ireland at that season—Patrick's day, March 17th—the naked trees would be recovering from winter's bleakness and swelling into bud. Here every tree was an evergreen, or rather an ever*blue*; for the landscape is far from that living green that summer robes it with in Ireland.

The trees were of enormous size, some of them great living columns shooting up about 100 to 150 feet high. Here were great blue or flooded gums near the water; there white gums higher up, their foliage like giants with scanty locks; and some, with last year's tattered bark shedding off, like grenadiers in rags. There were huge boxes, with hollow boles and boughs, from which parakeets popped out their bright heads, tier above tier, like beauties looking out of their dressing-room windows; while the opossums slept by day like sots. But to know what we should eat and where we ourselves should sleep, occupied our attention more earnestly than did the knowledge of trees where parrots and opossums eat and slept.

As most of the settlers had been old convicts, they looked on us free immigrants rather coldly; and as we were "raw," without colonial experience, we got no situations to suit us. We were kindly entertained at several places where we called—sometimes sleeping on a sheet of bark in a hut or shed; and we returned to Hobart Town sick at heart and sore of foot, after a journey of 240 miles.

I would have been for trying the bush longer, but there were several gangs of bushrangers then committing depredations, and blacks and whites were retaliating atrociously on each other. One of my companions, C—, was very timid, and the snapping of a stick or the fall of a leaf made his heart palpitate. The whole aspect of things was really depressing, and from my heart I wished I were back in dear old Ireland amid the prospects I left.

I fear I then wrote a rather despondent letter to my father; but, as my funds were reduced to half-a-crown, and half of that owed for washing, I resolved to do anything that offered, were it but to throw stones to a pavior. I went to my box to see something of my stock of clothing. There was plenty of it; but, alas! very unsuited to the climate: a dress coat with gilt buttons, drawers, trousers, flannels, that would suit Ireland or Iceland, but not Van Diemen's Land.

There, too, was a nightcap, and when I opened it there fell out a binder, such as I had seen my mother bind round my father's head the only time I ever saw him ill. Poor dear mother, she thought I might be ill in this distant land of strangers! When I opened the binder, there fell out a slip of paper, and written in my mother's hand, "James, my dear boy, come home to your parents if you don't succeed." Those words flashed like lightning into my heart and broke up its fountain.

Oh, if I could at that moment have returned, how willingly I should have done so! But now I could not return, and I must, by God's blessing, succeed. I must gladden the heart that dictated those words. That heart and others must not be depressed by my turning a great croaker or a great helpless child. I should go and look for work. Yes, but there are the Bible and Hymn book she wrote my name in, and desired me daily to read, were it but for fifteen minutes. Then I must not forget them or the God of whom they speak. See here is, broadly marked, one of her favorite hymns. Oh, for her faith!

"Peace, doubting heart, my God's I am,
Who formed me man forbids my fear,
Himself hath called me by my name,
Himself protects for ever near;
His blood for me did once atone,
And still He loves and guards His own.

"When passing through the watery deep,
I ask in faith His promised aid,
The waves an awful distance keep,
And shrink from my devoted head;
Fearless their violence I dare;
They cannot harm, for God is there.

"When darkness intercepts my skies,
And sorrow's waves around me roll,
When high the storms of passion rise,
And half o'erwhelm my sinking soul,
My soul a sudden calm shall feel,
And hear a whisper, 'Peace, be still!'"

My heart was not quite in my shoes, but in the way of sinking, when I fell across an old friend from Liverpool, in the little parlor of the Kangaroo Inn. I had on a blue broad-cloth swallow-tail coat with gilt buttons, and looked the greenest of the green. He eyed me from head to heel, not knowing whether he ought to pity or despise. We commenced to talk. "I s'pose you want a clerkship?" said he. "A spade, a rake, a hoe, or a pair of shears," quoth I. He shuffled on his seat and said, "I'm going to clear some ground for Commissary H. when I get a mate; but the gum stumps" (he did not mean of teeth) "are stiff and take practice to root them; I'll lend you tools if you try it. He gives two shillings a block."

We commenced to clear next day. He set to work with his might to try my mettle. I did not appear to mind it, but pitched hard into the block, and before night I had stump for stump out with him. The next day we wrought at separate stumps, and I could have gone ahead of him at my ease. He was delighted, and could hardly believe his eyes. So I had a right to thank experience of the spade and axe in old Ireland's hedges and ditches, on my father's farm.

We cleared more than seven, and sometimes ten shillings a day, till at last the commissary thought it easy work, and wanted to lower our wages. We rebelled, and threw down our hatchets. He got a lot of government men (convicts) to work, and they could not take out three blocks a day, where we took out three times three. So much for free versus slave labor. Even a scream of the cat-o'-nine-tails couldn't make the stumps dance. And so, we were engaged again at the old figure.

It was really fine, and enough to cure sea-sickness, home-sickness, and sun-sickness, I found my mate, an old bush-hand, first rate at cedar-sawing, and at splitting and fencing, and an altogether honest fellow; but, alas! his sovereigns soon grew too hot and riddled his purse. He wrought like a mule and spent like an ass, and then girded himself up for another lay-to at the timber. I tried to keep my purse-strings decently closed, and after seven weeks rooting out of blocks engaged to manage a large farm of land for a friend of his, by Mr. H.'s recommendation.

I was the only free person on the establishment. All the laborers, some twelve, were government men (convicts) assigned to my employer. I was allowed a lad of about fourteen years of age as hut-keeper and cook. He also was a prisoner. I soon found my situation a critical one. I could not please my employer without getting the men flogged. This I would not do. I had experience enough already to know that that sort of cruelty was generally needless, and always ill-connected—was the child of folly, the sister of passion, the mother of bushranging, and the grandmother of endless murders.

I could tell you shocking stories of the cruelty of overseers and masters, at last driving men to the bush, after they had, in revenge perhaps, laid open the skull of a master or overseer with spade or axe. I resolved that, by God's help, I never would get the flesh of a fellow-creature lacerated by the cat-o'-nine-tails—and so I left. Mr. —— had heard of me as a free immigrant, and proposed to me to rent a farm of 140 acres from him at £100 a year. I did so with a young man from London, a free immigrant like myself. He had some little capital, but no knowledge of a farm, no more than if he had just been transplanted out of the hot-house—a real city exotic. We kept it for a year, and made some money.

Our farm was situated about seventeen miles from Hobart Town, in a place called the Black Brush, near to Brighton; and the little river Jordan ran through the centre of it. It was bounded by hills on either side, and these abounded with kangaroos, opossums, bandicoots, and native cats. There were also rockwallibys and opossum-rats. But more of these again.

THE HOUR AND THE MAN.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Man Prepared for the Hour—A Predicted Hour—The Man about to Appear—The Signs of His Coming—Antichrist's Own Time—Signs of its Arrival—A Moral Sign, Lawlessness—In the Church—In the Relations of Life—Political—Social—Commercial—Domestic.

We are instructed by the Preacher that "To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under heaven" (Ecclesiastes 3 : 1). And the common experience of mankind has embodied itself in the proverb that the hour ever brings the man. That is to say, in other words, whenever a Divine purpose is ripe for its accomplishment, we may rest assured that God will not permit such accomplishment to be either frustrated or delayed by the want of the fitting human instrument for effecting it.

On the truth of this assurance the pages of history are a running commentary. Thus, before the mysterious hand inscribed on the walls of Belshazzar's palace the doomful words, "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin," God had raised up His "anointed," Cyrus, to be not only the instrument of His judgment against Babylon, but also His "shepherd" in regard to Israel; "even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid" (Isaiah 44 : 28). It was when the corruptions of the Church of Rome had become too grievous to be borne, and either the purification or destruction of Christianity seemed inevitable, that God called forth from His monastery at Erfurth "the solitary monk who shook the world," and mainly by the instrumentality of Luther brought about the great German Reformation.

And so, to take but one other illustration from our own day, it was when the tyranny and misgovernment of the Bourbons had made Italy the prison-house of civil and religious liberty that the heroic Garibaldi was raised up, and with his cry of "Rome or death!" not only brought the Austrian empire to the verge of ruin, and secured the united Italy of to-day, but ultimately, as the final issue of the revolution, achieved the destruction of the temporal power of the popes. Even so, though overshadowing all such merely secular examples by its spiritual grandeur, it was "when the fulness of the time was come, that God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Galatians 4 : 4, 5).

Once again the unresting finger on the dial-plate of time approaches and once again the man will appear. For as it was when the fulness of the time was come that the Christ was manifested in gracious answer to the world's crying need, so does Paul forewarn us that it is "in his own time" that Antichrist shall be revealed in judgment on Christendom's consummated apostasy (Daniel 8 : 23). But how widely different will be the reception which the world will give the latter! Of Christ it is written that "He came unto His own, and His own people received Him not" (John 1 : 11); while regarding his future personator, He declared: "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in His own name, Him ye will receive" (John 5 : 43).

"That He may be revealed in His own time." That Antichrist is the dread personage referred to in these words hardly calls for proof, since the identity of St. Paul's "man of sin" (verse 3) and St. John's personal "Antichrist" (1 John 2 : 22) is practically conceded by all students of prophecy. Our present object is rather to inquire whether Scripture affords us any clear and reliable notes of the special epoch in the world's history at which this last great enemy of Christ is to appear; that so haply we may, by a careful consideration of the signs of this present time, form a correct opinion as to whether these notes of Antichrist's "own time" are, or are not, applicable to the days in which we live; or whether, at all events, the coming events which are to precede and accompany his advent do not even now manifestly "cast their shadows before."

Among such signs of the arrival of Antichrist's "own time," then, we find four revealed in Scripture with special distinctness, and to these, in their mutual order and relation, we propose in the present papers briefly to call attention. Careful students of the prophetic Word may doubtless discern other time-marks, but none, we think, which stand out with equal prominence, and about which there is so little room for an erroneous conclusion. Of these four the first, and what we may call the precursory, sign is of a moral character. The second and third, which seem almost to synchronize, are respectively spiritual and political; or, in other words, a heavenly and an earthly sign. But the fourth, which is also political, marks with the utmost precision the time of and may truly be regarded as the striking of the predicted "hour" on the clock of time, revealing to us the awful fact that the "man" is here!

The first or moral sign of the approaching revelation of the personal Antichrist we find distinctly indicated in the second chapter of St. Paul's second Epistle to the Thessalonians. In the sixth and three following verses he writes: "And now ye know what restraineth Him (i.e., the Antichrist), that He might be revealed in His own season. For the mystery of lawlessness doth already work; only he who now restrains (will restrain), until out of the midst He be gone, and then shall be revealed, whom the Lord Jesus shall consume with the breath of His mouth, and shall destroy with the forthshining of His presence."

In this remarkable prophecy we are taught the important fact that as the kingdom of Christ has first its period of mystery, to be followed by a period of manifestation, even so also has the kingdom of Antichrist. As early as the apostle's own days the mystery of lawlessness had commended to work, and it has continued to work up to the present time, and will so continue, till it is headed up in the appearance of that awful personage who is to be the very embodiment of its spirit, and the supreme manifestation of its power.

Now that "lawlessness" is in truth the most prominent as well as the most portentous characteristic of the present time is a fact patent to all who possess any moral sensibility and spiritual discernment. Not to wander in search of evidence beyond the limits of England, which we may surely regard as the most Christian country within the area of the old Roman world, in what department of modern English society is not "lawlessness"—utter, shameless "lawlessness"—eating as doth a canker? What class of the community does not painfully manifest its influence? We have not only in the most open expression of sceptical opinions and the most daring denial of the fundamental facts of the Christian faith by men who are its pledged and paid custodians, but we see self-styled "priests" setting the law of the land at defiance, and glorying in a little sham martyrdom, because their rulers in Church and State have neither the power nor the will to deal with them as any other class of lawbreakers would be dealt with.

We have lawlessness in politics; men of one political party bringing the most reckless and extravagant charges against their opponents, and even Christian men, as we would fain regard them, disgracing themselves and the sacred Name they name by shameful trickery, corruption, and falsehood, in order to further their party's interests and their own.

Nay, this spirit of lawlessness has entered the High Court of Parliament itself, and we witness at this moment (January 20th, 1881) the strange spectacle of the legislative functions of this great empire paralyzed by the obstructive opposition of a handful of disloyal and turbulent men, whose avowed object it is to rend the kingdom asunder, after having brought an integrant portion of it to the very verge of civil war.

We have "lawlessness"

of life, for do we not see, on the one hand, great land-owners and capitalists combining to defraud and oppress their hapless tenants and workpeople—as witness the inhuman and dishonest "evictions" in Ireland, and the cruel pressure put upon their employés by railway directors and coal-owners, in order to compel them to "contract themselves out" of the humane and righteous provisions of the Employers' Liability Act?

And, on the other hand, do we not also see workmen and servants, sometimes in sheer desperation, combining to "Boycott" their landlords, and going "on strike" when they think their employers are in a difficulty? Both parties alike—but the stronger more to their shame than the weaker—oblivious of the apostolic injunctions: "Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh. Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, with good-will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men. . . . And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with Him" (Ephesians 6 : 5–9).

of life, so that from the bank director to the petty tradesman every man's heart seems set on dealing unrighteously with his neighbor, and the recognized principle (?) of our ordinary business transactions—technically denominated "smartness"—appears to be, "I must do you or let you do me." Time was when it had become a common proverb that the English merchant's word was as good as his bond, but who trusts the English merchant's word now? or, for that matter, without careful scrutiny, his bond either? Time was when the "respectable" tradesman respected himself sufficiently to remember the solemn words of the wise man: "A false balance is abomination to the Lord, but a just weight is His delight."

But now, alas! he is more apt to make his own the words of the fool: "God hath forgotten; He hideth away His face; He will never see it;" if, indeed, he does not seek to assure himself with the too common thought, "Perhaps, after all, there is no God to know anything about it."

Worse than all, perhaps, this evil spirit has entered the sacred inclosure of the home, and we have "lawlessness"

of life. The bonds of conjugal fidelity are loosened, as witness the revolting disclosures of our divorce courts; the divinely commanded obedience and reverence of children for their parents has become, to a large extent, a thing of the past; and the family affection which made it less a matter of duty than a matter of course to aid and comfort the father or mother, the brother or sister fallen into poverty, is made to give way to the most callous selfishness. Marriage has in truth become a "market," in which mothers sell their daughters and maidens sell themselves for gold; and young men decide, as a matter of business, whether it be most expedient to marry for money, or keep a mistress to gratify their lust.

The picture is dark, but it is not overdrawn. St. Paul writes to Timothy: "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, lovers of money, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, implacable, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, haters of good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God" (2 Timothy 3 : 1–5). The indictment is a terrible one, but is it not all summed up in this one word, "lawlessness," and may not every count in it be made good against our English society of to-day? Nor does the attempt to conceal the moral hideousness of the spectacle by casting over it "a form of religion," any more avail, than the sheet thrown over the corpse can hide from us the fact that death is beneath.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Protracted Struggle in the Senate causes a general feeling of impatience throughout the country. While the highest legislative assembly in the land is devoting its time to unseemly disputes over the appointment of a few messengers and pages, important questions of national interest remain in abeyance. The Government and the public are both inconvenienced in order that the politicians may settle among themselves the division of the spoils. It is not a dignified spectacle, and even the Senators themselves are apparently beginning to realize the fact. It is true that these appointments are only the ostensible cause of the contest. Underlying it are the interests of the Republican party in the South, as affected by the Mahone attitude. But the interests of the Republican party may be obtruded a little too conspicuously on public attention. If public business is to be shelved in order that the interests of either the Republican or Democratic party may be promoted, the people may arrive at the conclusion that both parties are a nuisance demanding extinction. In the present position it suits the policy of a wing of the Republican party to gain time before proceeding to deal with the Robertson and other nominations, and therefore the question of the minor offices of the Senate being filled now or in December affords a convenient pretext for delay. But this delay is injurious to public interest, and a sense of that fact should end the struggle. Neither Republicans nor Democrats can afford to face the people with the suspicion attaching to them that they regard the national good as subordinate to party domination.

The Decision of the Cabinet in Reference to the six per cent bonds has been officially announced by Mr. Windom. The holders have been informed that the Government will be prepared to pay the principal and interest of the bonds on July 1st, the day they become subject to redemption. But those who may desire to remain creditors of the Government may do so, if they will accept three and a half per cent interest on their claims until permanent arrangements are made by Congress. Those who may choose the latter alternative must give notice at the treasury before May 10th, when new bonds, bearing three and a half per cent, and redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, will be issued in exchange for the six per cents. Interest at six per cent to July 1st will be prepaid with the new bonds. It appears that there is a technical illegality in the plan which Congress will be asked to condone. It is not apprehended that any difficulty will arise on that head, as the saving effected will be large, and the arrangement is only of a temporary character and subject to new legislation. The project has been received with general approval on the exchanges here and abroad. Bonds to the amount of $170,000,000 will, it is expected, be presented for exchange, and if the same plan is pursued with the five per cents it is thought about $350,000,000 will be brought in.

Polygamy in Utah will not be Voluntarily surrendered while the present head of the Mormons continues in office. The correspondent of an influential journal recently visited Utah, and had an interview with John Taylor on the subject. It was hoped that a movement for the abolition of "the institution" might be initiated by the Mormons themselves. The spread of education, the desire to be received into the Union, and the manifest evils of polygamy were expected to influence the Mormons, especially the younger generation, to commence the work of purification themselves. But Taylor's reply to a question as to the probability of such a movement was clear and emphatic. He assured his interlocutor that "polygamy is one of the corner-stones of the Mormon faith. It cannot and will not be removed on any account whatever." President Taylor is yet in the prime of life, and is likely to fill his office for many years to come. Therefore, even if they wish it, the young members of the Mormon community would not have the power to abolish the degrading system.

The Urgent Necessity for Affording Immediate relief to the families rendered homeless by the floods in Dakota and Nebraska was under consideration at a cabinet meeting on April 15th. President Garfield expressed an earnest desire to have every needed relief extended with the least possible delay. It was decided to authorize the issuing of army rations for two weeks, and clothing and supplies. An arrangement was also made by which salt meat, which cannot be furnished at the needed points in sufficient quantities by the War Department, is to be furnished through the Interior Department from the Indian supplies, to be replaced eventually by the War Department. Arrangements are being made for a public meeting to be held in Washington in behalf of the sufferers next week. The Indian Office to-day contributed 100 barrels of pork to the destitute in and about Yankton. Over a thousand families are rendered homeless by the floods, many of whom are in a destitute condition. In some cases they escaped in their night clothing without being able to secure even their shoes and stockings. Governor Ordway has issued an appeal for subscriptions to purchase clothing and medicines.

The Danger of an Epidemic in New York, as a result of the filthy condition of the streets of the city, formed the subject of consideration at a meeting of physicians on April 13th. The meeting was summoned by the Medical Society and the Academy of Medicine, and about two thousand physicians attended. Resolutions were unanimously passed, declaring that the present increase of the death-rate was mainly attributable to the dirt accumulated in the streets, and explaining in what way the negligence in street-cleaning prejudicially affected the health of the people.

Many eminent physicians were among the speakers, and expressed their apprehension that unless the heaps of decaying matter in the public thoroughfares were promptly removed, an outbreak of either typhus fever or cholera would ensue. The president, Dr. Willard Parker, said: "If the heated weather were to come, there never were so many factors for producing disease at one time as there are now. We have already indications of pestilence. The severe winter has enervated us, for we always find after a severe winter that we have a great deal of sickness. In the present circumstances of our city, I think that the conditions are favorable for such an outbreak in our midst. To guard New York against a pestilential invasion is of the first importance, for this city is a sort of key to the outside world. Pestilence or cholera is famous for travelling in broad highways, and if you have cholera, it will be impossible to hedge it in in this city alone, for it will travel along the States, find its way to New Jersey and the New England States, and thus disseminate itself over every part of the Union."

Professor Alfred L. Loomis, M.D., indorsed the president's remarks, and added: "Typhus fever is among us. You, fellow-citizens, who do not know what typhus fever is, who have not seen this terrible disease, do not tremble when you hear the word. But he who has known typhus fever in all its malignity—the experienced physician—can tell you that of all the contagious diseases it is the most contagious and the most fatal. Three weeks ago only a few cases were known. Now there are over one hundred cases of this dread disease in the city fever hospital. And this typhus fever is making its appearance, not only in the down-town streets—the dirty streets of the east side—the tenement-house quarters—but in Madison Square. Unless thorough cleanliness comes in, and we have the favoring breezes of heaven upon us, this contagion will force its way into your dwelling, no matter where you may live in New York. Typhus too, is the precursor of other diseases, and you will find that it has preceded more than one great epidemic—the cholera, the plague in London, and in other cases of pestilence that could be cited." A committee of five were appointed to convey the resolutions of the meeting to the Governor, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the Assembly at Albany.

Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., has been Unanimously elected honorary rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, New York, by the wardens and vestrymen of the church, who, with the congregation, have accepted his resignation of the position of rector with deep regret. Each of the three bodies has expressed its sympathy and regard for Dr. Tyng in a series of resolutions, and it is intended to combine them in a single memorial and present them to him with an appropriate testimonial. Dr. Tyng will, it is understood, soon set out on an extended tour in Europe.

An Earnest Temperance Campaign is Being prosecuted in the Southern States by Miss Frances E. Willard, under the auspices of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union. She has found efficient aid in Mrs. George Hulse McLeod, of Baltimore. It is proposed to organize auxiliaries in the leading cities, preparatory to more thorough efforts next year. Richmond, Va.; Wilmington and Raleigh, N. C.; Charleston, Columbia, Spartanburg, and Aiken, S. C.; Savannah and Atlanta, Ga.; Mobile, New Orleans, Memphis, Knoxville, and Louisville, are on the list of engagements made or projected. The heartiest interest is manifested by all classes of Southern people.

The Citizens of Chicago Propose to Commemorate the decennial of the great fire of October, 1871, by raising a large sum of money to erect a building for a public library and purposes of art. The library, which already numbers 75,000 volumes, and whose treasures are constantly increasing, is at present accommodated in the third and fourth stories of a common business block. As subscriptions are to be received in sums as small as five cents, it is hoped that the popular contribution will reach half a million dollars, to which it is thought a few wealthy men may be induced to add as much more.

Indiscriminate Almsgiving Has Been a Prolific source of evil, encouraging the most undeserving and impudent, and overlooking the really needy and modest class of our poor. An effort to remedy this evil has been made by the Bowery Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York, which has done very effective work in giving needed relief to destitute men. From a circular recently issued it appears that 274,123 free meals have already been given by this Association. Free lodgings have been provided for 46,596 homeless men, and situations found for unemployed men to the number of 3916. The committee say in their circular: "We are prepared to issue certificates of Sustaining Membership for our relief work at the rate of $10 annually for each; we furnish holders of certificates orders ready for use; these orders can be given to any applicant, and will be honored in every case when the person is a worthy object of charity. Any sober man who is destitute, unemployed, or homeless, may be sent with one of the orders to us." Thus any applicant to private persons for relief may be furnished with a ticket, and investigation into the circumstances will be made, and if deserving relief promptly afforded.

The Strange Spectacle of a Church Floating down a river was seen during the prevalence of the floods in Dakota. It was made of strong timbers securely fastened, and as it floated majestically down the Missouri the bell in its steeple could be heard above the roar of the flood and the crashing of the ice. Many heroic rescues are reported. In one case a Mrs. Moreton and her son, who were on the high ground when the ice-gorge broke and released the swollen torrent, saw the house in which they lived swept away bodily with the crops and cattle around it. Mr. Moreton and his daughter were in the house at the time, and were in imminent danger. Mrs. Moreton offered a thousand dollars to any one who would rescue her husband and daughter. Two men named Van Allen volunteered to make the attempt, but refused any reward. They followed the house in a boat, and when it lodged on an obstruction they climbed on the roof and cut a hole through. The two inmates were drawn through, more dead than alive, and were conveyed in the boat to a place of safety. Some of the houses from Yankton and Vermillion floated seven miles on the stream.

A Novel and Original Scheme for the Suppression of intemperance is under consideration in Indiana, according to a report in the New York Herald. It is proposed to enact a bill requiring that any man desiring to habitually use intoxicating liquors as a beverage shall take out a yearly license, price ten dollars, the money to go to the support of inebriate asylums, and the license to be cancelled the first time its holder is found intoxicated.

A Restitution of the Proceeds of a Murder has resulted from the blessing of God on Mr. Moody's preaching. A report from Baltimore, dated April 30th, says that a man named M. P. Whalen had arrived there in search of Rev. J. P. Wilson, who is now stationed in Calvert Co., Md., to whom he wished to hand over five hundred dollars and interest, the proceeds of a murder committed eight years ago. It appears that on January 3d, 1873, an old lady was murdered in Baltimore, and her murderers were detected and executed, but one of them before he was arrested gave his brother five hundred dollars, his share of the plunder, without telling him how he had obtained it. The brother retained the money for eight years, but now has resolved to restore it, with accrued interest, to the husband of the murdered woman. He states that, having been brought under Mr. Moody's teachings, and having heard his strong sermons on restitution, his conscience troubled him, and he resolved to give up the money. He sought out Mr. Wilson, so that the restitution might be made through the medium of the clergyman who was the murderer's confessor.

A Lady has Deliberately Starved Herself to death in Iowa City, Iowa. Her name was Hattie Buell, and she was fifty-two years old when she died. She has been an invalid for many years, suffering ceaseless pain from neuralgia and nervous diseases, which made life a constant torture, and at length she made the stern resolve to end an existence which promised no alleviation for her torments. Though her conduct has long been peculiar, her acquaintances never deemed her insane. On February 23d she announced her intention of starving herself to death. All her family, friends, and her pastor, Rev. Mr. Folsom, of the Presbyterian Church, used all their powers of persuasion in vain to induce the lady to change her resolve. She was inflexible. A proposition to use force in introducing food into her stomach was, after full consideration, abandoned, from the belief that if that course should be taken, it would only drive her into some other method of self-destruction. She drank water freely, in the hope that it would prevent her becoming delirious. She died April 11th, having eaten nothing for forty-seven days. It is supposed that she imagined suicide of that passive character was less guilty in the sight of God than violent self-destruction; but it seems probable that her mind had become affected by long continued pain, and that her sense of personal responsibility must have been impaired.

Nine Members of the Police Force of Brooklyn were discharged last week because burglars had broken into a jewelry store in the precinct they were employed to watch, and had carried off their booty unnoticed. In dismissing these men the commissioner takes pains to mention that all of them had good records, and to explain the principle on which he has acted in their case, and purposes to act in all future cases. This is, that policemen are employed to protect the lives and property of citizens, and when they don't do it they should be turned out, just as any other employés are discharged when they fail to properly do the work for which they are hired and paid by their employers. There is a certain logical propriety in the course taken by the commissioner which commends itself to thinking men; but Christians may well reflect on their own position as servants of God in the same light. If the servant who neglects his duty should be dismissed, what long-suffering and patience does God display toward some of His servants in continuing to bless them while they are negligent in the duties of their holy calling.

A Captain, Converted at the Brooklyn Tabernacle two weeks ago during the revival services conducted by Dr. Talmage, aided by Mr. Philip Phillips, has commenced energetic Christian work, thus evidencing the genuine character of the spiritual change he has undergone. At a public meeting in New York he said that having found the Lord Jesus Christ as a Saviour had made him very happy, still he felt that there was something wanting until he went to others and told them of the wonderful change which grace had effected in and for him. He began by telling some one in the office where he was engaged, and the friend to whom he spoke expressed the desire to hear further from him, being convinced that a religion which had produced such a change in any one must be genuine. Then he found himself compelled to talk to all the captains and mates of the vessels with whom he was acquainted, of the wonderful Saviour he had found. He hoped to have the joy of leading some of them to Christ.

A Dishonest Trade Practice was Relinquished by a commercial firm in New York recently under noteworthy circumstances. The house was considered a very prosperous one, and employment in it was highly valued. A Christian young man obtained a situation there, and found to his dismay that he was expected to misrepresent the character of a certain class of goods. It was "the custom of the house," and when he stated to his fellow-clerks his determination to speak the truth even at the cost of his situation, they expostulated with him, representing that if he told an untruth by order of his employers, the sin was theirs, not his. But he remained firm, though sorely troubled at the prospect of losing employment. Feeling the power of temptation, he sent a request to some Christian people requesting their prayers that he might be strengthened. A few days afterward they received a second request, that thanks might be offered. A member of the firm, observing the young man's general good conduct, and learning of his scruples in the one matter of conscience, had conversed with him on the subject, and had been so impressed with his view of the matter that a general order had been issued to all the employés forbidding misrepresentation in future.

The Rev. George E. Jayne, Pastor at Provo City, Utah, renews his request to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to send him packages of the back numbers for free distribution among the ignorant and misguided people by whom he is surrounded. He writes: "The copies of the paper already sent me are doing a vast amount of good, and I would like to have many sent right along. I can use to good advantage thousands of them."

THE BARRIER.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Delivered on Sunday Morning, March 27, 1881.

"And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life."—REV. 21 : 27.

The Tabernacle Becoming a City—Latent Elements of Destruction—The Description of the City—Emblematic of Perfection—Security—Holiness—Incites a Longing to Enter—I. THE text refers to the glorified Church of our Lord Jesus Christ. That perfected company of the elect and sanctified is set forth in this wonderful chapter under the image of a city descending "from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband." Her work-day dress all laid aside, the bride appears in garments of needlework and raiment of wrought gold.

The militant Church, the Church of the present day, is comparable to a tent, and is well imaged by the tabernacle in the wilderness: it is lit up within by the glory of God's presence, and covered without by the fiery cloudy pillar of His eternal providence; but yet to the eyes of men it is mean and inconsiderable, for verily it doth not yet appear what it shall be. By-and-by this same Church, which to-day is likened unto a structure of curtains readily removed from place to place, shall become a city fixed, permanent, high-walled, and compact together, a "city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

The discomforts and trials of the desert life shall be exchanged for the quiet and comfort of a city dwelling. There shall be nothing of the wilderness about the Church triumphant; it shall be a right royal abode, the metropolis of the universe, the palace of the great King. Everything that is lustrous, pure, precious, majestic shall be there. Rare and priceless things which are now the peculiar treasure of kings shall be the common possession of all the sanctified. The Church shall be no longer despised, but shall sit as a queen among the nations, while at her feet they shall heap up all their glory and honor.

In that Church there shall remain nothing for which men shall reproach her, but everything shall be manifested in her for which they shall do her honor; her very streets to be trodden on shall be of pure gold like unto transparent glass, and her lowest course of stones shall be of jasper. Everything about the perfected Church shall be the best of the best: she shall be recognized as being the fairest among women, the bride, the Lamb's wife, the crown and flower of the universe. We read the sparkling figures of John's vision as emblems of moral and spiritual excellence, but we doubt not that, beyond the spiritual riches of the Church, all materialism will also be at her disposal, and the restored creation shall bring her choicest beauties to adorn the chosen bride of the Lamb.

We have said that

will be the crown of the new creation, and it is into the new heavens and the new earth that she is represented as coming down from God. He that sitteth upon the throne said, "Behold, I make all things new." The creation which is round about us at this hour waxeth old, and is ready to vanish away. Wise men tell us that there are evident preparations in the bowels of the earth for a burning up of the earth and of all the works of men that are upon it, for its centre is an ocean of fire. God shall but speak, and as once the waters leaped upon the world and utterly destroyed all things that were upon it, so shall He call to the waves of flame and they shall rise from their hidden furnaces to melt all things with their fervent heat. Nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

It is the glorified Church, I say, that is here spoken of, and hence the text may be said to refer to heaven, for at the present moment the nucleus of the glorified Church is in heaven, and from heaven every defiled thing must be shut out. Hence, too, it may refer to the kingdom of the millennial age, when the saints will reign with Christ upon the earth for a thousand years, when even upon this battle-field our conquering Leader shall be crowned with victory, and where His blood was shed His throne shall be set up, for among the sons of men shall He triumph, even among those that spat in His face.

The city is described as exhibiting great massiveness, for the length and the breadth and the height of it are equal. It is a solid square, perfect and compact:

"Thy walls are made of precious stones,
Thy bulwarks diamond square."

What a Church will the Church of God be in those happier days! Now she is as a rolling thing, removed as readily as a shepherd's tent; but then she shall stand firm as a cube which rests upon its base. We watch the Church of God sometimes with trepidation and alarm, for though we know that the gates of hell shall not prevail against her, yet her feebleness makes the timid tremble; but in her state after the resurrection there shall remain no signs of feebleness, for that which was sown in weakness shall be raised in power.

The perfection of the Church is set forth in her being four-square, her value in the sight of God by her walls being composed of the rarest gems, and her delights in the variety of the sparkling jewels which bedeck her, there being scarcely one precious stone omitted of those that were known to Orientals, while some are mentioned which are scarcely known to us at all. All manner of joys and treasures and pleasures and delights, every form and shade of excellence, virtue, and bliss shall belong to the perfected ones when their number and character shall be complete, and they shall be comparable to

THE CITY OF GOD.

The safety and quiet of the Church is set forth by her gates for ever open. In times of war the city gates are fast closed, but for the New Jerusalem there will remain no fear of foe, no need to set a watch against an invader. Gog and Magog will be slain and Armageddon's battle fought and finished, and unbroken rest shall be the portion of the glorified.

Best of all, remark how holy will the Church be. She shall have no temple within her walls, for this simple reason, that she shall be all temple; she shall have no spot reserved for sacred uses, because all shall be "holiness unto the Lord." The divine presence shall be in all and over all, and this shall be the joy of her joy, "The glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." Brethren, the glory of the Church even here below is the presence of God in her midst, but what will that presence be when it shineth forth in noonday brightness? when spirits strengthened for the vision shall endure with transport the full splendor of Jehovah's throne?

Write my name among the blessed who shall see Jehovah's face. O thou living God, my soul thirsteth after Thee. To dwell in Thy presence is the summit of the soul's delight; to be with Thee where Thou art, and to behold Thy glory, is the heaven of heaven. To what beyond this can thoughts aspire?

I. It being declared that the glorified Church is to be all this, and a great deal more, of which we cannot now speak particularly, we may well long to enter within her gates of pearl. But what saith the text? I beseech you listen attentively to the solemn sound of

THE WORD OF EXCLUSION.

"There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie." Listen, I say, to this word of exclusion, though it sounds like a death-knell in my ears. Learn that it can be abundantly justified to the conscience of all thoughtful men; learn that your own soul, if it be honest, must set its seal to the sentence of exclusion. This is no arbitrary decree, it is a solemn declaration to which all holy spirits give their willing assent and consent; an ordinance of which even the excluded themselves shall admit the justice.

For, first, it is not meet that so royal and divine a corporation as the glorified Church of God should be ruined by defilement. God forbid that "her light, which is like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal," should ever be dimmed by the breath of sin. Inasmuch as we could heartily wish that evil had never entered into the primeval world, we earnestly deprecate the idea that it should ever defile the new. Shall those new heavens ever look down with amazement upon the flight of a rebellious spirit, flying, beneath their serene azure, on an errand of destruction? Shall the jewelled walls of the thrice holy city be over-leaped by an enemy of the King who is there enthroned? Shall the serpent leave his horrid trail upon the heavenly Eden, twice made of the Lord? God forbid!

Brethren, there can be no entrance of evil into the kingdom of God, for it is the very essence of the bliss of the glorified Church that evil should be excluded. Imagine for a moment that the decree of our text were reversed or suspended, and that it were allowed that a few unregenerate men and women should enter into the glorified Church of God. Suppose, in addition, that those few should be of the gentler sort of sinners, not those who would profanely blaspheme the name of God, nor openly break the eternal Sabbath, but a few who are indifferent to God's glory, and cold and formal in His praise. How could heaven bear with these?

All heaven is up in arms at the supposition. Holy spirits are alarmed at the idea that they should be again tempted by the presence of evil. Fast bar the gates of pearl and never open them again, ye spirits, rather than that there should come upon that pure street of transparent gold a foot that will not walk in the ways of God's commandments, or the halls of Zion be disgraced by a single spirit that shall refuse to love the holy and exalted name. Heaven were not heaven if it were possible for evil of any sort to enter there. Therefore, stand firm, O dread decree, for it would be cruelty to saints and destruction to heaven that there should in anywise enter into it anything that defileth.

Furthermore, let me beg you to consider that there is of any defiled, sinful, unrenewed person ever entering into the body corporate of the glorified Church of God—an impossibility within the persons themselves. The element of glory would destroy rather than bless an unrenewed mind. It is as though you saw before you a blazing furnace, in which happy creatures disported themselves among the flames, bathing themselves in the white heat, leaping in rapture amid the rising sparks; for they are children of the flame, who drink in fire and find it life. Imagine yourself to be a poor fly, such as you hear buzzing on the window-pane; and you ask to enter into the glow of the furnace, thinking to be as merry as the fire-children. Keep back. Why tempt your doom? You will die soon enough; why ask to perish more quickly?

No place would be so dreadful to a sinner as the place where God is most openly manifest. That holy element, which is the habitat of the new-born soul, would be the grave, the everlasting prison-house, of an unholy soul could it enter there. To the wicked the day of the Lord is darkness and not light, and the glory of the Lord is terror, and not bliss. Oh, unconverted hearer, they sing in heaven; but in their songs your ear would find no delight. They worship God in heaven; but as divine worship is irksome to you, even if it be kept up for an hour or so below, what would it be to dwell for ever and ever in the world to come in the midst of hallelujahs? O soul defiled with sin, you are incapable of heaven.

The Roman Emperor Caligula, in his madness, made his horse first-consul of Rome; but his horse could not be a magistrate; it could not judge or govern, whatever the emperor might decree; though he fed it upon gilded oats from an ivory manger, it was a horse and nothing more. Even so, if a man be unregenerate, and unbelieving, we may do what we will with him, but he cannot rise to spiritual joys, and if we could even bid him come into heaven, still he would remain what he was, incapable of the joy and bliss which God hath prepared for them that love Him. So standeth it as a fact in the very essence and nature of things, that there shall in no wise enter into the realm of the spiritual, the kingdom of the true, the land of the blessed, the home of the perfected, anything that defileth. It cannot come there from inapacity within itself.

Let me add that our own hearts forbid that evil should so enter. As I mused on this text I supposed myself to be defiled with sin, yet standing outside the pearl gates of heaven. Then I said within myself, "If I might enter there defiled as I am, would I do so?" and my heart answered "No, I would not if I might. How could I blot such brightness and spoil such happiness?"

Suppose myself infected to-day with a deadly fever—an incurable typhus, which would bring death to all that touched me. The blast is pitiless, and the snow is falling, and I stand shivering at the door of one of your houses longing for shelter. I see inside the room your little children sporting in full health: shall I venture among them? I long to escape from the cold without, but if I should enter your room I should bring to you fever, and death to your innocent little ones and to yourselves, and thus turn your happiness into misery. I would turn away and brave the storm, and sooner die than bring such desolation into a friend's abode. And well might any honest spirit say at sight of the perfect family above, "Nay, if I might, I would not be admitted into the perfect heaven while yet I might defile it, and spread the fell contagion of moral evil."

You know, brethren, how a few rags from the East have sometimes carried a plague into a city, and if you were standing at the quay when the plague-laden ship arrived you would cry, "Burn those rags; do anything with them but do keep them away from the people. Bring not the pest into a vast city where it may slay its thousands!" So do we cry "Great God forbid it that anything that defileth should enter into Thy perfected Church! We cannot endure the thought thereof. Draw your swords, ye angels; stand in your serried ranks, ye seraphim, and smite every defiler one that would force a passage within the gates of pearl. It must be so: "There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth."

II. I desire, as I continue this meditation, in the power of the Holy Spirit, not so much to preach as to think inwardly, and ask you to think with me of that word of within my soul, within yours. It sits in judgment upon me, and it chastens me. It strikes home to my conscience, and rouses me to self-examination. Its voice is solemn, and strikes heavily upon the ear, as we remember its wide sweep and comprehensive breadth—"There shall in no wise enter into anything that defileth." No person who defiles, no fallen spirit, or sinful man can enter. And as no person, so no tendency, leaning, inclination, or will to sin can gain admission. No wish, no desire, no hunger toward that which is unclean shall ever be found in the perfect city of God. Not even a thought of evil can be conceived there, much less a sinful act performed. Nothing shall ever be done within those gates of pearl contrary to the perfect law, nor anything imagined in opposition to spotless holiness.

Consider such purity, and wonder at it; the term "anything that defileth" includes even a idea, a memory, a thought of evil. Thoughts that flit through the mind as birds through the air that never roost or build a nest—even such shall never glance across the skies of the new creation. It is altogether perfect! And, mark well, that no untruth can enter,—"neither whatsoever maketh a lie." Nothing can enter heaven which is not real; nothing erroneous, mistaken, conceited, hollow, professional, pretentious, unsubstantial, can be smuggled through the gates. Only truth can dwell with the God of truth. These are sweeping and searching words—no evil, nothing that works to evil; no falsehood, nothing that works to falsehood, can ever enter into the triumphant Church of God. O my soul, my soul, how bears this upon thee? Cuts it not to the very quick? For how art thou to enter, defiled as thou art, and so diseased with falsehood of one sort or another?

Well may we be aroused when we remember what defiled and defiling creatures we have been in the days of our unregeneracy. Brethren, let us not shrink from the humbling contemplation. Come down from your high places and see the horrible pit in which you lie by nature. Think of your past lives, I pray you, of those days in which we found pleasure in walking after the flesh. I call on you to remember the sins of your youth, and your former transgressions, of thought, word, and deed. If they are shut out who defile, and are defiled, where are you? where are you?

For these sins of ours, though they were committed years ago, are none the less sinful to day; they are as fresh to God as if we perpetrated them this very moment. Thou art still red-handed, O sinful man, though thy crime was worked some twenty years ago. Thou art black, O sinner, still, though it be fifty years ago that thy chief sin was committed; for time has no bleaching power upon a crimson sin. The guilt of an old offence is as fresh as though it were wrought but yester-morn. Our sins in themselves make us unclean and unfit for holy company, and, alas, they are many.

Our sins have left a second defilement on us, by creating the tendency to do the like again. Is there one among us that has sinned who does not know that he is all the more likely to sin again? Since after once being drawn aside by sin there are stronger draggings in the same way, sin once committed becomes a fountain of defilement. The stream in which the fish has sported will be sought by it again in its season, and the swallow will return to its old nest; even so will the mind return to its folly. Ay, so it is; and if everything that defileth is my God, my God, am not I shut out too?

Bethink you that not only does actual sin shut men out of heaven, but this text goes to the heart by reminding us that we have within us inbred sin which would defile us speedily, even if we were now clean of positive transgression. The fount from which actual sin comes is within every unrenewed bosom. How can you and I enter heaven while there is unholy anger in us? The best of men are too apt to retain an unhallowed quickness of temper, which under certain circumstances worketh wrath. There shall in no wise enter into heaven a hasty temper, or a quick imperious spirit, or a malicious mind; for these defile.

In certain persons there is no quickness of spirit, but there is a cold, chill obstinacy; so that having once resolved, though the resolve be evil, they stand to it doggedly and cannot be moved. Like obstinate mules, they can scarcely be driven; blows cannot stir them from their purpose. Disobedient obstinacy cannot enter the kingdom: my hearers, are you under its dominion? And, oh, there is in all of us a lusting after evil of some sort or other. Only place us in certain conditions, and the flesh longs after forbidden things, and though we chide ourselves and check the longing, yet is there not within us a relish for the sweet stolen morsels of transgression?

Ah, look within thy heart, my brother—look steadily beneath the fair film of the surface, and mark the inward evil which it conceals. Judge not thyself alone when at thy best, occupied with thy prayers and praises and almsgivings, but look steadily into thy soul at other times, and thou shalt see a loathsome mass of evil life, a seething corruption moving within thy heart; for evil remaineth even in the regenerate; and this cannot enter heaven. Thank God, it cannot. Even though the word of exclusion staggers me, and sends me back as with a stunning blow, and makes me cry, "Thou shuttest me out, my God, by this thy decree;" yet I feel that if it be so, the decree is right, and just, and good. "There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth." Amen.

Now, I ask you whether this word of exclusion does not, in you who know its meaning, slay all hope of self-salvation? For, first, here are our past sins, and they defile, and make us defiling. How are we to get rid of them? How can we wash out these polluting blots? Tears! So much salt water thrown away if looked upon as a bath for sin! Good works performed! They are already due to God. How shall future discharge of debts repay the past? O, my God, if I have ever known what sin means, I have also known that it is impossible that its defiling nature should ever be changed, or that the pollution should ever be removed by any efforts of my own.

I spoke with one the other day who said that she was seeking salvation by good works. I knew that she had performed self-denying acts of charity, and I asked her whether she felt nearer to the salvation at which she aimed. I knew that I spoke to a sincere, honest person, and her reply did not surprise me. She answered sadly, "The more I do, the more I feel I ought to do, and I am no nearer to the point I am aiming at." And so it is; the more a sincere heart doth seek to serve God, the more it feels the shortcomings of its service of Him; and the more a person seeks after purity by his own efforts, the further he judges himself to be from it. Our standard rises as we rise toward it; our conscience becomes tender in proportion as we obey it; and so, in the nature of things, rest of heart comes not in that manner.

But then look at the other part of the difficulty, that is, the making of your own heart pure and clean. How shall this be done? How shall the Ethiopian change his skin and the leopard his spots? Have you tried to master your temper? I hope you have. Have you managed it? Your tendencies this way or that, you have striven against them, I hope, but have you mastered them? I will tell you. You thought you had. You thought you had bound the enemy with strong ropes; you tied him and you fastened him down, and you shut him up in an inner chamber, and you said, "The Philistines be upon thee, Samson." You felt that the champion was vanquished now, but oh how grimly did he laugh at you as the old adversary arose within you, and snapped the bonds, and hurled you to the ground; defeated when you thought that you had won the victory. I cannot overcome myself, nor overcome my sin. I will never cease from the task, God helping me, but apart from the divine Spirit the task is as impossible as to make a world.

III. It seems to me that we may most fitly come to the close of our sermon by thinking of which just meets the difficulty raised by the sentence, "There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth." But, first, my past sin, what of that? There are many who are even now within the Church of God above, and we will ask concerning them, "Who are these arrayed in white robes, and whence came they?" We receive the reply, "These are they that have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." "In the blood of the Lamb!" I feel as if I could sing those words. What joy that there should be anything that can take all my stains away—all without exception, and make me whiter than snow.

But this truth, Christ instead of me, God Himself the offended one in the offender's place, bowing His august head to vengeance and laying His eternal majesty in the dishonor of a tomb; this is the fulness of consolation. O Lamb of God, my sacrifice, I shall enter heaven now! I shall pass the scrutiny of the infallible watchers. I shall not be afraid of the eyes of fire. I shall be without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing—"Washed in the blood of the Lamb!" This is our first great comfort, brethren—"He that believeth in Him is not condemned." He that believeth in Him is justified from all things from which he could not be justified by the law of Moses. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus."

But here is the point, there is still no entrance into the holy city so long as there are any evil tendencies within us. This is the work, this is the difficulty, and since these are to be overcome, how is the work to be done? Simple believing upon Christ brings you justification, but you want more than that; you need sanctification, the purgation of your nature, for have we not seen that until our nature itself is purged the enjoyment of heaven must be impossible? There can be no knowledge of God, no communion with God, no delight in God hereafter unless all sin is put away and our fallen nature is entirely changed.

CAN THIS BE DONE?

It can. Faith in Christ tells us of something else beside the blood. There is a Divine Person, let us bow our heads and worship Him—the Holy Ghost who proceedeth from the Father, and He it is who renews us in the spirit of our minds.

When we believe in Jesus the Spirit enters into the heart, creating within us a new life; that life struggles and contends against the old life, or rather the old death, and as it struggles it gathers strength and grows; it masters the evil, and puts its foot upon the neck of the tendency to sin. Do you feel this Spirit within you? You must be under its power or perish. If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of His.

I would not have you imagine that in death everything is to be accomplished for us mysteriously in the last solemn article; we are to look for a work of grace in life, a present work, moulding our character among men. There must be now a treading under foot of lust and pride, and every evil thing, or these evils will tread us under foot for ever in the future state where character never changes. There must be now a rejection of the lie, a casting out of the false, or we shall be cast out ourselves for ever. There must be now a cry, "O Lord, thou desirest truth in the inward parts: and in the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom. Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." Beloved, it is to this we must come, to be washed in the water which flowed with the blood from Jesus' side, for there must be a purging of nature as well as a removal of actual transgression, or else the inevitable decree, like a fiery sword, will keep the gate of paradise against us. "There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie."

O my hearers, suppose we should never enter there! Nay, start not, for the supposition will soon be a fact with many of you except you repent. Suppose we should be in the next world what some of us are now, defiled and untruthful—what remains? That is an awful text in the parable of the virgins—"And the door was shut." You read of those who said, "Lord, Lord, open to us," to whom he answered, "I know you not." You have read of them, will any one of us be among them? Will any one of us who has a lamp, and is thought to be a virgin soul, be among the shut out ones, on whose ear shall fall the words, "I know you not whence you are." You see you cannot be anywhere else but out unless you are in; and you must be shut out if you are defiled and defiling. Dear heart, this is a question I beg you to look to at once.

You do not know how short a time you have left to you in which you may look into it. Some who were here but a Sabbath-day or so ago are now gone from us. Eleven deaths reported at one church-meeting among our members! We are a dying people; we shall all be gone within a very short time. I charge you by the living God, and as you are dying men and women, see to it that you are not shut out, so as to hear the fatal cry, "Too late, too late, ye cannot enter now." There shall be no purgation in eternity, and no possible way of entering in among the perfected, for it is written, "There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth." No crying, "Lord! Lord!" no striving to enter in, no tears, no, not even the pangs of hell itself, shall ever purge the soul so as to make it fit to join with the holy Church above, should it pass into the future state uncleansed. Shut out! shut out! O God, may that never be true of any one among us, for Christ's dear name's sake. Amen.

RECENT ADVENTURES IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

The Order of the First March—Troubles with the Donkeys—Descent to the Mpozo Valley—An Unknown Country—Arrival at Manyanga.

The portraits of Mr. Adam McCall and two of his coadjutors in missionary work appeared in The Christian Herald of September 9th, 1880, with sketches of their lives. In the same number an account was given of their departure to their field of labor in Central Africa. We are now able to publish the following narrative of their adventures in "the dark continent."

After their arrival at the Central African seaport of Banana, they travelled by slow stages and with a quantity of material over 220 miles of the 300 miles which extend between Banana and their ultimate destination—Stanley Pool—in the interior, where they propose to build a mission station on the river Congo, which becomes navigable at that point. The following extracts from Mr. McCall's journal give some idea of the difficulties encountered in their travels.

August 7th. Very unwell myself. Clarke laid up: Lanceley ditto. Sent up twelve loads of goods to Paraballa to await our arrival there and to relieve the strain on us in starting. One of the donkeys found dead in the morning, strangled with his tethering rope round the small tree to which it was habitually fastened at night. It had wound and wound itself round the tree until it was strangled. It was dragged off to the river, towed into midstream, and cast adrift. This makes two donkeys dead—a sad loss. One died at Boma, quietly and mysteriously, from no apparent cause or malady. I opened the abscess in Clarke's hand with the trocar and canula, after which he obtained considerable relief.

Saturday, 14th. Before sunrise all was bustle and activity all over the camp. My tent was struck and put away, and a tremendous heap of general impedimenta cleared up; donkeys loaded; loud calls for string and rope on all sides. After a hasty cup of coffee I sounded my whistle and every man stood by his donkey, and all at last being quite ready, I stood at the exit from our camp, and called out the numbers from No. 1 to 20 consecutively, each man answering to his number and filing out past me in good order. Every donkey has his number corresponding to the number on his saddle, and each pair of saddle bags is numbered and labelled, A. and B. Every man carried a load on his head also; medicine chest, office box (filled with writing materials, maps, a few books, surgical case, spare drug box; our travelling pantry, containing little bags of tea, coffee, sugar, pepper, salt, etc., plates, knives and forks, cups and spoons), a demijohn of oil for our lamps (we carried no candles), etc. All passed muster in capital order, up to the rise and past our new building, and on to the plateau beyond, where we formed our permanent

"ORDER OF FIRST MARCH."

I led the van; then No. 1 donkey, led by our steward "Charlie;" then No. 2 donkey up to No. 5, the fine she-asses; then came the first headman, then No. 6 donkey up to No. 10; then Lanceley; then No. 11 donkey up to No. 20 in charge of second headman; then Clarke bringing up the rear; McKergow (who was accompanying us as far as Paraballa) walking beside me. The path now abruptly descended to the watercourse (whence we obtained our supply at Mataddi), and was exceedingly rough, rocky, and slippery. McKergow and I walked a head, selecting the easiest places and directing the boys where to walk with their donkeys. We got down to the bed of the stream without mishap, but came to woeful grief in getting across; the passage consists of a confused heap of huge boulders, very unsuitable for loaded donkeys to scramble through.

One donkey went down and got his legs jammed between the stones and defied the united strenuous efforts of McKergow, Charlie, and myself to extricate it. So we took off the load and saddle and then lifted her bodily up, after which she managed to clamber up the bare rock path and arrived safely. All the donkeys were hauled through with a great struggle, even with every load taken off and carried up to level ground by the boys. This, of course, entailed an immense amount of heavy work for all hands, and by the time it was finished and everything placed on the level above it was necessary to have breakfast cooked. So much for our first march. After breakfast donkeys were loaded again and we made a fresh start, as it was necessary to reach the Mpozo river by the evening.

We pushed on at a fair pace, and gained the top of the dividing ridge of hills, and when well on the level rested men and donkeys for ten minutes. Proceeding now along the shoulder of a considerable hill we commenced a very steep one, the path being thickly strewn with loose quartz blocks, and requiring great care in guiding the donkeys down. I pushed on ahead to select a camping place, and soon found a tolerably good one close to the river. As the donkeys came in one by one their loads were immediately taken off and arranged in order. As soon as the tent awning (a contrivance of my own, far more roomy than a tent, and less weight and trouble) arrived, it was unfastened, and throwing the suspending ropes over the branches of a couple of trees about thirty feet apart, it was stretched in a few minutes, the side ropes holding out the awning being tied to the long grass, a very simple and speedy arrangement. Then the hammocks (our own make) were pitched, the ground cleared a bit, firewood fetched, supper cooked, and all put in order for the night. The donkeys, after having been taken to water, were all tied up as usual. Clarke was very poorly, and "turned in" at once. We divided the night into three watches of three hours each, beginning at nine P.M. until six A.M., I taking the first one.

The latter half of August was occupied in the journey from Mataddi to Banza Montiko; two or three days having been spent near Paraballa on the way, in order to hire and despatch native carriers. A considerable quantity of goods had thus been conveyed about one hundred and sixty miles up the country from the port of debarkation, but not enough to warrant a bold advance farther into the interior. Another month had consequently to be spent, while more ample supplies were accumulated at Banza Montiko, then the advanced post of the mission. During a fortnight in September Mr. McCall was laid up with a severe attack of inflammation of the liver.

Mr. McCall and his party did not finally get away from Banza Montiko till the 4th of October. Their onward route now lay through an unknown and their difficulties with their carriers increased considerably, as the Kroo boys greatly disliked advancing farther into the interior. Partly on land, however, and partly by river, they managed to continue their progress until at the end of the month they reached Manyanga, a large place, situated on the north side of the Congo River, among the Babwendé people, who are an exceedingly well behaved and gentle race, according to Stanley. When he was in their country, a party of four hundred of them willingly conveyed his canoes and boat past one of the falls on the river. He considered the inhabitants of the neighborhood as the politest people he encountered in Africa, "possessing a nobility of character as rare as it was agreeable."

The market place of Manyanga is about five miles from the river, and it is a rallying place for the natives of Ngoyo, Kakongo, Ntombo Mataka, Ngombi, Ilemba, Kingoma, Kilanga, Kinzoré, Suki, Nguru, Mbelo, Zinga, Mowa, Nzabi, Ndunga, Mbu, Bakongo, and Bassessé. Here they exchange bananas, pine-apples, guavas, limes, onions, fish, cassava bread, groundnuts, palm-butter, earthenware pots, baskets, and nets, or cloth, wires, guns, powder, and crockery from the coast. From this place, three weeks after his arrival, Mr. McCall wrote on November 19th:

The thumb of my right hand is double its usual size, being swollen and quite stiff with, I believe, a sort of rheumatism. The Congo river is splendid here, about a mile and a quarter wide, perfectly straight for many miles, and lined on either bank with magnificent timber trees; no rocks or rapids, and though the current is strong, yet it can be crossed without danger. I have bought two canoes, which of course, we cannot do without, and got them cheaply; the large one, forty feet long, cost about 19*s.*, English value of cloth; the other, though smaller, about 20*s.* I have decided to build a station here. We must do so for many reasons.

When I arrived here alone the people were at first reluctant to allow me to stay. They were afraid my Kroo boys would steal from them and abuse them. I explained to them that I had come to do them good and not evil, and at last they let me settle and build my little temporary grass house. Then they were very good to me, bringing plenty of fowls, fish, eggs, etc., for sale. Truly our ever blessed Father in heaven has been good to us all along the way;

GOD IS PREPARING OUR ROAD BEFORE US.

The many prayers for us are being wonderfully answered. For myself I can say I draw my daily strength and inspiration to get on in the work directly from the Fountain head. I have lately had a sweet season of spiritual joy, and the Lord has been graciously pleased to manifest Himself to my willing soul as never before. I am able to cast my burden on Him who careth for me, and am happy. Nothing shall hinder me, so long as God spares me and gives me His Holy Spirit, from doing my utmost in His service.

I shall send you such a detailed report shortly as will show you what we have done and what it has cost us to do it. My whole trust for this and for all is in the Lord of hosts, the mighty One, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be praise, thanks, and glory for ever. My first and great object and desire is to spend and be spent in the service of Him who bore our sins on the cross, and who ever liveth to make intercession for us. What a Mediator, what a noble, kingly, loving, sympathising High priest He is! Blessed be His name. It is a joy, an honor, an unspeakable privilege, to be permitted to suffer in any way for Him, and I feel it to be so more and more. No earthly or personal consideration shall ever come between me and my devotion of myself to Him by God's grace.

SECRET DISCIPLESHIP.

"A disciple of Jesus, but secretly."—John 19:38.

3. You owe it [open confession] to Jesus. If you are a disciple—and such this appeal supposes you to be, as it is addressed to no others—you acknowledge that you owe all to Jesus, teaching, support, and salvation. He is your Lord and Saviour. He has bestowed the highest possible benefaction on you, even the hope of immortal glory. You believe that for this Jesus made the most stupendous sacrifice of love possible to man or God. He has laid you under the greatest possible obligations, obligations which, in your heart, you acknowledge. He has a right to demand of you all sacrifices that may be required for the discharge of your duty toward Him.

You have no other such friend, you never had, you never will have, you never can have. No good opinion of your fellow-men can weigh against His disapproval. In the scales of your thought and your feeling it should be as a feather to a world. The slightest expression of His wishes should control you in all things. He is the Captain of your salvation. His command should have power to march you single-handed up against an armed host. To disobey Him is to be a poltroon: to leave Him, is to be a deserter.

He is the lover of your souls. He left heaven to win you. In your heart you do love Him, if you be a disciple, even although secretly. What desires He expresses are the wishes of a lover—a wise, pure, devoted lover. He cannot ask you to do what would not be equally honorable to Him and to you. He has left some requests, so natural, and true, and sweet, that it seems inconceivable that any man shall love Him, and not gladly and tenderly obey them. The slightest wishes of a dear, dear friend, are solemn, tender laws to us. We do to-day what our mothers taught us to do in childhood; and, for the sake of those mothers, who have been in heaven a score of years, we go on doing what we first began to do because it pleased them. Jesus has

Whenever the Lord's Supper is celebrated in any church, there, on the table, lie the symbols of measureless love and sacrifice. They take us back to the day when Jesus was on the cross, and Joseph and Nicodemus were breaking the secrecy of their discipleship. Jesus consecrated this simple meal of bread and wine into something sacramental. He left you His wishes: "Do this; and do it in remembrance of me." And, sir, you have never done so.

Ah, madam, if your dearest friend had made the sacrifice of his life to save you from wrong and ruin, and, in going to die by the wild beasts of the forest, or by men more savage than they, he had tenderly asked you to hang his picture in your house, and say to those who came, "He was my Friend," would you not do it? Jesus died for you. You owe all for both worlds to Him. He asks that you do eat this bread and drink this wine, memorially, for His sake. And you do not.

While He was alive, Joseph and Nicodemus concealed their affection for Him, and Peter denied Him, and Judas betrayed Him; now that He is dead you slight Him, you set His dying requests at naught, and go through life as if the world and you had not a Jesus. How can you maintain your present position? How is it possible that you do not give up Jesus or abandon your secret discipleship? The time will come when you must do one or the other.

Your secret discipleship is selfish and ungrateful—hurtful to you, hurtful to others, hurtful to Jesus. "Selfish" and "ungrateful:" why, where can we find two words both applicable to the same deed or the same temper which combine more abhorrent elements? "Selfish and ungrateful!" what a character that describes! It is left to your calmest judgment to decide whether a man, who is attempting to be a disciple secretly, is not confirming himself in selfishness and ingratitude, and whether, if these be not overcome, they will not disprove all of discipleship that may now seem to exist in that man's character.

On this subject men are generally governed by their feelings. The two persons whose cases we are considering—Nicodemus and Joseph—were gentlemen and scholars in their time. They had good minds, good training, good position. They could not resist the conviction which the life of Jesus forced on their intellects. Nicodemus put the case concisely and clearly when he said to Jesus, "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God, for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." Here was a process of reasoning. Their judgments were convinced. The first feeling in the heart of a man of truth and generosity would naturally be to declare himself in favor of a man who brought such credentials for his mission.

Another feeling was produced by another set of facts. The authorities were against Jesus. It was wrong in them to take that ground; but they did it; and they had power; and they could expel Joseph and Nicodemus from the Senate of the nation, and afflict them with many social tortures. It was an emotion overmastering their reason which kept them so long in secret discipleship.

Men talk about religionists being carried away with their feelings. But men outside the Christian societies do much more frequently allow their feelings to control their judgments than Christians do. You know in your soul, that if you had followed your convictions instead of your feelings, you would have been a professed Christian long ago. Your pastor knows that for any one man who has taken the ground that he ought not to be an open Christian, five hundred have excused themselves by saying that they did not feel like it. Now you are urged to allow your reason to triumph over your feelings, being quite sure that, if you do, you will this day openly espouse the cause of our dear Lord.

"Joseph of Arimathea, being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews." All the disciples, John and Peter, and the others, were afraid of the Jews, by which is meant the rulers among the Jews. The common people were afraid of them, for they had decreed that if any one should confess that Jesus was the Messiah, he should be cast out of the synagogue. That had a meaning then and there which it is quite difficult for us to understand.

It does no man much harm among us to be put out of a congregation. He can join another. But with them every Jew was born into the church. The whole nation was a church. The Temple was the Capitol, the priests were rulers. Excommunication meant loss of everything which men value, and which make life tolerable to a man who feels as if he could not live in any other place than where he is. A public profession on the part of Joseph and Nicodemus would have devolved on them at once the greatest temporal disabilities and the heaviest ecclesiastical censures. They would have been considered as bad men, and excluded from the society of their equals. The apostles had forsaken all and followed Jesus. Joseph and Nicodemus could not do quite so much until they saw Jesus die.

It has happened in the process of the ages that the things which created the feeling that suppressed open professions among the Jews, no longer have any influence, but the feeling is created by other things. Take your own case, my dear friend. You are striving to be just as much a Christian as you can without the open profession. Why? Perhaps, first of all, you dread the committal of a public profession.

Is not that a mere sentiment that has no basis in reason? Ask yourself what that committal is. Is it to pledge you to forsake anything to which you should adhere? Is it to pledge you to any belief you do not now really hold, or to any course of conduct you are not now striving to follow, or which you admit you should follow? In your heart you have admitted that Jesus had the right to be your Master, and that you were bound to be His disciple. Without saying anything to any friend, you have been striving in secret to live up to that faith, and to keep His commandments. But your life is a failure because you are striving to accomplish an impossibility. He commands open discipleship. Whatever other of His commands you are striving to obey, disobedience to this is neutralizing all your obedience to those.

It is as if a plant were capable of thought, and feeling, and locomotion, and should choose to put itself up under the joists of a cellar floor, where there is no soil, nor moisture, nor light, nor heat, nor fresh air, and strive to produce there all the bloom of a perfect flower under favorable circumstances. An open discipleship commits you to nothing which you should not be and do, while it places you where you can have the advantage of all helps necessary to make you thorough.

Reflect upon what Joseph and Nicodemus had lost by not making public profession of discipleship early in the blessed Christ's ministry. Quite early we know Nicodemus had become convinced that Jesus was a Teacher come from God. He made that admission to Jesus. Suppose he had gone to the Sanhedrim next day and declared himself. He would probably have been called to endure the pains and penalties we have spoken of; but he would have lived in the comfort of knowing that he had done a most manly thing and he would have had three years of personal intercourse with Jesus, with all the spiritual culture therefrom, and after the death of his Lord he would have had no bitter upbraidings.

Moreover Joseph would probably have joined him; and who knows how many others? The whole face of things might have been changed and the nation have been made ready to receive Jesus as their spiritual Messiah and the doom of the Jews have been averted. God only knows where the end is of the effects of the failure of any man to do his whole duty. We can only speculate. But we do know that it is always damaging to refrain from doing what we know to be right because we do not feel like it.

Perhaps also you fear yourself. Once committed to Jesus you feel that you must follow Him through. You often say "Can I? Will my strength hold out? Shall I not fail and bring great disgrace on myself and on Jesus? If I may only struggle on in private a while, perhaps I shall grow stronger, and then I will make a public profession."

But no man ever found that a successful experiment. It is as if a man should say that he would lie in his bed until his strength came to him, and then he would arise and devote himself to his work vigorously. He never will grow strong in the bed. It is as if a man should say, I will stay in my house and learn to swim, and then I will plunge into the water. He never can learn to swim out of the water. No man learns to fight in a military school, nor learns the practice of the law in a college, nor business from books. One must enter the army, go to the bar, begin to trade. Your strength will come as you do your duty, and it is your duty to obey your Lord and openly confess your adhesion to His cause.

You dishonor your Lord by the secrecy of your discipleship. He has said, "My grace is sufficient for thee" (2 Cor. 12:9). If you do not go forward on your line of duty, you betray a distrust in His truth or His goodness. Do consider that. It is not distrust of yourselves. That is always a virtue, even in angels. It is distrust of Jesus, and that is criminal. He will never let any man be plucked out of His hands, if the man willingly put himself in these dear powerful hands and—stay there.

But, my brother, better secretly a disciple than

NOT A DISCIPLE AT ALL.

If you are a real disciple, something may occur to bring you out, as the death of Jesus did Joseph and Joseph's action did Nicodemus. O that this simple, earnest appeal may do that for you! Perhaps your faith has been weak and your love strong. The basis of love is faith; but perhaps your love may suddenly fling you into a position which shall so try your faith, and bring such responses to your faith as shall confirm you in open discipleship forever.

So it seems to have happened with Joseph. His love for Jesus grew so that when he saw Him dead, he longed to save His precious body from indignity, and so went boldly and craved it from Pilate. That numbered him with the disciples. The same sentiment in Nicodemus, stimulated into intense activity by all the prodigies of that Passover week which closed with the consummate terror and agony of Calvary, led him to acts that discovered his discipleship. Both these men are said to have been Christians ever afterward; for which God be thanked! Something of the kind may happen to you.

But, suppose it should not! Who knows how many a man had kept his discipleship covered until he smothered it to death? Who knows how many men once stood just where you do, just where Joseph and Nicodemus did before the crucifixion, but are now lost? You have had presented to you a hundred times just what moved these two members of the Sanhedrim to declare their relationship to Jesus; and you have not yet been moved. If you postpone it another day, may you not have so fastened upon yourself the habit of procrastination that you will never be able to perform this duty?

By all you are losing in your present course, by all the rewards of manliness and virtue which will come when you do your duty, by all you owe the noble army of martyrs in all ages, by all you owe your fellow-men who are sinners, by all your own interest in immortality, by all you owe the blessed Christ, be induced now, just as you are, to join yourself to the company of Jesus; this day, openly, freely, unreservedly, and forever.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives recently passed to a third reading the bill prohibiting the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors. The vote was 108 to 80, and it is understood that the Senate will pass the bill by a large majority. The bill provides that the measure shall be submitted to the people at the next annual election.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

The Close of the Inaugural Ceremony—King Hal's Reformation—A Rehearsal—Poor Wobbles—The Brewer's Drudge—Other New-Comers.

THE ceremony of opening the coffee-room being completed, games, such as draughts and chess, were handed about. No noisy, exciting, or rattling games had been introduced. When Lady Isabel noticed that some of the men could not play the newer games, she volunteered to make her appearance on the scene on Saturday, to give the needful instruction. This being accepted, a final cheerful hymn was sung, and the lady and gentlemen visitors took their leave, the men being at liberty to use the coffee-room until half-past ten every night.

On the Sunday afternoons and evenings there were to be meetings in a very pretty and warm wooden room at the back of the coffee-room, and entered through it by a side door. Two or three young tradesmen, under the manager's supervision, and with the vicar's and Lady Isabel's assistance, or Mr. Hamilton's, had offered to undertake the charge of these, as well as one or two prayer-meetings and a Bible reading in the week. All these and other notices had been given out before the customers departed for the night.

The little ship was now fairly launched, and all went home wishing it well, in more or less degree; though, of course, during the next and many following days, it was well canvassed, and discussed, and examined from many different points of view. On the whole, the opening had made a favorable impression.

King Hal very soon became quite fond, and therefore proud, of the coffee-room, and, of course, as this liking grew, it annulled the former tastes which had at times embittered his life. His poor wife now rejoiced to hear his step returning from work. Each Saturday all the shillings earned during the week were committed to her wise trust. The baby crowed and laughed when "father" came in. The little child that could talk baby words, and toddle about in all directions, would climb fearlessly and lovingly on his knee. And when Hal spoke of "going out," after he had made himself tidy and had his tea, his Rachel was no longer full of miserable anxiety as to "where he was going," but with her merry smile she would say, "I shall go there some day."

No fear of his coming home too late now! No fear of angry words, or sharp blows, or profane oaths, or unpunctuality at work—all this was changed. Job's prayer was answered—so far! Hal was within reach of many a good influence. He went frequently to the coffee-room, learned various games, studied the newspapers, discussed politics, conversed with the manager, and met his friends. One of the most real of these friends was the man who had helped him across the square on the night that he had loitered about the public-houses, and returned to his home the worse for liquor.

For some time after that he was very shy of meeting Job. But now they were being drawn together by the mutual attraction which is so often bred by strong friendship on one side. Hal of course little knew how Job prayed for him in his cottage alone with his wife, and little knew that his present happy sober state was recognized by Job as the joyful answer to his prayers.

But one day Hal suddenly became a prominent person among the coffee-room guests, and this was how it came about. A temperance meeting was being held in the large room—not the coffee-room—but the "meeting hall" as the men called it, at the back of the house. Songs were sung on this occasion, dialogues recited, and addresses given. Some of the recitations were highly comic, though in a pure and simple way, and others were pathetic to a degree.

There were advertisements of the temperance meetings, and offers of tickets for them put up occasionally. At first the rehearsals were purposely small that the recitations might be well practised, and the part songs rightly arranged for the different voices. Albert Eldridge undertook the responsibility of these gatherings, and generally brought one or two of his friends with him.

On this particular evening fifty of the regular coffee-house frequenters had purchased sixpenny tickets for a social tea, each being given at the same time a free ticket, that he might invite some drinking fellow-workman to come with him, or at least some man who was as yet more or less a stranger to the charms of the coffee-house. Thus a tea for a hundred men had been spread on clean white tables garnished with flowers and evergreens, lent for the occasion from Lionel Court, and supplemented by the willing offerings of a friendly nurseryman.

Hal was there, and Curly, and several others that we know. Each had brought an acquaintance. Hal's protégé was a man who had often treated him to spirits or beer when they had been working on a job together. Latterly this poor fellow, from holding a position of trust, had lowered himself to common laborer's work, and that when he could get it. So, as Harry remarked in confidence to Job, a week before, "He must get hungered pretty oft. Maybe he'd like a good tea; and there's no saying but he might drink down a reg'lar good dose of this 'ere temp'rance 'long with it. It wouldn't do him any harm, it wouldn't."

Poor old Wobbles had accepted the invitation, and he was there by Hal's side. They called him "Wobbles" because of his frequently unsteady gait, which was a sort of rolling shuffle, very disagreeable to other frequenters of the pavement. His grizzled locks and half-shaven countenance, red eyes and stooping figure, presented anything but a picturesque aspect.

Curly's friend presented an extraordinary contrast to himself. He was a huge, bloated, red-faced man; very short, very ungainly, but evidently a great prize to the friends who had caught him! He had fishy eyes that were always watering, and a sloping forehead over which, for a wonder to-night, his pale yellowish brown hair was plastered quite smoothly by the preliminary aid of his wife's dripping-dish. A crimson neck-handkerchief rolled round his neck, and terminated in a great knot, helped by contrast to lessen his brilliant rubicund color.

This man's usual designation in the town was "Bob Banting." This distinction had been attained for him in the following manner:—When quaffing beer one day outside a public house, he turned his unwieldy form somewhat unexpectedly as a boy was coming round the corner. The result was that the whole of Bob's ponderous weight, communicated through the heel of his boot, descended upon the unlucky boy's foot. The sufferer being far too proud to utter anything like an expression of pain, beyond the sudden exclamation of "There, now: what are you after?" took his revenge the next moment by the shrill remark, "Look here, Guv'nor: you'd better try Banting, you had."

From that time the joke had stuck to poor Bob; not that he minded it, for, to tell the truth, he minded almost nothing but his beer. He stuck to his work, and did it wet and fine, but his luxury, his happiness, his regalement, his very inner life, was now composed of beer. He thought of it, he longed for it, he very nearly lived upon it. Mind and soul were sunk in the beer vat. Not an amiable existence, was it? But he knew no better.

Now, would you like to know how this state of things had come about? Ah: there it is! What was his work? He was a brewer's drayman. He had lived amid beer for the last twelve or fourteen years, and here was the result. He had carted it, emptied his barrels into the public-house cellar, been treated at each public-house door, smelled it, drank it, bought it, treated others to it, until now, mind and body, he literally lived in an atmosphere of beer.

Loathsome: you say, disgusting? That is exactly what the brewer's wife would have said, if you had pointed him out to her. Putting her lace handkerchief to her nose, she would have turned away from you, quite revolted. Shake hands with him! Why, she would not have touched him with the tongs! Visit his house! Why, she would as soon have entered the den of a boa-constrictor; and she would have told you so with a faint scream at the idea; while her husband, if he had known that you had hinted at such a subject to her, would have shown you the door before you had known where you were.

And no wonder. In that man was a bit of his own workmanship, and he knew it. He paid that man and kept him; yes: and hundreds more like him. I don't mean that Mr. Hodges Parkerson paid him with his own hands every week. Oh, no: do not mistake me. He had at least five officials standing rank and file between himself and the drudge employees. Therefore he was far removed from any obloquy or stain upon his own hands.

Bob Banting looked very sheepish, and very uncomfortable when first he sat down "spliced in" (as he would have said) between two sober men. Everything clean, everything bright, everything cheerful round him; no bad words, no rough talk, no obscene songs; was it any wonder that at first he felt out of his element? The real wonder was that he so soon began to feel at home among these strangely new surroundings. He began to forget himself—that was the fact! amid the charm of novelty. The bowl of sparkling gold fish swimming about in the crystal element first attracted his attention, and he said to the man opposite him—

"Looks cool: don't 'em?"

Then the gay flowers, the shining china, the piles of fresh white bread and butter, the tempting plum-cake and buns, and last, not least, the merry tunes of a large musical box that stood in the middle of the table—all gave him a conscious sense of pleasure and real enjoyment.

Presently his arm was touched, and the man on the other side of him said—

"See they texes: ain't they oncommon pretty?"

"They're that," said Bob, "oncommin'!"

Blessing was asked in loving, simple words, and then the ladies and various helpers carried round the tea, and tried to make their guests acquainted with the bountiful spread of provisions.

"It's awful jolly," said Bob.

"I told yer so," answered Wobbles, who had a partiality for being considered the wisest on every occasion. He liked it to be thought that he had the inherent gift of prophecy, though no one but himself accused him of it.

There was a funny little man sitting not very far from them, who went by the name of Quicksnap. He had a weak voice, and looked a figure of fun certainly, but this was not altogether natural to him. He had acquired it very much by his frequentals of the public-house, where he was called upon night after night to act the buffoon. Unfortunately, in addition to his absurdities, he had a very quick temper, beating hollow in his sudden passions even our friend, Jemmy Hard.

Job's friend had, perhaps, the most painfully interesting history of them all; at least it was the newest, and therefore to those present the most touching. His real name was Ferdinand Marshall. Of course this was twisted into every possible disguise, so as to be quite unrecognizable. But, poor man, as he sat there with that look of deep sorrow stamped on his brow, you could easily have seen that he had passed through some dark waters. He was at one time a respectable, decent, hard-working young man.

The perpetual temptations of drink, thrust at all hours in the day before him had at length proved too much—more than he could stand indeed—and little by little, very slowly, he had succumbed. The cottage he called his home became poorer and poorer, the wife lost heart as she lost the where withal to purchase comforts, and then began to have stint of bread. Clothes she had long ceased to expect. "Ferdy had become so altered"—she would not have breathed this to any one but her God. But many a time her cries of anguish went up in secret for him, herself, and the pretty child her darling, that "clung to mother so," and whose shield she tried to be from all the sad nightly scenes that darkened that single room, and from the pangs of hunger by day. As the man drank, the cravings increased.

"A little failing:" do you call it? It was worse han that; a sinful lunacy, contracted by iniquitus habits taught him by those who ought to have elivered him from them. He became more and ore mad with passion when he saw his wretched ome at night. He would take the poker and fell o the ground the gentle wife, who never retaliated.

One night when he came home after the retched pottering he now called work, she lay till, unheeding him. Swearing an oath, he gave kick to the bed, and went out to his resort, The Spread Eagle." It was close by, "nice nd handy" he had been accustomed to say. The ublican's welcome was hearty. His wife smiled er blandest.

"All right at home?" she simpered.

A volley of oaths was the reply, and loud comlaints that "no one never looked arter" him; he hadn't no supper, nor nothin'," and was "that ungry." This melancholy confession just suited ie tactics of the publican's wife, so she said—

"Well, I never: just what you might expect. he's one o' your prayin' saints. Goes about iat long-faced. I know her. And lettin' 'er oor 'usband starve. Never you mind, Mr. Marnall; you're a right good customer, you are · and ou shall 'ave summat."

LOST AND FOUND.

. S. Lesson for May 1st. Luke 15: 1–10. Golden Text, ver. 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It is a striking feature in the ministry of our beoved Lord that His greatest tenderness was manisted to the most undeserving, and that He showed ie greatest delicacy of feeling to the most open nners. He fulfilled to the letter the prophecy rearding Him, "A bruised reed shall He not break, nd the smoking flax shall He not quench" (Isa. 2: 3). Just as in His healing of the sick He rought immediate deliverance, and then, when ney were in a condition to bear it, gave them exortation, so was it with those whom He saved om sin. To the impotent man whom He had ealed at the pool of Bethesda, He said, "Behold iou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse ning come unto thee;" to the woman taken in dultery, "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and n no more" (John 5: 14; 8: 11); but the healing nd the pardon preceded the exhortation.

Few understand how utterly impossible it is for inners to recognize their culpability until their eyes re opened by the Holy Ghost. A sinner may acnowledge theoretically that he is in the wrong, ut in his heart there is a strong current of self-jusfication and extenuation, because he is too blind o see things as they really are; his perverted idgment sees the faults of others against him in he most exaggerated light while he is blind to his wn, for it is only in the light of God that we can ee ourselves and others in due proportion. All ffort to make a man recognize what he has no ower to see, must necessarily be unavailing, all he exhortations to do what he has neither the ower nor the inclination to do, must, of course be a vain.

We must approach lost sinners from above, tanding on ground much higher than their wn. They look at everything from a personal oint of view; we must learn to avoid all which is ersonal in our dealings with them. If we speak o them about their sins the natural reply we meet vith, is, "I am not worse than others, I only seek to naintain my just rights, I do no harm to any one," nd under this profession all kinds of iniquity can ontinue to exist. But if we speak to them about . God who loved us in our unworthy and sinful tate, who is "kind to the unthankful and the vil," an element is introduced into the question o which they have hitherto been strangers. "Why hould God love me?" is the instantaneous reflecion, "I do not think about Him, why should He hink about me?" This breaks the heart down, nd opens the way of return to God.

The Lord Jesus had been relating the parable of the Gospel Feast with its precious invitation, 'Come, for all things are now ready," and "there went great multitudes with Him." He then went on to speak of the terms of true discipleship, that real sacrifice of all which we hold as our own, real cross-bearing, real denying of self, is needful, else we cannot be His disciples. He added words concerning those, who having the call to be the salt of the earth, have yet lost their savor. This brought about a division among His hearers. Those who seemed to be the farthest away from Him, the openly irreligious, "publicans and sinners," were attracted, they knew the truth of all he said, the free invitation to "the poor, the maimed, the halt, the blind," had touched their own case; they saw that none were excluded on account of their unworthiness; this was a gospel suited to them, and if the terms on which they might follow Jesus were such as to cut them completely off from all their past life, what matter? they had nothing real to lose, but their sin and their shame, and they had everything to gain by the exchange. The Pharisees and scribes, however, whose outward piety had won for them the reputation which they envied from man, found, to their amazement, that the Lord made no account of it. In order to follow Him, they must lose all this hard-earned reputation for holiness with all else that they had, and their own life also; and they who thought themselves too holy to need chastening must learn to bear their cross if they would be Jesus' disciples. This teaching did not commend itself to them, and seeking for some ground on which to condemn Jesus, they "murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them." Eighteen centuries and a half have transpired since these words were spoken, but they are as true now as then, for the Lord says, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear My voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me" (Rev. 3: 20).

To seek a sinner that he might be saved was as far from the idea of the Pharisees and scribes as could well be; just indignation was their policy, sinners had committed sin, were guilty, and deserved to perish. And it was these condemned ones, shut out from all other hope, whom Jesus came to seek and to save. There is an intense tenderness in God's sorrow over His lost ones, "My people have been lost sheep; their shepherds have caused them to go astray, they have turned them away on the mountains: they have gone from mountain to hill, they have forgotten their resting place" (Jer. 50: 6). Instead of the wholesale condemnation which, perhaps, the Pharisees would have poured upon them, the Lord says, "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick: but I will destroy the fat and the strong" (Eze. 34: 16).

In perfect harmony with these quotations from the Old Testament are these parables which follow in our subject. The Lord pictures a man who has a hundred sheep and loses one of them, how he leaves the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and goes after that which is lost until He find it. The ninety and nine are together, they can receive mutual help and comfort, but the lost one is alone, without help and in danger. It went wilfully astray, you say. The shepherd knows that, but His loving eye is on its present condition, not on the circumstances or faults which led to it. His thought is how to find, how to restore. Any one can blame a wanderer, but who will have the love and patience to lead him back? It is a heartless thing to condemn a sin-bound sinner and to leave him in his sins; the Saviour came to deliver, not to condemn.

But in order to do this, He must go out into the wilderness like the scapegoat on the day of atonement: "And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness: and the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited: and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness" (Lev. 16: 21, 22). "All we like sheep have gone astray," and the guilt of our straying cannot be ignored, it must lie somewhere. Where is it, then? On Him who went out into the wilderness seeking the lost, for "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53: 6).

But Jesus has not only found mankind by bearing their sins as a whole, He goes out into the wilderness after lost, perishing sinners; all God's providential dealings with every unconverted man and woman are calculated to lead them to the Saviour. But O, how often is the story of Chorazin and Bethsaida repeated, "We have piped unto you and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented" (Matt. 11: 17), and the Lord has been obliged to sit down and weep as He did over Jerusalem and say, "How often would I have gathered . . . but ye would not," "ye will not come unto Me that ye might have life" (Matt. 23: 37; John 5: 40). He will not give up His seeking until He find you; will you take upon yourself the responsibility of running away from Him?

"And when He hath found it" then is the time of joy, His regained treasure is too precious to be given into the charge of another, He putteth it upon His shoulders rejoicing. Reader, are you then upon the shoulders of the mighty One? And the Shepherd calls on His friends, they who do whatsoever He commands them (John 15: 14), they who follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth (Rev. 14: 4) saying, "Rejoice with Me, for I have found My sheep which was lost." "I say unto you," the Lord continues, "that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance." God rejoices in the exercise of His love towards those who have most wounded Him, and He calls us to participate in His joy, not to delight ourselves in the society of those whose communion with us is pleasant, but rather to joy in bringing the uncongenial, the far off, to the feet of Jesus.

Another parable followed, and here it is no shepherd, but a woman, who is the prime actor. She had ten pieces of silver and has lost one, what shall she do? Is it worth finding? She lights a candle, sweeps the house, and seeks diligently until she find it. The piece of silver has an image and superscription upon it which entitle it to take its place among the current coin of the realm, it should be in circulation, and aid in increasing the wealth of the kingdom. But it is among the rubbish, lost and useless. And the church of Christ has many such among her members, the name and the image of God are upon them, but they are in a false position, so hidden among the rubbish of this world that they are not forthcoming to any real use. What is to be done? The church, i.e. those who recognize their relationship to the Master as members of His body, and His flesh, and His bones, must seek them out, separate them from among the rubbish and get them into circulation. This is a work which needs much prayer, much patience, much love, it is as necessary as the seeking and finding of the lost, and rejoices as much the heart of our great Master. O, how blessed it would be, if they who condemn feeble Christians, and speculate whether their conversion was or was not a real one, would go to them in the name of Jesus and in His Spirit, and in close dependence upon God win them from their self and their inconsistencies to their true place of crucifixion with Christ; then there would be more joy in the Master's heart, and more joy among His people.

The woman seeks diligently, does not hastily give up the search, and she continues until she finds it, then and then only she calls her friends and her neighbors and says, "Rejoice with me, for I have found the piece which I had lost." And the Lord adds, "Likewise I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." The inhabitants of heaven take an intense interest in that which transpires on earth. Angels rejoiced when Jesus was born, and angels announced His birth; angels ministered to Him in the desert, and again in the garden of Gethsemane. Angels were present at His resurrection, and the return of every lost sheep and the awakening of every sleeping Christian to a life of service, causes joy among the angels of God.

Opposition to the Government Scheme for the relief of Irish tenants is expected to proceed from the landowners rather than from the Land League. Two Land League leaders, O'Kelly and Dillon, have denounced the measure as insufficient, but Mr. Parnell has promised to support it. Though far from satisfying the demands of the League, Mr. Parnell and his friends, with Mr. Shaw and the Home Rulers, regard the bill as a substantial instalment of reform, and will vote for the second reading of the bill. They will endeavor to extend its provisions before the third reading, when it will be discussed clause by clause in committee. The bill is considered safe in the House of Commons, but will meet with fierce opposition in the Upper House, where it will be opposed by the Conservatives and by a section of the Liberal party, who with the Duke of Argyll regard the bill as a proposal inimical to the rights of property and a dangerous innovation. The most serious practical objection to the bill seems to be that it will encourage much litigation. The law journals anticipate that much of the effects of both landlord and tenant will pass to the lawyers.

The Difficulty Between Turkey and Greece has assumed a more pacific aspect. Notwithstanding the popular demand in Greece for a war with Turkey, and the enthusiasm of the army, eager to be led against the Turks, the Government has taken the first step toward peace by giving a qualified assent to the European proposals. The Greek Government does not conceal its dissatisfaction with the settlement proposed, nor regard it as a final solution of the question, but is apparently willing to accept it as the best bargain possible now. In reply to the recommendations of the ambassadors, the Government asks information on the following points: "Whether the occupation of the new territory will be speedily and peacefully effected; whether Europe will propose a new frontier, as Greece regards the present proposal insufficient, and what arrangement will be proposed for the Greeks excluded by the present proposition from union with Greece."

The Powers are displeased with the tone of the Greek reply to their note, and while accepting its substance have asked explanations regarding its form. Premier Coumoundouros said that, in view of the excited state of the public mind and the dangers the throne might incur, he could not modify the form. The Powers, notwithstanding this, have decided to consider the Greek acceptance as an accomplished fact, and have begun negotiations at Constantinople for the transfer of the ceded territory.

Reports from South Africa Indicate that the peace arranged between Great Britain and the Boers may lead to a further conflict. An impression prevails among the natives that the British made peace through fear, and that the power of England is not so formidable as was supposed. The colonists at Cape Town are apprehensive that the loss of prestige will therefore have a dangerous effect, and that their safety is by no means assured. The British Premier is satisfied that the Government have acted rightly in the matter. In a letter written a few days ago to a Liberal candidate for Member of Parliament, Mr. Gladstone says: "The Government will not adopt any apologetic tone in the coming debate on the Transvaal question." It was, he considers, a question of saving England from sheer blood-guiltiness.

All the Nihilists Condemned to Death for participation in the plot to assassinate the late Czar were executed on Friday, April 15th, with the exception of the woman Helfmann, who was granted a short reprieve. Repeated efforts were made to save Sophie Pieoffsky, the young woman whose aristocratic connections separated her from the ordinary rank of conspirators. The Czar was immovable, and as it is understood that a large proportion of the Nihilists belong to the higher ranks of the people, he may have believed that mercy to one of their own class would have been misinterpreted. That the life of Alexander III. is in imminent peril may be inferred from the fact that he recently found under his pillow a notification that he had been condemned to death by the Nihilists. It is clear that in some way the conspirators have access to the palace, and it is probable that some of them are in the service of the Czar. The execution of the condemned prisoners was performed very clumsily. The executioner was a pardoned convict, and he was so incapable that one of the men was hanged three times before life was extinct. The rope broke twice, and had to be readjusted. One hundred thousand people assembled to witness the executions, and maintained a stolid silence throughout the solemn proceedings.

Repeated Shocks of Earthquake were Felt at Chios during the past week, and many of the buildings left standing by the former shocks were thrown down. The correspondent of the London Times writes: "At least nine tenths of the houses in the island must be rebuilt or repaired. The population are now camping out, and there is great need of food and shelter. The work of clearing away the ruins has begun, but in the villages the people are still panic-stricken. Little can be done as long as the shocks continue. About fifty thousand people are camped in the southern half of the island, with nothing but what they have on their backs." The first estimate of the number of lives lost, it is hoped, was exaggerated; some of the people supposed to have been killed are found to have escaped to the mainland. Careful inquiries have convinced the correspondent that the number of those actually killed, not including those seriously injured, is about four thousand.

A Cable Dispatch Announces the Death of Rev. W. Morley Punshon, LL.D., the distinguished Methodist preacher, whose sermons have been published occasionally in The Christian Herald. Dr. Punshon had recently taken a tour in Europe for the benefit of his health, but being seized at Genoa with alarming symptoms, he hastened back to London, where he died, April 14th, from disease of the heart and inflammation of the lungs. Dr. Punshon was well known in this country, he having, while residing in Canada, in 1869, visited the United States as the representative of the British and Canadian Methodist Churches to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He also lectured and preached in several of the large cities during his visit, and was well received. A portrait of Dr. Punshon, with a sketch of his life, will appear in the next number of The Christian Herald.

Flogging in the British Army is virtually abolished. A bill for the abolition of the lash was read a second time in the House of Commons on March 28th, and it is very improbable that any serious opposition to its adoption will be made in the House of Lords. The punishments substituted include the putting of an offender in irons, attaching him to a wagon or horse on the line of march, or requiring him to bear extra burdens. The result of this is that he will not be unduly humiliated in his own estimation, or that of his comrades, while it is formally declared that he must not suffer such injury as will cause any permanent mark. Flogging has long been abolished in other European armies. It is hoped that the change may result in the influx into the army of a better class of men—a result much to be desired.

Two Deaths Resulted from a False Accusation in Scotland recently. On March 25th, the body of Mr. Menzies, who occupied a responsible position in the central office of the Caledonian Railway at Dundee, was found floating in the Tay, near the bridge. His death forms the sequel of a distressing story. Some weeks ago the wife of a sea-captain, a neighbor of Mr. and Mrs. Menzies, left for an English port to join her husband, leaving the key of the house in charge of Mrs. Menzies. On her return she alleged that a sum of money was missing, and charged Mrs. Menzies with being cognizant of its abstraction. The latter was just recovering from a serious illness, and in her delicate state, the imputation on her honesty so preyed on her mind that she became ill, and died March 22d. Mr. Menzies also took the charge much to heart, and, leaving his house on March 28th, he is supposed to have drowned himself in the Tay, his body being found as above stated. A large family of children are left orphans by the double event.

The fatal result of undertaking the charge of the house will, it may be feared, deter people from performing acts of kindness of a similar character. These deaths may probably be traced to mental distress with which physical debility had some connection. When the Christian is assailed with false charges brought by unscrupulous persons he ought to look to his God for vindication, who has promised it in His own time (Psa. 37 : 5, 6).

"A Back-bone Religion" was Lately Found and accepted by the driver and fireman of a Carlisle express train, who entered an evangelistic meeting in Glasgow. The phrase "Sudden death would be sudden glory to me," which was used by one of the preachers, caused one of the engineers to turn to his companion and say, "That is the sort of religion for us, Jack." The result was that they came out to the penitent form, and before leaving, gave their hearts to God, and they then found, to use their own words, that they had a religion which had a backbone in it.

A Verdict of Fifteen Thousand Dollars Damages has been the result of a recent suit for libel in England, in which both plaintiff and defendant were clergymen. Accusations of immorality were brought by a Rev. Mr. Barnwell against an aged minister named Chamberlaine. Mr. Barnwell, it appeared, had merely repeated tales he had been told by laymen. During the trial the charges were investigated and proved to have been false in every particular, and the clerical scandal-monger was mulcted in the above exemplary damages as a penalty for his credulity. It may be hoped that the result will make people more cautious in circulating reports affecting the character of ministers. In England and in this country Satan finds one of his most effective weapons in slanderous reports of ministers. People greedily accept without investigation statements throwing discredit on preachers, and Satan in this way contrives to check their influence for good.

Lady Lush, the Wife of a Judge of the British Supreme Court died recently. Her deathbed was characterized by the joyfulness of a Christian about to enter the glorious presence of the Lord. Dr. Landels, in his memorial sermon on March 20th, said: "Amidst all her bodily sufferings her inward peace never failed. The Lord was with her all through, never withdrew from her for a moment the light of His countenance. 'The Lord is with you, dear,' whispered the voice of affection. 'Yes, He is never absent,' was the calm, glad response. And again, 'Is it peace, dear?' to which she replied, 'Peace does not express it, it is joy.'"

The death of Dr. Punshon removes from this world one of the most eloquent of modern preachers. He was well known on both sides the Atlantic, and Christians of all denominations and in every quarter of the globe experience in his departure a sense of personal bereavement. Many who never listened to his voice have read his sermons with deep interest, and have wondered at the wealth and beauty of language with which he clothed the grand old truths he preached. He was a born orator and had he chosen to enter the profession of the law or of politics, his brilliant talents would have raised him to a position of wealth and honor. But his genius was consecrated to the service of God, and not a few in this country and in England, as well as many who have left the Church on earth to join the Church in Heaven, have reason to bless God that Dr. Punshon did so consecrate his life.

It is a faithless spirit that speaks of any death as premature. God watches over His Church and over the world. Not a sparrow falls to the ground contrary to His will, and we may be satisfied that when a useful minister dies in the midst of his usefulness and while we were hoping that he would have been spared to labor many years longer in the world's harvest field, that all is well, for God did it. Otherwise we might lament a death like that of Dr. Punshon as untimely, for he was only fifty-seven years of age, and his powers showed no symptoms of decline; but the great Master of the Church knows what is best, and while we mourn our loss we do so in faith in His wisdom and love.

Many of our readers probably listened to Dr. Punshon when, after his removal to this side the Atlantic in 1868, he lectured and preached in our principal cities. Others who did not hear him may have read his sermons published from time to time in these columns, and all will be interested in learning such details of his life and labors as can be obtained.

HIS SCHOOL DAYS

under judicious care, appear to hav[illegible] mirable preparation for the larger [illegible]en an adriper years. At this time, and while afte[illegible]tion of the Doncaster Grammar School, he was [illegible]ds at chubby lad, with fresh, curly hair, a full prop[illegible]ff, of the love of sport, and, above all, a most exc[illegible] ordinary memory. He would commit to memory for the mere pleasure of the effort, long passages from 'The Speaker,' and recite them to his schoolfellows; and it is said that he could repeat the names of all the British constituencies, with the names of all the Members of Parliament representing them, without a mistake.

In his fifteenth year he entered the business establishment of his grandfather, a timber merchant, at Hull, and spent some time as a clerk both there and at Sunderland. When about twenty years of age he went to reside beneath the roof of another uncle—a man of some mark both as a missionary and a Cingalese scholar, in his day—the Rev. Benjamin Clough, who at that time was living at Woolwich. There was not a minister in the town more highly respected than Mr. Clough; and when the excitement in those years was rising almost to fever-heat in consequence of connectional heartburnings and disputes, his influence and example as an able scholar, earnest preacher, and Christian gentleman were of the best and most healing character.

Whether his nephew, upon his conversion, had formed the purpose of devoting his life to the work of the Christian ministry, we are not informed; but there is no doubt that within twelve months afterwards this purpose had become distinct and clear. After a brief course of college training, he passed the necessary examination, was and completed the regular period of probation in arduous circuit work, chiefly in the North of England. It would have been pleasant to have heard some of those early sermons of his. His later efforts thousands in Great Britain, America, and Canada are acquainted with, and we all know the marks they exhibit of the most painstaking care as well as of brilliant oratorical power. But from the wilds of Cumberland to the Corn Exchange, Oxford, where he delivered the fervent address which excited so much attention, the leap could not have been sudden.

To have seen and heard the youth, Morley Punshon, when there could be no mistaking his Yorkshire proclivities and pronunciation, to have seen and heard him when he was preparing for the eminence which afterwards fairly belonged to him both as preacher and public orator, would have enabled one to trace the growth, if not of the poet's, at least of the preacher's mind.

To many in London, after seven years' ministry in Whitehaven, Carlisle, and Newcastle, he seemed suddenly to spring, fully armed, into that was well-nigh dazzling. He could not be announced to preach or to lecture without chapels and halls being filled to overflowing. It would be difficult to say whether his preaching or lecturing exited the deeper interest. He had but to be announced to preach or speak, and every inch of sitting or standing room became valuable.

One of his earliest efforts in the British metropolis was his sermon in the old tabernacle, Tottenham-Court Road, on behalf of the London Missionary Society. The large building was usually well filled on these anniversaries, but on this occasion it really could not make room for the crowd desirous of getting any kind of place. Several years have passed since that memorable evening, but those who were present see once more the chapel as it then appeared with the front galleries packed with ministers from all parts of the kingdom, with the pulpit stairs thronged with listeners, conspicuous among whom was the eminent editor and preacher Dr. John Campbell, busily taking notes to be used afterwards in the graphically descriptive manner peculiar to himself.

His more recent sermon on behalf of the same Society at Surrey Chapel was equally eloquent and inspiring, but the world had become accustomed to his power and was not surprised, while the former sermon on "Largeness of Heart" was a revelation to all and held its ground in the memory against all his subsequent sermons and lectures, though they may have been greater and more successful.

His lectures at Exeter Hall, London, before the Young Men's Christian Association, some of which were delivered while he was in Sheffield and in [illegible]eeds (in each of which he spent the customary [illegible]ne years), were among the most attractive that [illegible]Thiseen given before the members of that society. [illegible]brilliano slight praise, when we remember the [illegible]years hatray of able men who in the course of [illegible]tian Associone the London Young Men's Christ[illegible]they selected,n good service by the topics which [illegible]them. [illegible]d by their masterly treatment of

His first lecture [illegible]was upon "The Prophet of Horeb," and three [illegible]rs afterwards this was followed by one upon which some are disposed to [illegible]gard as his greatest oration. As the first was de[illegible]vered twenty years ago, many of our readers will be [illegible]leased to read an extract from it:

"Rare times they were, the time[illegible] of that stirring and romantic era. How much was crowded into the sixty years of Bunyan's eventful life! There were embraced in it the turbulent reign of the first Charles—the Star-Chamber, and the High Commission, names of hate and shuddering—Laud with his Papistry, and Stafford with his scheme of Thorough, the long intestine war, Edgehill and Naseby and Marston, memories of sorrowful renown, a discrowned monarch, a royal title, and a royal execution. He saw all that was venerable and all that was novel changing places; like the scene-shifting of a drama; bluff cavaliers in seclusion and in exile; douce burghers acting history and moulded into men.

"Then followed the Protectorate of the many-sided and wondrous Cromwell; brief years of grandeur and progress, during which an Englishman became a power and a name. Then came the Restoration, with its reaction of excesses—the absolution of courtiers and courtezans—the madness which seized upon the nation when vampires like Oates and Dangerfield were gorged with perjury and drunk with blood; the Act of Uniformity, framed in true succession to take effect on St. Bartholomew's day, by which 'at one fell swoop' were ejected two thousand ministers of Christ's holy Gospel.

"The Conventicle Act, two years later, which hounded the ejected ones from the copse and from the glen; the Great Plague, fitting sequel to enactments so foul, when the silenced clergy, gathering in pestilence immunity from law, made the Red Cross the sad badge of their second ordination, and taught the anxious, and cheered the timid, at the altars from which hirelings had fled. . . . What a rush of history compressed into a less period than threescore years and ten! These were, indeed, times for the development of character—times for the birth of men."

From 1858 we find Mr. Punshon for some years residing in London, first in Bayswater, and next at Islington. His popularity was well established, and he used it for the Master he served. It is well known that he was able to present the sum of 1000*l.* ($5000) towards a Wesleyan chapel in Spitalfields, both from the delivery and the sale of his lecture on "The Huguenots."

The help thus given to the London chapel was followed by efforts on behalf of erecting places of worship in other directions, and for five or six years his labors may have been said to have been almost incessant. His friends justly feared that a breakdown in health would inevitably result from this chapel-building work. He had, however, firmly resolved to raise a sum equivalent to fifty thousand dollars towards the erection of chapels in the chief watering-places on the coast of England, and though failure of health came at last, he would have been the first to fervently thank God that this did not happen until the work he had set himself to do was fairly done.

Any sketch of Dr. Punshon would be imperfect which contained no reference to his interest in MISSIONARY WORK.

It has seemed to many that his speeches on missionary platforms were as carefully prepared as any of his great sermons or lectures. None that heard it can forget the dream which he described about thirteen years ago in a speech delivered in Exeter Hall. He pictured the insidious spread of Popery as the stealthy rising of waters, until the devoted country was engulfed as in another deluge. After portraying the havoc made by the silent, black, deceitful, treacherous water, he said:

"I should like to know if there is any interpreter here who can read the moral of my dream? I have wondered whether it were possible that it had any reference to England. I have wondered whether there is anything in the midst of us at this moment like that stealthy, snake-like, rising, creeping water!

"I have wondered whether any of you know anything like it; whether there is a system in the midst of us, which for years has been clamoring, and which has always obtained what it clamored for, which has secured its own close houses from inspection, while it has wormed itself into yours; which has got into your work-houses, into your prisons, which has granted an indulgence for elve months to people who will only pray for —pray that you may be converted to what they sider to be the true faith, and which yet is a tem which has been a curse and a mildew to ry country where it has prevailed!

'Privileged once more to stand on this mission-platform, one of whose duties I humbly think o bear testimony to the truth, I have wondered ether it was not my duty to tell this dream to
; and, waking out of it as men do from ightly visions, with a sense of shuddering and ear, I have wondered whether I ought not to nmon you, though my words be of the feeblest, arouse yourselves as the heart of one man, and let your manifesto ring out upon the world.
ay with gags, and jails, and proscriptions, and alties.

'Our sufferings have taught us charity, and we not steal the sword of persecution from her to om it of right belongs; but to us has been com-ted a stewardship of truth and freedom, and we not be faithless to our trust. In sight of the ng tide and of the fatuous warders we will do duty, and, speaking with a voice too stern for ling, and too sad for passion, we announce our olve to-day. In the name of our martyred fore-ers, and in the name of the country that we
, and in the name of the sanctities that are itually violated and of the liberties which are in peril, and in the name of the slaves that are hralled, in the name of the souls that are deludand in the name of the Gospel of Jesus, which hindered, and in the holy name of God 'A red door to Popery, and no peace with Rome.'" n 1868 Dr. Punshon transferred his ministerial ors to Canada, being at the same time deputed the British Conference to visit fraternally the adian and United States Conferences. It need rcely be said his reception was as genial and usiastic as warm-hearted Americans and Cana-ns know how to give. While in Toronto he per-ted the publication of a volume of lectures and nons as a memorial volume, and these recall to y friends the voice of the speaker now that he ead.

Although not native to the Dominion of Canada, earned to identify himself loyally with its inter-
, and cherished to the end of his life an unwav-g attachment to its people and its fortunes.

The General Conference was held that year in cago and during its sessions a party convention the nomination of a Presidential candidate was ling its meetings in the same city. Many dele-s found time to listen to the famous preacher on returning to their respective States spread fame over all the land.

n 1874 Dr. Punshon filled the honorable post of sident of the Conference, and his subsequent tion in the Wesleyan Mission House in London that of Deputy Treasurer and Senior Secre-
. His health during the past five years was so robust as it once was, and he only preached asionally, and often delivered the same sermon ifferent Wesleyan chapels, his health and ardu-work at the Mission House apparently precluding any frequent preparation of new discourses.

r. Punshon was thrice married; in the first ince to Miss Vickers, of Gateshead, while he was ring in the Newcastle Circuit, whom he lost ut ten years afterwards, during his first sojourn ondon.

When in Canada, shortly after settling in onto, he married his first wife's sister, who years had with the utmost devotedness dis-ged all motherly duties towards his bereaved dren. The law of England still prohibits these riages, but in Canada they are valid. Strenuefforts have been made to legalize them in Eng-
, but hitherto without success. Session after ion, with patient persistency, a bill has been oduced into Parliament for the purpose, but nuous opposition, sometimes on the part of the ops, sometimes of laymen, have procured its ction.

r. Punshon conscientiously believed that such riages were lawful in God's sight, and that the ctions to them founded on a particular passage cripture, were the result of a mistaken sense of neaning. He therefore, moved by love for the lady who had given her life to the duty of filling a mother's place to his young children, offered her marriage. As the British law, with strange inconsistency, permits such marriages in Canada while forbidding them in England, Dr. Punshon removed to Canada and was there married to the lady of his choice.

Dr. Punshon's coadjutors in the Wesleyan ministry differed from him in opinion on the subject, and thought that he was evading the law by his act, and marked their disapprobation by striking his name off the roll of the "legal hundred," which act did not in the least disturb Dr. Punshon's equanimity, he being convinced of the purity of his motives and the righteousness of his conduct.

The union, hallowed as it was by ardent affection on both sides, and fraught as it was with happiness, was not of long duration. Mrs. Punshon died October, 1871, after only three years of wedded life. After Dr. Punshon resumed his position in the English Wesleyan ministry he married the daughter of the late William Foster, Esq., of Sheffield.

The intelligence of Dr. Punshon's death arrived by cable and merely announces that being in ill health he had started on a tour in Southern France and Italy. While on his journey he was seized at Genoa with alarming symptoms and returned with all speed to London, to consult his regular medical attendant. He died on April 14th, of heart disease complicated by inflammation of the lungs. He had never entirely recovered the shock he experienced a few months ago by the death of his son, a young man of much promise. Dr. Punshon's remains were buried in Norwood Cemetery on April 19th. There was an immense and sympathetic concourse of people present.

THE OBSTINATE CAPTAIN.

A STORY of a wreck near Penzance, of a most thrilling description, not long ago went the round of the press. During a strong south wind, the French brig Ponthieu went ashore near Penzance. The workers of the Marazion rocket apparatus succeeded in throwing a line over her, but the crew, being ignorant of how to work the apparatus, fastened the line on board instead of hauling it in. One of the crew, however, hauled himself ashore by the line.

The Penzance lifeboat was then got out; but, on her arrival alongside, the crew, although in imminent peril, took no notice, the captain apparently forbidding them to leave, or even throw a line to the lifeboat. Wind and sea rapidly increasing, and the vessel being full in the breakers, it was seen that it must soon break up. In vain the lifeboat's crew entreated; they were warned off, and had to leave; but, seeing the loss of life that must ensue, the lifeboat's coxswain determined to return, and this time was so far successful that five of the crew jumped off and were picked up.

The captain still remained obstinate, and at length a coastguardsman, named Gould, volunteered for the perilous duty of going out to the wreck along the rocket-line, taking with him a letter from the French Consul, urging the captain to leave. In the presence of hundreds of intensely excited spectators, Gould steadily made his way, being often under the water for several seconds, and imminently in danger of being washed off. The captain was watching him from the bridge, but, when under the bows, would lend no aid, and the furious sea breaking over him, Gould was washed away, and it was feared he must perish. Happily, however, he regained the rope, and more dead than alive, was washed and dragged ashore. Meanwhile the vessel was fast breaking up, the masts fell over the side, the stern, on which the captain was standing, was broken off, and it was supposed he had sunk, but presently he was seen among the wreckage, and mounted to the foreyard, the sail of which somewhat sheltered him.

The Coastguard fired two more rockets, and, one line falling close to the captain, he seized it, but even then seemed irresolute whether to save himself or perish with the ship. After a quarter of an hour, however, the love of life constrained him to fasten the rope around him, and he was dragged ashore. Within an hour nothing was to be seen of the vessel but a few floating spars. The cheers which greeted the captain's rescue were by no means so hearty as those which had welcomed the return of Gould, whose life had been risked in attempting to save him.

The obstinacy of the captain above named reminds us of the conduct of a captain who lost his life, some years ago, in the same locality, from sheer self-will and obstinacy. His vessel had reached the harbor, but a strong inset of the sea threatened to draw her out again. At so critical a juncture assistance was tendered. This, however, the captain refused; the consequence was that he and his men perished. A stone in the graveyard hard by records the fact. Blind and foolish as was the obstinacy thus displayed, it has its parallel in the conduct of all who follow the example of those Jews to whom our Saviour said, "Ye will not come to Me that ye might have life" (John 5 : 40).

MISSION WORK IN EGYPT.

Miss M. L. Whately, the daughter of the celebrated Archbishop Whately of Dublin, has been steadily carrying on among the Moslems and native Christians of Egypt, a most valuable mission for the last twenty years. Hers is the only work of this character carried on by a British subject in Cairo, Egypt. She began with a few little girls gathered into her own sitting-room; she has now schools with three hundred boys and about two hundred and twenty girls in regular attendance, half of the former and two thirds of the latter being Moslems, the others native Christians of churches who have been long left in deep ignorance. All these are daily instructed in the Scriptures and in the truths of the Gospel, and their answering is quite equal to that of well-taught Sunday scholars in England. In addition to this they receive an excellent general education. Arabic, of course, is the language of the school, but English and French are learned by the boys, and the pupils brought up in the school are known already as superior in intelligence and acquirements to others.

In addition to the schools there are services in Arabic on Sundays, conducted by the superintending lay missionary; meetings for men and women respectively; a book depot; a Bible woman actively at work; and a very extensive house-to-house visitation carried on in several hundred families, besides which—and most important, perhaps, of all—a medical mission has been established for more than two years, under a skilful and pious Syrian physician and surgeon, who has been trained in the medical college at Beyrout, and who in the time he has been here, comparatively short as it is, has relieved including many who have been saved from blindness by prompt care or cured by operations. All of these have heard something of Christian teaching, as the doctor has had opportunity in the course of his treatment, and there is cheering proof that the gratitude felt for the healing of bodily suffering (and the Egyptians are keenly alive in general to kindness) has made them more willing to listen to the Word of Life. Much more might be done had they proper room for those waiting for the doctor and those under his hands, but though Miss Whately gave up a valuable piece of ground to build on (no available room being found in the neighborhood, and the school premises unsafe on grounds of health), her want of funds obliged her to stop when the building was about a foot from the ground, and the poor patients are crowded into the doctor's own private apartments, at great inconvenience, or kept waiting outside, if the numbers exceed the powers of his room to hold them. Great efforts are being set on foot to raise the needed sum (about $1500), but the various pressures of the times render it a difficult matter.

Mr. George I. Seney, who Recently Gave $240,000 to found a Methodist hospital in Brooklyn, has sent $40,000 to Emory College, Oxford, Ga., an institution to which he had previously given $10,000. He has also given $50,000 to the Wesleyan Female College at Macon, Ga.

"MONEY ALL GONE."

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, delivered last Sunday Morning, April 24, 1881.

"He began to be in want."—Luke 15 : 14.

When I need to get a good warm-hearted text I am very apt to go to one of the parables of the Lord, and to none more frequently than to the parable of the Prodigal Son. There are enough texts in it for a man to preach about fifty years; then he must go into the eternal world feeling that he has only just opened the outside door of the subject. I will rehearse the story. You all know it—the story of the Prodigal Son. You need not go to the Bible to find the story. You find it every day. This subject is no novelty. I will simply say, however, that just as some years ago our young men went off to California to get their fortune, and as Englishmen used to go to Australia to get their fortune, so I suppose this young man of the text went off to get his fortune.

You know it takes a great deal longer to make money than it does to spend it. Although it is only a little while since this young man got one third of his father's property, it's all gone—every cent of it. So you have known men toiling for twenty, thirty, forty years in commercial or in mechanical life, having acquired large property, to lie down and die, leaving a great estate; and in five years the boys have got all through with it. So this young man of the text and his money were soon parted. I do not know just but there, in the first place, were his travelling expenses. A man who had been brought up as luxuriously as he evidently was, from the surroundings of that home, could not lodge just anywhere, nor be contented with plain fare. He had been used to see things on a large scale, and I do not suppose he closely calculated the expense. I do not suppose he always stopped to take change. I suppose that sometimes he bought things without any regard to their cost. Then, besides that, there came in the bill for his personal apparel; and a young man who had a third of his father's property in his pocket could not afford to go shabbily dressed; and so he must have clothes of the best pattern, and of the finest material. Besides that, the young man of the text had to meet the bill for social entertainment. He must treat, and it must be with the costliest wines and the rarest viands.

Besides that, the sharpers found out that this young man had plenty of money, and they volunteered their services. They will show him the sights. They can tell him things he never imagined, away off on that father's homestead. Well, they undertake to show this young man the sights, and after a while he wakes up one day and he says, "I think I will count my money." And he counted his money: it was half gone. But bad habits were thoroughly fastened upon him; he could not stop. After a while he counted his money again, and it was three fourths gone; but he was on the down grade, going swifter and swifter and swifter, until, when he comes to look for his money, it is all gone.

Now these associates who stuck to him as long as he had plenty of money are gone. Morning-glories bloom when the sun is coming up, not when the sun is going down. There is no money with which to meet his expenses. Besides that, the crops have failed, and there is a famine in the land; and at a time when affluent men are straitened about getting their daily bread, what is to become of this poor fellow with an empty pocket and a discouraged heart? "Oh," you say, "let him go to work." He cannot work. His hands, soft and tender, will be blistered with hard work. Perhaps he comes then to some place where he can get work, he thinks, adequate for an educated young man. He comes to a commercial establishment and asks for work. "No," says the head man of the business firm, "we can't have you. Why, you are nothing but a tramp of the street. Off of our premises." Perhaps he comes to the office of some official of the government, and seeks employment by which he can support himself. "No," says that officer, "a man clad as you are cannot find any employment in my office." What is he to do? In a strange land. Money all gone. No friends. Ragged. Wretched. Undone. My text with one stroke gives the awful picture. "He began to be

IN WANT."

Now, what does all that mean? It means you and me. Our race had a good starting; but we all went away from God and home, and we have found sin to be an expensive luxury. It despoiled us. It hungered us. It robbed us. It made us hopeless, and friendless, and godless. We had a fine spiritual fortune to start with, and we spent it, and we "begin to be in want." I care not how fine our worldly estate may be, or how much bank stock we may possess, or how elegant our social position, sin has paupered the whole race, and until we go back to God, our home, we are in an awful state of beggary and want. There is no exception to it.

In hospitals you will find that there are different wards for different styles of cases. In one ward those who are a little sick. Further on you will find those who are dangerously sick. In another ward those who are hopelessly sick. Now I have to tell you that in the hospital of the world there is only one ward, and in that ward they are sick unto death, and no human doctor can touch the cases, and unless some supernatural help come we must all die. We want healing. We want light. We want medicine. We want everything for the soul. It is no whim of mine, but a positive statement of the Bible, that we are by nature poor and wretched and miserable and blind and naked. Oh, that God this morning would help me to define

THE WANTS OF AN IMMORTAL SOUL.

"He began to be in want."

I. I have first to remark, my dear hearer, that if you are not a Christian, your first want is the Holy Ghost. Some of you have been familiar with these themes about which I am talking, long before I was born. Some of you have heard a thousand, fifteen hundred, two thousand, three thousand sermons. Some of you have spent whole years of glorious Sabbaths, and had innumerable opportunities of religious contemplation, and yet you tell me frankly you are not Christians. Why? Because the Holy Ghost has not led you to the cross. What does all this service amount to this morning unless the Divine Spirit touch your soul? A wasted hour. What is all this Bible, with its hopes and promises, to you, unless the Holy Spirit illumine the page? It is a sealed book. What are all the advantages you have had for the last fifteen years in a religious sense unless the Spirit of God drive the truth to the heart? So many arguments for your condemnation.

"Well," you say, "how can I get that Spirit. Am I responsible for not having it?" Yes. You must, my dear brother, pray for His coming, and He will come. Plead for Him. Beseech His coming. Cry out, "Give me the Holy Ghost!" Why is it that sometimes, when we come to the people with an elaborate discourse, and we have carefully analyzed the subject, and brought out the thoughts, as we think, in a harmonious way, and we think it is about as good a sermon as we know how to preach, it all amounts to nothing? It is because the Holy Spirit did not bless the truth that day. Why is it that, on some other occasion, when we come with only a few thoughts lying in our mind, hardly arranged at all, but with a burning desire for the salvation of the souls of men, and the sermon is a poor sermon, judged by the rules of human rhetoric, on that day the people come to God? Because the Lord sends His Spirit to bless that sermon. Oh, if this morning the Spirit of God would shine on your heart, you would wake up as from a long sleep; you would look around about you, and you would kneel down and cry for mercy.

I never shall forget a scene in my first settlement. We had a morning prayer-meeting in time of religious interest and there was a man who entered the door just before the close of the sermon. I said to myself, "I wish that man had stayed away; he has come to disturb this meeting." I had heard him express his contempt for religion and all religious things, and I was sure he was there to interrupt us. He came in and sat down, and before the benediction was pronounced he arose. People shuddered, for all knew him in the village. But, so far from disturbing our meeting, he said, "Oh, pray for my soul!" and that night he found his way into the kingdom of God and his wife and his children. The Spirit of God sought him out and brought him in, and by that time night came he was saved forever.

If the Holy Spirit should strike off your chains you would be free. If He should touch your eyes this moment, you would see not only your sin, but the grandeur of a Saviour's ransom. Oh, He is a mighty Spirit! People of God, if you will importune His coming, if you will with proper faith importune His coming, there would this morning be five hundred souls in all this audience, who are out for Christ, who would march in solid column into the kingdom, and the house would be full of the glory of the Lord, and there would be here such praying and weeping, and wailing, and singing as you never heard.

Oh, that the Spirit would descend now! I wait His coming! Aged men, who know the way to pray, who have long been praying, implore the descent of that Spirit. Men in mid-life, young men, men who would be saved now—ask for the coming of that Spirit.

"Come, Holy Spirit, heavenly dove,
With all thy quickening powers;
Come shed abroad a Saviour's love
In these cold hearts of ours."

Twenty-five years ago I had a man standing before me one day preaching the Gospel to my people. As I sat behind him, I thought to myself, "Oh, if I only had that man's physical health, how much good I could do!" Though I was well, he seemed to be more than well—athletic, strong, exuberant. That was the last sermon he ever preached. That week he was dead. I never shall forget that man's last sermon. I shall not forget his text. It was so appropriate for my people then; it is so appropriate for this people now. "Have ye received the Holy Ghost?"

II. I remark again, that your want is

PARDON.

That young man down in the wilderness, oh, how he thought of his father! He thought, "If I could only hear my father say, 'I forgive you,' I would be happy." It was pardon he wanted. That is what you need. What has been the greatest sin in all your life? One man would say one thing; another man would say another thing. I can tell you what has been the greatest sin of your life—the one that towers above all others, the ghastliest, the blackest crime that the soul can commit. It is not murder. It is not theft. It is not adultery. It is not blasphemy. But worse than all these combined. It is the sin of driving back the Son of God from your souls, and rejecting the Lord of glory, and trampling on the bleeding heart of infinite love; and that sin we have all committed.

To that chief sin you have added other sins. How many? In all your life, how many do you suppose? A thousand? "Oh, yes," you say. Fifty thousand? "Yes," you say, "in the course of my life." One hundred thousand? "Yes; well, let us stop there." One hundred thousand unforgiven transgressions! Sins against Sabbaths, against Bibles, against sermons. Sins against God. Sins against yourself. Sins against the cross. Sins against the ministering spirits who came to defend you. Sins against your own de l, your father's death-bed, your mother's death-

l. Sins against the judgment-day. Sins against glories of heaven and the grandeurs of eternity.
s inexcusable. Sins without number. All orgiven!

You know how rapidly the snow-flakes can acculate on a winter's day, and you know how soon y aggregate on top of the Alps; and then, in tain conditions of the weather, that great block snow which is made up of little snow-flakes ves off an avalanche on the villages beneath, troying them. So the sins of your life—cold, ezing transgressions—accumulating, accumulat-
, heaping up wrath against the day of wrath, ast, if unrepented of, will be an avalanche of dark-s for striking down upon your soul. They seem re like a cloud, black, thunder-charged, and flash h all the lightning of an incensed God, and they er and swoop about us until in the suffocation gasp for mercy, and hope that a gale from ven will blow away the cloud.

God is willing to lift that cloud. He says He is g-suffering and patient. He is the God of great
. He is willing to blot out your transgres-ns. He is willing to take you in the arms of compassion. Oh, here is the letter! It is a er from your Father, offended and outraged. It letter to you, the wandering child. He says, ome back, come back! Though your sins were scarlet, they shall be as snow; though they be like crimson, they shall be as wool." Pardon all! Free pardon! Everlasting pardon!

II. Again, my unconverted friends, you want

COMFORT.

f this young man of the text had only had some to come from his father's house and say to him, ow you can go back if you want to. They will glad to see you. Your estate will be restored, you will have a glorious greeting, if you will go," what a comfort it would have been to
. What he wanted, you want, and that is com-
. You have found the world to be a rough ld. You have been disappointed again and in. The grave has opened, and taken your nds, perhaps your very best friends. God only ws how many tears you have wept, how many s you have breathed, how many groans you e uttered.

here is in your soul an aching void the world not fill. Worldly amusement cannot silence it.
intoxicating cup only makes the matter worse.
mirth of your godless companions cannot sie this unrest. You go about seeking for peace happiness, and you find remorse and anguish.
you know the reason? It is because the flower are hunting for does not grow in earthly soil.
s because the gem you are digging for cannot ound in an earthly mine.

ut in Christ is your comfort. This is the peace passeth all understanding. This is the balm all wounds. This is liberty for all captives.
s is life for all who are dead. What consolait has given to many of these people who are re me to day! Jesus has been their comfort.
y have had enough trouble to kill them, but st has sustained them, Christ has soothed
n. He is competent to do it.

ne of the Scotch martyrs said, in his last mot, "I was turned out; I spent two nights in ields; I had no place to lay my head, no covg but the darkness; but, oh, what a sweet
I had all those nights! I looked up, and I the ocean of joy in which all Heaven swims swims!"

wish I could tell what a comfort this religion of s Christ has been to my soul; what comfort it been to the souls of many who are here. There ittle children here who have found the Saviour's passion. They have had more joy in their short f ten years than you have had in sixty years, use they went to the Saviour, and they have put hearts in His care, and all shall be well. They as well as a little child did who was dying on Sabbath. She had been in the Sabbath-school , and the story was read about the Shepherd, now He folds the lambs to His arms. And that she was taken away. After she had come f convulsions, and was about to die, her mother to her, "My dear, you're very tired, ain't you?" "No," said she, "I am not tired. I never shall be tired. They told me last Sunday that the Shepherd carries the lambs in His bosom, and I am one of His lambs. I can't be tired." Oh, the solace, the comfort, the peace of this glorious Gospel! Will you not receive it?

IV. Again, I remark that you want

STRENGTH AGAINST TEMPTATION.

What is the use of this young man's trying to resist temptation, down there in the wilderness? One pulling him this way and another that way. He could not resist it. The only way for him is to go home. Now I know your temptations. I simply say that it is impossible that in Brooklyn or New York a man can retain his integrity without the grace of God to help him. In the office, in the store, in the banking institution, where you are, there are people who do not believe in these things. They caricature religion. Some of them spend their evenings where they ought not. They want you to go along with them.

Oh, I have stood where I could look off and see a young man go down. I have had letters from fathers and mothers in the country, saying, "My son has come to the city. He attends your church. He is in such and such a store. I wish you would look after him." And we see the men of the world gather around that poor young fellow, and drag him away from God, and away from his father's prayers, and away from his mother's Christian counsel, and he lived only long enough to break their old hearts. A young man in town is not safe a moment without the grace of God.

And what is true of young men is true of you older people. I have seen men in mid-life try to reform. They signed the pledge, and they did a great many things that were well enough; but they did not seek God's help or strength. I saw a change right away in their home. The children were better dressed, and went to a better school. The wife, who had not sang for five years, began to sing again. The furniture was brushed up. The piano that had not been opened for years was retuned or traded off for a better one. Everything brightened up about that house. People said, "How well those people are getting on now! There is a great change." He has reformed."

Then a year passed along, and one night there was a burden carried along the street, and there was a loud ring at the door-bell, and the door opened, and the father, dead drunk, was thrown into the hall. And then the children came home from that school, and then their apparel, instead of being good, was very mean, and the wife stopped the song, and the piano was not opened. But after a while it was opened, for the sheriff's mallet came down on it: "Going—gone!" What is the history of that man? He tried to reform without appealing to the grace and help of God. That is all. And when a man strives to reform or quit any kind of sin, and goes out in his own strength, he is one against a thousand; he is one against a hundred thousand. In other words, all hell is against him.

But I have seen other men, with no more courage than the one I have spoken of, and not half the force of will, come right up to respectability and usefulness—marching right on until the gate of Heaven opened before their soul. Why? They said, "O Lord Jesus, thou seest my trouble. Thou knowest my thirst. Thou art acquainted with all my ungovernable appetites. I can't get away from them. O Jesus, help me by thy omnipotent grace! I will try to do better, but I can't do it alone. Help me! Help me!" The Lord God Almighty put his arm around that man and led him right out into the green pastures, and he shouted, "Victory! victory through the Lord Jesus Christ!" He never was confounded again—never will be. God Almighty is the strength of a man that puts trust in him. So I offer Him to you as a shelter against temptation; and there is not anybody in the house that has escaped temptation.

V. But I have one more important thought to present. Your great want is

A HOPE FOR HEAVEN.

We cannot always stay here. Some day you will be going along the street for the last time. A little after that your friends will be going along the street where you do business, and say, "Ah! the shutters are up. What's the matter?" And then they will go to the card on the door and read that you are gone. And your friends will be startled as they take up the newspaper and see your name in the list of those who yesterday went away from time into eternity, and you will be seen no more.

You will never be seen in the Brooklyn Tabernacle, or in any Christian assemblage on earth. The world may laugh and shout and thunder and applaud; you will not hear it. Spring will come with all its wealth of blossoms; you will not smell the aroma. Summer harvests will throw their crowns of gold at the feet of the husbandman; you will not lift your head from the dusty pillow to look at them. Frosts of winter will come, but they will not send any additional chill through your last encampment. There will not be a single person in all this audience living after a while. Some of us will sleep in the country churchyard; some of us in the more pretentious city cemetery; some of us down in the deep blue sea; but where will the soul be? what will our immortal nature be doing?

WHAT ARE YOUR PROSPECTS?

You need hope for heaven, and some of you have not got it. What have you been doing, my dear friends, all your life, that you have not got this hope? You could have had it for the asking. Have you not asked for it? It is a most astounding thing that in this land, with so many Gospel advantages and privileges, people will go out of this world without any hope of heaven. Friends standing around the room waiting for some little indication that all is well—waiting for just one encouraging word from the departing spirit. And then to have such a one, as I have seen him, turn over on the pillow with his face to the wall, and breathe feebler and feebler, and then just give one long sigh, and it is all over. Oh, no, it is not: I must take that back. It is not all over. It has only begun.

I make an appeal especially to the young. "Oh,' you say, "I can't attend to this. I can't break away from my associations. Why, my dear friend, it will be a greater struggle at last to die without any hope. Come! Come in bands! Come in flocks! If there is any one over whom you have especial influence, bring that one along with you. Before this night comes, before the benediction after this service is pronounced, give your heart to Jesus. He will take it now just as well as He will ten years from now. He would rather take it now. Commend your case to Him, and be saved before you go out of this building.

I appeal also to those who are in mid-life. You have lived long enough to know that this world is an insufficient portion. Begin to pray to-day. Establish your family altar, and gather your children around it. "Oh," says some one in the house, "I can't pray." Cannot pray? You can pray. You must pray. Before twenty-four hours go by, let your household, which has been a prayerless household, be a praying household, lest the Lord come upon thee in a way thou knowest not, for do you not know the announcement of God's Word, in which He says, "I will pour out my fury upon the families that call not on my name"? Oh, pray for yourselves, pray for your children.

I must have a word with the aged who are out of Christ. What father, mother, so long a prodigal? The sun is going rapidly down in the west and the chill of the last darkness is coming on; and let me tell you that there is not more than one in a thousand that ever goes as far as you have in life unpardoned and yet finds peace. God grant that you may be that one in a thousand. Oh, come, aged man, aged woman. Father! mother! I call you by the tenderest of names. Father, mother, come and take hold of the arm of Jesus in your declining years.

The Revival Services at Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle continue, without any abatement of interest. At least five hundred persons have already come forward, acknowledging that through these services God has brought them into His kingdom. Between three and four hundred souls will be added to the church at the Tabernacle at the next communion service, on Sunday, May 8th.

JAMES GRAHAM'S BUSH LIFE IN AUSTRALIA.

The Tasmanian Menagerie—The Laughing Jackass—Bushrangers' Atrocities—The Aborigines at Hobart Town—A Business Offer—Savings Lost—Crossing the Blue Mountains—Convicts Again—A Providential Escape.

On my own farm, and not more than a hundred yards from our hut, I first saw the Tasmanian wolf. I suppose it had by some means strayed from its haunts in the hills after prey. The two kangaroo-dogs found it, and after a severe struggle—for it is very fierce and powerful—they killed it. It was the size of a large mastiff, ne rly black, having bands of gray running parallel to each other from the back down the sides, like rib-marks. Its head is large and well armed with teeth. It is the most powerful carnivorous beast of these colonies. In its mountain haunts it is lion-king. The animal called the Tasmanian devil is a poor, black, bull-terrier-like fellow compared to him. I do not think he is called "devil" because of power; but because he is black, ugly, insidious, irreclaimable, and will devour his own little fiends.

The Tasmanian menagerie is very poor. I don't wonder the native blacks were a poor people, and had little time for improvement. They had no beasts of burden, for none but a monkey could ride a kangaroo. They had no creatures to give food or clothing, nothing better than a bandicoot or kangaroo to domesticate; and these, like the swine, can only serve by their death. What would England be without bread, cheese, beef, and horses? What would Arabs be without horses or camels? The black man could only be a hunter, and his wife, alas! is his beast of burden.

I have a word to say about the Tasmanian blacks, but first a word about Tasmanian birds. I delighted to see, hear, and shoot or pet them. The parrot tribe are most numerous, and much the same as in Australia. There are the white cockatoos, screeching, whirling, and fit for nothing while living but to enliven the scene—dead, they make good soup and eat like pullets. There are their colored brethren the black cockatoos, bold and joyous; for the white ones have no right to enslave them for the crime of color.

The species of the parrot tribe I noticed as most abundant in Tasmania were the lorry, king parrot, green leek, blue mountain, rosella, ground parrot, and parakeet. My favorite bird in that region was the laughing jackass. He is also called the settler's clock, from the loud, laughing, knavish, droll noises he makes at six o'clock in the morning and six in the evening. According to nature's usual economic rule, what he wants she has provided him with bountifully, and what he does not, she has denied. He wants a powerful bill—and therefore a large head—to pick insects from the bark of huge trees, and also to kill serpents. This latter beneficent work he does by pouncing on the snake asleep, and lifting it high in the air lets it drop till he stuns, kills, and eats it. Hence he is a favorite with blacks and whites.

There is a smaller species, about the size of the Irish thrush, that makes one of the finest cage-whistlers I have heard. The Derwent magpie is also a fellow of most truly musical pipe and great loquacity, but as thievish as magpies usually are. The largest fresh-water eels I ever saw, I used to kill in the Jordan; they weighed from one to six pounds. In the same stream I used to kill a most pleasant fish of a pound weight; it was so like a grilse or young salmon, I used to call it the little salmon. I have caught as many as one hundred of a night. There were no water-keepers there. Black swans were found in the island, but I did not shoot any.

During the time I was there, bushranging atrocities were very common; police and settlers could hardly keep the island from barbarism. There was a force called the Field Police, who were volunteer convicts that had served a certain time, and by additional service got a ticket-of-leave or emancipation. They were hated by all classes, for they had power without principle. Very few of them, I believe, but would have sworn a man's life away for a crown. It was very common, in those two years of which I write, for government to offer a pardon and a free passage to England to any convict who should capture an armed bushranger, living or dead. And it was no uncommon thing to see one come down the country in company with a policeman, having a man's head wrapped up in a piece of blanket, or in a pocket-handkerchief. Sometimes the policeman's testimony was the only means of identifying the head as having belonged to the body of a bushranger. Heads were worth money and freedom in those days; and many an innocent head was sworn guilty, for the sake of the price set on it.

While living on the Jordan I went to see the remnant of the aborigines in Hobart Town, after they had been entrapped by command of government. They had retaliated on the settlers, and speared both men and cattle not a few; and, I suppose, Colonel Arthur thought them as incorrigible and untamable as Tasmanian devils or wolves. A man called "Black Robinson" had their confidence, and persuaded them that he would lead them to spear the governor and the military, and take Hobart Town, and repossess the country, as well as take beef and mutton to revel in for years. With him they came toward Hobart Town. Along the way their warriors would set up a sheet of bark, and yell and throw spears at it, transfixing it as they expected to do the governor.

Robinson lauded their prowess, and decoy-birded them on to an ambush, where every man, woman, and child was captured, and under strong military escort brought into Hobart Town. When I saw them they looked as dejected as wild beasts worn out with struggles in the net. They appeared a much less noble specimen of savages than the tribes I subsequently saw in the other colonies. They were afterward shipped off to the Furneaux or Flinder's Islands, in Bass's Straits. I never afterward saw a native in Van Diemen's Land.

When I had resided in the island about two years, I received a newspaper advertising for me, and also a letter from my old shipmate and countryman, Jerrold Lock, asking me to go to a situation in the employment of himself and co-squatters. I resolved to go, forgetting the past as far as it was unpleasant. I took stock, and was worth £70 clear. When I reached Hobart Town, there I met an old shipmate in great distress. He was a Londoner. His wife was ill, and all his children had whooping-cough. He persuaded me to lend him £50. Soft as an oyster without its shell I let him take the pearl. Afterward when I sent a friend to ask him for the money, which he was to forward to Sydney in two months, he affirmed that he did not know such a person as myself existed.

By the little schooner Guernsey Lass, I reached Sydney in seven days. We sailed on March 14th, 1835. The weather was delightful. The sea rippled and flashed like fire at night, and numberless black and spermaceti whales spouted and sported round our little craft by day. The 140 miles of Bass's Straits are dotted with islands, that, I have no doubt, once constituted an isthmus. We dropped anchor in Sydney Cove, close by the Queen's Wharf. But every one knows Sydney, and I go on to bush life.

Led by the promises of his friend and shipmate to leave his situation in Van Diemen's Land for one on the Bathurst Plains, James Graham resolved to follow the tide of emigration across those Blue Mountains, which, until 1813, were the dreaded and unpenetrated barriers of New South Wales toward the west. In the middle of March, in the Australian autumn, he set out by early mail coach, and after a stage of fifteen miles reached Paramatta, where stands the governor's summer residence. Nineteen miles more brought him to Penrith.

At that time the metropolitan county of Cumberland was but very partially cleared, and deeds of bush-ranging villainy were often perpetrated where the traveller is now as secure as in the county of Middlesex, England—indeed, more secure than citizens were in London, during those nights and days of garotte-panic, which were experienced in the autumn of A.D. 1862. James was a good listener; and the driver regaled him with many narratives, that did not tend to raise his estimation of the security of travellers through the region then around and before him. As, however, he had little to lose but his life, and he did not suspect robbers would care much for that, he pursued his way devoid of fear and inspired with his unfailing constitutional hope.

After crossing Emu Plains and the punt-ferry of river Nepean, he, on the second day, commenced the ascent of the Blue Mountains by the road planned by the indomitable Sir Thomas Mitchell, and executed by convict labor. This great mountain-road to the interior ascends and winds for some sixty miles over these Blue Mountains; sometimes reaching as high as two thousand two hundred and fifty feet above the level of the sea, sometimes skirting fearful precipices, and sometimes, as at the Victoria Pass, giving the traveller to look down into terrific depths over a timber railing on one side. He traversed it by the mail conveyance, and preferred doing with only a few hours sleep for two successive nights, so as to reach his destination on the fourth day.

Many objects of interest met his eye in this journey. Some were painful, such as the wretched gangs of convicts working in irons at government work and under the terror of the lash. Alas! what miserable-looking castaways of the mother country were there! James's imagination conjured up mournful pictures of their past, present, and future. Miserable also were the shieling grog-shops and public houses he passed in these solitudes where he could hear the voice of mingled laughter and cursing; and where, no doubt, the bushranger often spent his blood-stained plunder, as well as the up country laborer his hard-earned wages. Right fully could he understand the missionary bishop's couplet,

"Every prospect pleases
And only man is vile."

Nature now opened up to James Graham a new and bold page of her wild magnificence, savage ruggedness interspersed with touches of softness and beauty. Sometimes, as in approaching the convict station of Blackheath, the road was as level as a plain; sometimes it dipped rapidly down; sometimes, as at Hassan's Walls, it passed under castellated crags 500 feet high. Never had he heard in such perfection, as he did here at break of day, the donkey bray and hyena laugh, and other mockeries of the laughing jackass, that embodiment of ornithic drollery, as strange in look as it is in note.

Here, for the first time, he saw and tasted the native cherry, or exocarpus, the stone of which—inversely to that of our cherry, and like the bone of the oyster—grows outside. He could not resist the temptation to leap down and pluck that coral-like spike of crimson bloom—the waretah, that can only be found in the mountains at certain heights—and grows on a stem from six to twelve feet high, adorned with oak-like leaves, and justly called "the queen of the bush." He could not help feeling impressed by the thought of the lavish kindness of Him "whose praise is in all the earth," and whose matchless works furnish a majestic theme for the mightiest song.

Yet withal the journey was monotonous and wearisome, and late on the last night nearly fatal. They had passed Solitary Creek by sun-down, and darkness set in ere they could reach the station beyond Mount Lambey, one of the highest peaks over which the road ascends. It became very dark, and, as their horses descended, the driver could hardly see to guide them at a most dangerous turn of the road. Suddenly one of their wheels broke down, and in the dark they could not put it right.

The driver went on to the station for torches and assistance, leaving Graham in charge of the horses.

With difficulty he found his way to it; and when he returned, the torch revealed the fact that he had been driving in a direction which, in a few yards, would have plunged them down into a ravine, where horses and men must have perished. The driver stood aghast; but on James Graham's mind there flashed like lightning the thought of that Almighty and very present Help, without whom a sparrow cannot fall to the earth. He only praised that merciful Providence which had saved them from being the prey of the eagles and dingos in that savage ravine.

Next day he reached Bathurst, that then rising brick town—"that city of the plains"—some hundred and twenty miles southwest of Sydney, on the Macquarie River, which afterwards became so famous for the Ophir and Turon diggings. It then had no church, but a small episcopal one, of which Rev. Mr. Lovewool was clergyman, while it had a long, low prison, and the public-houses were fronting each other at every corner, and out of all proportion to the town population. But, alas! they were only too well supported by the up-country laborers, who often madly rushed into them with their wages, which they melted down into "noblers" of neat rum. How strange it is that men should spend the fruit of their hard labor in securing indulgences—fascinating though baneful—which imperil their immortal souls! But the heart of man is depraved, and until higher pleasures are revealed to him by the illumination of the Holy Spirit, his very pleasure is only one mode of spiritual death, from the power of which Christ alone can save.

Poor James! he little thought the land-shark landlord of one of these houses should yet bite him, and that he should yet occupy a place in that low brick prison. He left his trunk and clothes in a small inn at Bathurst, the landlord of which, a great strong Englishman, appeared to take an extraordinary liking to the young, muscular, hearty Hibernian. He directed him to the cattle station of Messrs. Ash and Alder, about some forty miles from the town.

THE WIDOW AND SMALL-POX INFECTION.

A POOR woman stood in the dock of a London police court. She had been but a short time a widow; her husband had through drunkenness brought himself and his family to utter destitution; but his wife, herself a child of God, had long prayed for his conversion, and at last rejoiced in seeing her prayer answered. Through the instrumentality of a colporteur who visited the house, the poor sinner had been led to cry unto Him who came to "seek and to save that which is lost." His soul was restored, but his shattered health made him an easy prey to the small-pox which some months afterward visited the neighborhood, and to which he quickly succumbed.

A heavy burden then fell upon the poor wife; for, besides maintaining the family by her needlework, she had to nurse her husband in this his last illness, and provide as well as she could for the extra expenses which it entailed. Yet a quiet joy filled her heart, for was not her prayer answered, and her husband safe for eternity? And when at last he closed his eyes in death, she had not to "sorrow as others who have no hope."

But want stared the little family in the face, and even while the dead body of her husband lay in the house, the poor widow had to continue her needlework to procure bread for her children. The garment finished, she took it home and received the payment. Unhappily the wearer caught the infection and fell ill of small-pox. The sanitary inspector hearing of the case made inquiry, and the result was that the seamstress was summoned before the magistrate. This was why she now stood a prisoner in the dock.

The case was clearly proven. The woman made no denial, but pleaded that she did not know she was breaking the law, and being pressed with want had not thought of the danger in which she was placing her employer. This plea was useless, however; the law had been broken, and the penalty must be paid—all the more so because the woman's want of thought had brought suffering upon another.

The penalty was, for her, a heavy fine, with an alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment. The poor woman was in consternation when she heard the sentence, and with tears she pleaded, "Oh, have mercy, have mercy! I have not a penny to pay the fine, and if I am sent to prison what will become of my poor children?" The magistrate appeared much moved as he replied gravely but kindly, "My good woman, I am deeply, deeply grieved for you; but I am only here to administer the law, and the law knows no mercy."

In utter bewilderment she was led from the dock to the cell below, to await the arrival of the prison van. There she was left alone, and falling on her knees she poured out her soul to Him who makes the widow and the fatherless His peculiar care. She prayed for deliverance for the sake of her little ones; yet she could not conceive whence deliverance could come. She had no friends on earth to whom she could look for help; her husband's evil ways had brought her to the company of only the poorest of the poor; so she just cried unto the Lord and left her case with Him, though she hardly dared to hope for relief.

After a short time had elapsed she heard the key turn in the lock, and quite expected they had come to lead her to the prison van; but to her amazement she was told to go to the office and she would get a free pass. She could not believe that she heard aright, but the warder repeated the words, and added that the fine had been paid and she was now free. She then did as she was told, and having obtained a pass went out a free woman, her heart filled with joy, and praising God, though it seemed almost like a dream. She afterward learned that the sanitary inspector, touched with her sad case, and her pitiful entreaty, had himself paid the fine, and so set her free. Thus God fulfilled His promise, "While they are yet speaking I will hear."

In this incident we have a striking illustration of the position of the sinner before God as a transgressor of the law, and of salvation by free grace.

First. The woman did not know she was breaking the law, yet she was not therefore held guiltless; the law was broken and the penalty had to be paid. So if we break the law of the Lord, even unwittingly, through ignorance, it is still sin, and must be atoned for or punished. "The thought of foolishness is sin" (Proverbs 24:9). "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, shall be guilty of all" (James 2:10). "If a soul touch any unclean thing, and it be hidden from him, he also shall be unclean and guilty" (Leviticus 5:2).

Second. The woman's guilt was aggravated through the consequences that followed, she having, although unintentionally, caused suffering to another. So a man is responsible to God, not only for his acts, but also for "the fruit of his doings" (Jeremiah 17:10). Who can estimate "the fruit" for time and for eternity, of an "idle word" or a careless act?

Third. The inspector himself paid the penalty, and procured the release of the woman, thus reminding us of Christ's atonement.

OLD SALLY'S TALK WITH THE VICAR.

THE Rev. Clement Sparks was returning one morning from his usual round of visitations in an English parish, when he was accosted by an old woman, whose withered face, with its lines of care and woe-stricken expression, had long been familiar to him. He had often felt a genuine pity for Sally, for she was the mother of a large family, of which four of the sons, since they had grown up, had been a source of constant anxiety and trouble. What astonished all who knew her was that, bad as they were, she not only never lost her affection for them, but always cherished a warm and quenchless hope, which brightened even her darkest moments, that they would yet give up their bad ways and fulfil her best expectations.

"Good morning, Sally," said Mr. Sparks, as the old woman advanced toward him. "I hope you have got some good news for me to-day." "Indeed, sir, I wish I had," said Sally, "but everything seems to go against me. If I had not faith in prayer I don't know what I should do. There's bad news from India, where Jim has joined his regiment. He's got among a wild set, and Mary Brown's letter says he's as wild as any of 'em. No mother could wish to have a more loving son than Jim used to be, but drink has been his curse, and is doing for him what it has done for his brothers. When I pass by that public-house it makes my heart bleed to think of the mischief it has done in our poor family. They call it the 'Angel;' I call it the 'Devil.'"

"Well," said the Vicar, "it is so easy to give advice, and so hard to act upon it in circumstances like yours, that I really don't know what to say to you, except this—keep on praying that God may change the hearts of your sons and make them good Christians. They know by bitter experience that 'the way of transgressors is hard,' and who can tell but that what they have felt and seen of the devil's service may make them all the more earnest and devoted when once they have become soldiers of Jesus Christ. But, Sally, we must work as well as pray. I will write to your son myself, and will get my daughter to talk to his brothers."

The vicar's daughter was a young lady about whom there were no two opinions in the parish. Tall, beautiful, amiable, and gifted, it was agreed on all hands that she had inherited the united excellencies of her father and mother, and had some besides which were distinctly and peculiarly her own. A perfect lady in manner and bearing, she contrived to mix with the very humblest of the parishioners without conveying the feeling that she was condescending to them (indeed the thought never occurred to her), and without any of the airs of an exalted patronage. She felt that the most precious of human possessions is not the monopoly of any class or rank but is the priceless heritage of man as man. That heritage, with all its high relationships and its far-reaching possibilities, she recognized under every guise and disguise.

She had made many fruitless attempts to get the widow's wayward sons to a Bible-class she held weekly, but she resolved to make one effort more. Womanly tact, and a determined will made that effort, with the blessing of God, a success.

Looking ashamed, sheepish, and awkward, the three young men came to the Vicarage on the evening of the Bible-class, and were welcomed by Miss Sparks with a frank cordiality and an evident gladness that soon made them forget their uneasiness, and feel pleased they had come. The room was warm and comfortable, and the whole scene so genial and inviting, that they could not help contrasting it with the wretched haunts of vice which they knew too well.

The subject selected by Miss Sparks was the parable of the prodigal son; the portion of it on which she dwelt principally being "the far country," of which it is said, "there was a famine in that land." Appealing directly to the experience of all present, she asked if they too had not known what famine meant. Had not the drinking, the gambling, the whole round of sinful pleasures left them in a state of spiritual famine, and done nothing whatever to supply the deep wants that made them so restless, so dissatisfied, and so wretched? Having thus appealed to their consciousness of want, she proceeded to dwell on the fatherly love of Him who is ever waiting to welcome the returning prodigal. This she did in tones so sweet, and with looks so full of eloquent earnestness, that even the hardest and roughest men in the room listened with profound stillness to the words that seemed to drop as "the gentle rain from heaven upon the place beneath."

With gratitude and joy which could only find vent in silent thanksgiving to heaven, Miss Sparks noticed signs of deep emotion in the faces of the three sons of the widow; nor were those signs deceptive. The word of life had fallen into ground prepared by the Holy Spirit. Each of the young men was led that very night to ask, "What must I do to be saved?" and remained behind to talk with her of God's way of salvation. Believing not only in a full and free but a present salvation, she bade them there and then accept God's offer of pardon and peace in Christ.

So simply and persuasively did she tell the wondrous story, that the redeeming plan stood out "conspicuous as the brightness of a star" before them and they went home to gladden the heart of their old mother with the news of their conversion. Shortly before her death her cup was made to run over by the news that her "soldier laddie" in India had also become a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Subject of an Extra Session of Congress was revived on April 19th, by a resolution introduced in the Senate by Mr. Blair, as a result of the protracted deadlock. In the Senate during the past week the Democrats have regularly voted every day for going into an executive session, but the Republicans have as regularly defeated the motion. There are now five treaties awaiting confirmation, and nearly three hundred nominations to be considered. When the motion for an executive session fails, the old question of the appointment of Senate officers is revived, and then the Democrats take their turn in obstructing progress, being determined that these appointments shall not be made before December. Meanwhile the national interests are neglected, and the business of the courts and public offices suffers. The question of division of spoils is one of the most discreditable that could have been raised to delay progress. As between the two rivals, Conkling and Blaine, sympathy for either is not extensively manifested. Outside political circles the people would have preferred seeing the President refuse to be made a tool by either statesman, and would have given him their approval had he exercised his right to make nominations on the sole ground of efficiency. But the policy pursued suggests the suspicion that Mr. Blaine is exerting a controlling influence in the Cabinet, and little surprise is felt that Mr. Conkling's antagonism is aroused. For the credit of the nation, the unseemly exhibition cannot be too quickly terminated.

The Resignation of Mr. Brady, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has been requested by Mr. James. Mr. Brady has had control of the contracts for the famous "star routes" of mail service. A great deal of scandal has existed in Washington for two or three years past on account of the manner in which these contracts were made, and the enormous increase of compensation allowed to favored contractors over the amounts specified in their agreements with the Government. Such increases have been allowed on the pretence of expediting the service. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General had the matter in his exclusive charge. When he had bargained with a contractor to carry the mails once or twice a week over a given route for a specified sum, he would sometimes order the service increased to three times or six times a week, and the compensation to be increased accordingly. In this way star routes, originally let for an aggregate of $700,000, have been made worth over $2,000,000 to the contractors. It is alleged that the increased service, in many instances, was ordered in the face of the reports of special agents of the department, that no such increase was needed, and that in numerous cases the contractors went on performing only the old service while drawing the additional pay. Mr. James's act is characteristic of his known abhorrence of jobs of all kinds; and if the facts are as alleged, we may hope that a considerable saving will result from the change of officers.

The Wearisome Monotony of the Contest of endurance in the Senate was broken last week by a speech from Senator Frye, of Maine, who was elected to fill the vacancy caused by Mr. Blaine's removal to the Cabinet. An impression prevails that it was inspired by the Secretary, and its leading characteristics bear so close a resemblance to the sentiments expressed by Mr. Blaine in the speeches he delivered prior to the Presidential election as to confirm that impression. It was intensely sectional in its character, reviving issues it was hoped were long since dead, and in the points where it touched current interests, it dealt with them in a spirit hostile to the South. Allegations of bulldozing and intimidation in the recent election were freely made, and aroused a very bitter feeling of resentment among Southern Senators. The effect of the speech was apparently to antagonize the Southern men to the administration, and to strengthen Mr. Conkling's hands in the confirmation question. Such a result may be a part of Mr. Blaine's policy, but the public does not see how it can advance the interests of the administration nor conduce to the harmony and prosperity of the nation.

The Policy of Repudiation has been Defeated in Tennessee, the Legislature having passed the bill to fund the State debt at par with three per cent interest. The struggle between the repudiationists and the friends of the bill has been a bitter and desperate one, and the result has occasioned intense excitement all over the State. The Nashville Banner, which has persistently advocated the policy of honest payment, and is the leading Democratic journal of the State, says: "This result inaugurates a new era of peace, contentment, happiness, and prosperity for one and all. Demagogues recognize in it the death-knell of their political hopes, and of the success of their nefarious doctrines. Every true citizen observes in it the triumph of honesty. This, the only barrier, having been surmounted, our march to social, commercial, and political success will be sure and rapid. The State is saved, and honesty carries the day." The bonds of the State have already materially advanced in price on Wall Street.

The Subscriptions in Aid of the Sufferers by floods in the West are daily received at the Produce Exchange. On April 23d they amounted to nearly three thousand dollars. The latest news from the scene of the disaster is that the Missouri River is higher now than when the ice broke up, and has done much additional damage in Iowa, Nebraska, and Dakota, during the past two days. No full accounts have yet been received from the submerged country in Dakota, from the fact that all mail communication with Yankton is suspended, the railroads to that point being still under water. The destitute farmers and villagers gathered there are being fed upon Government rations issued in pursuance of the timely order of the President, but this relief is only temporary, and a large sum will be needed to get them back to their ruined homes when the waters recede and support them until they can make a crop.

Several Fatal Railroad Disasters Occurred during the past week. On April 21st the night express of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad, was moving at an ordinary speed across the trestle-work over the Meredosia River, one mile south of Albany, Ill., when the trestle gave way and the train was precipitated into the river. The train, consisting of engine, tender, baggage-car, passenger and sleeping-cars, all went down except the sleeper, which hangs over the bridge, the upper end high in the air. Two cars floated off down the stream. Three passengers saved their lives by swimming, but it is believed that at least eight lives must have been lost.

On April 22d a train which left Antonita, Col., for Chama was approaching Ozier, New Mexico, thirty-eight miles from Antonito, when the passenger-coach jumped from the track and rolled down an embankment one hundred and fifty feet high, killing seven men and one woman, and injuring all of the other passengers.

The Twenty-ninth Anniversary of the Wilson Mission in New York was held April 22d. It was organized twenty-eight years ago by an intelligent band of Christian workers whose hearts had been touched by the wretchedness of tenement-house life in the Eleventh Ward. The alleys and cellars in that densely populated quarter seemed to be swarming with children destined to lives of crime, and the girls had fewer chances of escape than the boys. In a small upper room was opened an industrial school, on a very simple plan. Girls were to be given instruction in the common English branches during the morning hours, a warm dinner at midday, and practical hints in sewing during the afternoon. The original plan has been enlarged, but not changed in spirit, departments being opened for training girls in housework and difficult needlework, and also for kindergarten instruction. A Sunday-school was also organized, and in 1869 a mission-house was opened, so that the religious needs of the children might receive the attention the founders of the mission had primarily in view when it was organized. It is supported entirely by voluntary contributions, and efforts are being made to increase these, to enable the workers to extend the benefits of the mission.

A Paragraph Headed "A Theological Student Shot while Committing a Burglary" has appeared in many newspapers during the past week. The paragraph stated that a student of the Andover Theological Seminary had attempted to enter a house for the purpose of stealing some bonds known to be in the proprietor's possession, and had been caught in the act and shot before he could make his escape. The case has been investigated, and it is found that such a circumstance really did occur, but the young man was not a theological student in the Andover Seminary, but was an avowed infidel in a secular educational establishment. On the very night when he committed the fatal crime, while borrowing of a schoolmate the pistol which he used in the burglary, he declared that there is no God and no hereafter, and that he hoped when he died they would hustle him out of sight with as little ceremony as possible.

Sunday Desecration, Apart from the Sin of the practice, is not always commercially successful. A place of public amusement and instruction in New York has recently been abandoned as a financial failure. Among other reasons, given by the proprietor to a reporter, was the opening of it on Sundays, whereby the best class of patrons was driven away and their places were not taken by any others.

Temperance Work in the Episcopal Church promises to be of a thoroughly energetic character. At a meeting held in New York on April 19th, at which Bishop Lee, of Delaware, presided, Rev. Robert Graham, Secretary of the Church of England Temperance Society, delivered an address on the workings of the society, the last he will make prior to his return to England. On the motion of the Rev. Dr. McKim, a resolution was passed thanking Mr. Graham for his labors, and requesting the New York society to ask the society of Manchester, England, to grant Mr. Graham a year's leave of absence, in order that he may aid in establishing temperance societies among the Protestant Episcopal churches in this country.

Mr. Moody's Estimate of the Results of his labors in San Francisco was obtained by a reporter while he was at Denver, Col., on his way home. Being asked whether the meetings in San Francisco were satisfactory, he replied, "No, they were not satisfactory, for nothing less than the conversion of every man in the city would have satisfied me. But the results were gratifying—very gratifying." He expressed dislike for the title "revivalist." "Revivals rest solely with God!" he exclaimed. "I can only do my best to aid in it." Accompanied by Mr. Sankey he remained at Los Angeles over Sunday, and held three meetings there, after which he intended to return to Northfield for a brief rest.

Forty-four Mormon Missionaries Passed through Cheyenne, W. T., on April 20th, on their way to Wales on a proselyting expedition. They are inferior and coarse-looking men. Most of them have from two to five wives. They will work in the mining and iron district in Wales. It is deplorable that such men should be allowed to go forth to deceive the simple-minded peasants across the Atlantic. Could they see the degradation of the system of Mormonism, and hear the accounts Mormon women could give of the life they live, the so-called missionaries would obtain few if any converts.

Mr. Sutherland, the Converted Actor, Uttered some timely words of warning to Christian theatre-goers on Sunday, April 17th, in the course of an address at the Temple in Brooklyn. He described his own experience on the stage, and showed from several pages from his own life how Christian men and women are lending their influence to the propagation of evil. The acts of inconsistent Christians whom he recognized from behind the foot-lights, he said, had kept him from seeking Jesus for many years. He denounced the stage as degenerate and profligate, and said that the best men and women on it admitted that vile persons of both sexes had brought disgrace upon the profession. If more parents knew where their children went at night, the exchequer of the play-houses would be greatly diminished. He could take a father up the Bowery and show him sights that would make him quail. Were the best actors to attempt only the best plays of Shakespeare, and moral dramas, the stage would not flourish and succeed in drawing large profits. His experience had been that the plays which had the longest run and drew the most crowded houses were those that were most immoral in their spectacles and tendencies.

A Twenty Million Dollar Mortgage Deed was found by an Italian ragpicker on April 19th, among some waste paper swept out of an hotel in Chicago. The owner, who had been staying in the hotel, had dropped it from his pocket, and the servants had swept it away with the rubbish on the floor. Documents representing such enormous sums of money do not often reward the perseverance with which the ragpickers probe the dust receptacles of our cities; but a prize of far higher value, the title to a heavenly mansion, lies within the reach of all; but men are too often so engrossed with worldly pursuits that they neglect to secure it.

The Remarkable Fulfilment of a Mother's dream is reported from New Albany, Ind. The wreck of the towboat James Blakemore, on Sunday afternoon, April 17th, verified the dream of a Pittsburg mother a few nights before the boat left that city. The lamp-cleaner on the boat was rescued from the river nearly drowned. The first words he uttered after being taken aboard the ferryboat were, "My mother dreamed all this, and begged me not to go on the boat." He explained by saying that a few nights before the Blakemore left Pittsburg his mother dreamed that he would be lost on the trip by being upset. So vividly, he said, was this dream impressed upon her mind that she begged him with all a mother's earnestness not to make the trip on her. "I don't believe in dreams," said the lamp-cleaner, "but I know my mother's dream has been verified, for the boat has turned over just as she dreamed it would, and I was nearly drowned."

A Military Parade had to be Postponed in deference to the conscientious scruples of General Jackson, on one remarkable occasion. The story is thus related by the New Orleans Democrat: "During the latter part of his life he was in the habit of coming down to New Orleans to see his old friends and comrades in arms and participate in the celebration of the glorious eighth of January. It happened on one of these visits that the eighth occurred on Sunday. General Plauche called upon the old hero and requested him to accompany the military to the battle-ground on the anniversary of the great day. "I am going to church to-morrow," mildly observed the General. The military preparations for the celebration went on, and on Sunday morning at ten o'clock General Plauche called at the St. Charles and informed General Jackson that the military and civic processions were ready to accompany him to the scene of his glory. "General Plauche," responded Old Hickory, turning upon him the glance of his kindling eye, "I told you I was going to church to-day." General Plauche withdrew, muttering to himself, "I might have known better." The celebration was postponed till the next day, and General Jackson listened on that day to an eloquent sermon by Dr. Scott on Lafayette Square."

The Globe of the Enchanted World was the name of a novel confection placed in front of the guest of the evening at the splendid banquet recently given at the Tivoli Gardens, Mexico, in honor of General Ord. This globe was decorated with great ingenuity: it represented the principal countries of the world, especial prominence being given to the geographical relations of Mexico and the United States. At the close of the banquet General Ord was requested to break the crust of the globe. He did so, and to his perfect astonishment a number of tropical birds flew out and disappeared among the trees outside the summer-house, where they began to sing delightfully. The strange spectacle startled the General and those who were not in the secret. It is very suggestive: those who have pondered over the prophecies relating to the closing scenes of this world, when the spell of enchantment with which Satan holds men captive is finally broken, then winged messengers from the skies will surely come to rejoice over the new heavens and the new earth, in which will dwell righteousness (2 Peter 3 : 13).

An Incident Related by Rev. E. Payson Hammond illustrates the doctrine that uncongenial society would of itself be sufficient to produce utter misery after death. He says: "A camp-meeting and a horse-race were to be held near Toronto on the same day. Owing to a mistake, a Christian who was going to the camp-meeting found himself on board the boat which carried the horse men, and he soon became so disgusted with the ribaldry and coarse talk he heard that he went to the captain and said, 'Captain, I cannot endure this; it is like hell to me. I will give you ten dollars if you will put me back to Rochester.' This could not be done. In the evening one of the horse men inadvertently got on board the boat carrying the camp-meeting people. He was miserable. He could not find anybody to drink or smoke with, or to talk to as he wanted to be talked to, and so he went to the captain and said, using the same words as the gentleman in the morning had used: "Captain, if you will put me back into Toronto, I will give you ten dollars. This is hell to me."

A Young Hermit was Discovered in a Sand hill, near Michigan City, Ind., recently. A man cutting wood for hoop-poles saw him entering a hole he had dug in the side of the hill, and forced him to accompany him to the city. There he was questioned, and avowed his determination to live the life of a hermit, but refused to disclose his reasons for so doing. He is a Swede who formerly lived in Chicago, and is twenty-three years old. The resolution to waste his life in this strange way is unaccountable. He is an extreme illustration of the unprofitable servant Jesus described (Matt. 25 : 30). Such a man, as well as many who spend their lives in worldly pleasure instead of in active service for God, incur an appalling responsibility which in the day of judgment will alone be fully realized.

Toy Birds, Representing a Hundred Thousand dollars each, are sometimes sold by the Government to visitors at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing as mementoes. The greenbacks returned to the treasury, after they have been in circulation a few years, are sent to the bureau, where they are reduced to pulp, and moulded into figures of birds. The little figures are frequently composed of paper which has passed current for enormous sums of money. The intrinsic value of the paper was small enough, but people received it readily for the value inscribed upon it, because they were satisfied that the Government would keep its promise written there. How much anxiety and distress Christians would be saved if they trusted God as they trust the Government. His promises are faithful and true (Heb. 10 : 23).

HONEY FROM A LION.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Delivered on Sunday Morning, April 3rd, 1881.

"But not as the offence, so also is the free gift. for if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many."—ROM. 5 : 15.

Difficult Questions Raised—Corn not Pearls for the Hungry—I. Salvation a Free Gift—Without Regard to Merit—To Conditions—In the Teeth of Rebellion—Through the one Man—II. Great Evils coming to us by the Fall—Loss of Paradise—Heritage of Sorrow—Bias Toward Evil—Labor and Death—III. The Certainty of Salvation, an Inference from the Fall—The Same Principle of Representation—More Delightful to God—More Inevitable—Difference of Causes—Difference of Channels—IV. Greater Results—An Inheritance Instead of a Lease—A Higher Life—A Natural Inference.

THIS text affords many openings for controversy. It can be made to bristle with difficulties. For instance—there might be a long discussion as to the manner in which the fall of Adam can justly be made to affect the condition of his posterity. When this is settled there might arise a question as to the exact way in which Adam's fault is connected with ourselves—whether by imputation of its sin, or in what other form; and then there might be further dispute as to the limit of the evil resulting from our first parents' offence, and the full meaning of the fall, original sin, natural depravity, and so forth.

There would be another splendid opportunity for a great battle over the question of the extent of the redeeming work of the Lord Jesus Christ; whether it covers, as to persons, the whole area of the ruin of the Fall; whether, in fact, full atonement has been made for all mankind or only for the elect.

I have, as this time, neither the inclination nor the mental strength either to suggest or to remove the difficulties, which are so often the amusement of unpractical minds. I feel more inclined to chime in with that ancient father of the church who declined controversy in a wise and explicit manner. He had been speaking concerning the things of God and found himself at length confounded by a certain clamorous disputant, who shouted again and again, "Hear me! Hear me!" "No," said the father, "I will not hear you, nor shall you hear me; but we will both be quiet and hear what our Lord Jesus Christ has to say." So we will not at this time listen to this side nor to that; but we will bow our ear to hear what the Scripture itself hath to say apart from all the noise of sect and party.

My object shall be to find out in the text that which is practically of use to us, that which may save the unconverted, that which may comfort and build up those of us who are brought into a state of reconciliation with God; for I have of late been so often shut up in my sick chamber that when I do come forth I must be more than ever eager for fruit to the glory of God. We shall not, therefore, dive into the deeps with the hope of finding pearls, for these could not feed hungry men; but we will navigate the surface of the sea, and hope that some favoring wind will bear us to the desired haven with a freight of corn wherewith to supply the famishing.

I. The first observation from the text is this—the appointed way of our salvation is by

THE FREE GIFT OF GOD.

We were ruined by the Fall, but we are saved by a free gift. The text tells us that "the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many." "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." "Grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Although this doctrine is well known, and is taught in our synagogues every Sabbath day, yet this grand essential truth is often enough forgotten or ignored, so that it had need be repeated again and again.

As Martin Luther said of a certain other truth so say I of this, "You so constantly forget it that I feel inclined to take the Bible and beat it about your head, that you may feel it and keep it in remembrance." Men do not naturally love the doctrine of grace, and therefore they cast it out of their minds as much as possible. The larger portion of mankind do not believe that salvation is of grace: another part of them profess to believe it, but do not understand its meaning; and many who do understand it have never yielded to it or embraced it. Happy are they who belong to the remnant according to the election of grace, for they know the joyful sound, and they walk in the light of the glory of the grace of God which is in Christ Jesus.

Observe, that salvation is a free gift, that is to say, it is bestowed upon men by God without regard to any merit, supposed or real. It is according to the nature of God to pity the miserable and forgive the guilty, "for He is good, and His mercy endureth for ever." God has a reason for saving men; but that reason does not lie in man's merit in any degree whatever. This is clear from the fact that He often begins His work of grace upon those who can least of all be credited with goodness. It was said of our Lord, "This man receiveth sinners," and the saying was most emphatically true. Sovereign grace selects such as Rahab the harlot, and Manasseh the persecutor, and Saul of Tarsus, the mad zealot against Christ: such as these have been seized upon by grace, and arrested in infinite love, that in them the Lord might manifest the power and plenitude of His mercy. Salvation is a work which is begun by the pure, unpurchased, free favor of God, and in the same spirit it is carried on and perfected. Pure grace, which lays the foundation, also brings forth the topstone.

Salvation is also brought to men irrespective of any merit which God foresees will be in man. Foresight of the existence of grace cannot be the cause of grace. God himself does not foresee that there will be any good thing in any man, except what he foresees that He will put there. What is the reason, then, why He determines that He will put it there? That reason, so far as we are informed, is this, "He will have mercy on whom He will have mercy." The Lord determines to display His love, and set on active work His attribute of grace, therefore doth He save men according to the good pleasure of His will.

I go a little further in trying to explain how salvation is a free gift, by saying that it is given without reference to conditions which imply any desert. But I hear one murmur, "God will not give grace to men who do not repent." I answer, God gives men grace to repent, and no man ever repents till first grace is given him by which he is led to repentance. "God will not give His grace to those who do not believe," says one. I reply, God gives grace to men by which they are moved to believe, and it is through the grace of God that they are brought into the faith of Jesus Christ.

You may say, if you please, that repentance and faith are conditions of salvation, and I will not quarrel with you; but please remember that they are not conditions in the sense of deserving anything of God. They may be conditions of receiving, but they are not conditions of purchasing, for salvation is without money and without price. We are expressly told that salvation "is of faith, that it might be by grace:" for faith is not to be numbered with works of the law, to which the idea of merit may be attached. Faith is far as the poles asunder from claiming anything of God by way of debt. Faith comes as a poor, undeserving thing, and simply trusts the free mercy of God. It never attempts to wear the crown, or grasp a particle of praise.

Beloved, so far is God from giving salvation to men as a matter of reward and debt, and therefore bestowing it only upon the good and excellent, that He is pleased to bestow that salvation over the head of sin and

IN THE TEETH OF REBELLION.

There is no opportunity for forgiveness where there is no offence. If men are meritorious how can God be gracious to them? In such a case it will be enough for Him to be just. When good works can put in a valid claim peace and heaven can be obtained by the rules of debt; but since it is clear that eternal life is the gift of pure favor, you need not marvel when I say that grace comes to men leaping over the mountains of their iniquities. Abounding mercy delights to blot out abounding sin, and it will never lack for opportunity to do its pleasure.

There is no lack of occasions for grace in this poor fallen world, and of all the places where there is most room I know of one spot not far from here where there is a grand opportunity for infinite mercy and superabounding grace to exercise their power. Here is the spot—it is this treacherous, guilty heart of mine. I think, my brother, you know of another spot that is very like it; and you, my sister, too, can say, "Wondrous mercy! Sure there is room for all its heights and depths to be shown in this sinful soul of mine." Ay, and it will be shown, too, if you can but look for it through Christ Jesus; for it is the delight of God's grace to flow into unlikely places; mercy is the glory of God, and He loves to bestow it on those who least deserve it.

Note one thing more concerning this plan of salvation, that all this grace comes to us through the one man Jesus Christ. I sometimes hear people talking about a "one man ministry." I know what they mean, but I know also that I am saved by a one man ministry, even by one who trod the winepress alone, and of the people there was none with Him. I was lost by a one man ministry, when father Adam fell in Eden; but I was saved by a one man ministry, when the blessed Lord Jesus Christ bore my sin in His own body on the tree.

It is through the one man, Christ Jesus, that all the grace of God comes streaming down to all the chosen. Mercy flows to no man save through the one appointed channel, Jesus the Son of Man. Get away from Christ, and you leave the highway of God's everlasting love; pass this door, and you shall find no entrance into life. You must drink from this conduit-pipe, or you must thirst for ever, and ask in vain for a drop of water to cool your parched tongue. "In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."

Thus have I tried to set before you God's way of salvation.

II. Starting aside, as it may seem, from the current of our thoughts, but only with the view of coming back to it with a forcible argument, we next note that it is certain that there have come to us

GREAT EVILS BY THE FALL.

Paul speaks in this text of ours of the "offence," which word may be read the "Fall," which was caused by the stumbling of our father Adam. Our fall in Adam is a type of the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, but the type is not able completely to set forth all the work of Christ: hence the apostle says, "But not as the offence, so also is the free gift."

It is certain, then, that we were heavy losers by the offence of the first father and head of our race. I am not going into details and particulars, but it is clear that we have lost the garden of Eden and all its delights, privileges, and immunities, its communion with God, and its freedom from death. We have lost our first honor and health, and we have become the subjects of pain and weakness, suffering and death; this is the effect of the Fall. A desert now howls where otherwise a garden would have smiled.

Through the sin of Adam we have been born under conditions which are far from being desirable, heirs to a heritage of sorrow. Our griefs have been alleviated by the bounty of God, but still we are not born under such conditions as might have been ours had Adam remained in his integrity and kept his first estate. We came into the world with a bias towards evil. Those of us who have any knowledge of our own nature must confess that there is in us a strong tendency towards sin, which is mixed up with our very being. This is not derived solely from faults of education, or from the imitation of others; but there is a bent within us in the wrong direction, and this has been there from our birth. Alas! that it should be so; but so it is.

In addition to having this tendency to sin, we are made liable to death—nay, not liable alone, but we are sure in due time to bow our heads beneath the fatal stroke. Two only of the human race have escaped death, but the rest have left their bodies here to moulder back into mother earth, and unless the Lord cometh speedily, we expect that the same thing will happen to these bodies of ours. While we live we know that the sweat of our brow must pay the price of our bread; we know that our children must be born with pangs and travail; we know that we ourselves must return to the dust from whence we are taken; for dust we are, and unto dust must we return.

O Adam, thou didst a sad day's work for us when thou didst hearken to the voice of thy wife and eat of the forbidden tree. The world has no more a Paradise anywhere, but everywhere it has the place of wailing and the field of the dead. Where can you go and not find traces of the first transgression in the sepulchre and its mouldering bones? Every field is fattened with the dust of the departed: every wave of the sea is tainted with atoms of the dead. Scarcely blows a March wind down our streets but it sweeps aloft the dust either of Cæsar or his slave, of ancient Briton, or modern Saxon; for the globe is worm-eaten by death.

Sin has scarred, and marred, and spoiled this creation by making it subject to vanity through its offence. Thus terrible evils have come to us by an act in which we had no hand: we were not in the Garden of Eden, we did not incite Adam to rebellion, and yet we have become sufferers through no deed of ours. Say what you will about it, the fact remains, and cannot be escaped from.

This sad truth leads me on to the one which is the essence of the text, and constitutes my third observation.

III. From the Fall we infer the

that salvation by grace through Christ Jesus shall come to believers. If all this mischief has happened to us through the fall of Adam why should not immense blessing flow to us by the work of Christ? Through Adam's transgression we lost Paradise, that is certain; but if anything can be more certain we may with greater positiveness declare that the second Adam will restore the ruin of the first.

Settle in your minds, then, that the fall of Adam has wrought us great damage, and then be as much assured that the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, in which we had no hand whatever, must do us great service. Believing in Christ Jesus, it becomes beyond all measure sure to us that we are blessed in Him, seeing that it is already certain that through the fall of Adam we have become subject to sorrow and death.

For, first, this appears to be more delightful to the heart of God. It must be fully according to His gracious nature that salvation should come to us through His Son. I can understand that God, having so arranged it that the human race should be regarded as one, and should stand or fall before Him in one man, should carry out the arrangement to its righteous end, and allow the consequences of sin to fall upon succeeding generations of men: but yet I know that He takes no pleasure in the death of any, and finds no delight in afflicting mankind. When the first Adam transgressed it was inevitable that the consequences of his transgression should descend to his posterity, and yet I can imagine a perfectly holy mind questioning whether the arrangement would be carried out.

I can conceive of angels saying one to another, "Will all men die through this entrance of sin into the world? Can it be that the innumerable sons of Adam will all suffer from his disobedience?" But I cannot imagine any question being raised about the other point, namely, the result of the work of our Lord Jesus. If God has so arranged it that in the second Adam men rise and live, it seems to me most gloriously consistent with His gracious nature and infinite love that it should come to pass that all who believe in Jesus should be saved through Him.

This assurance becomes stronger still when we think that it seems more inevitable that men should be saved by the death of Christ than that men should be lost by the sin of Adam. It might seem possible that, after Adam had sinned, God might have said, "Notwithstanding this covenant of works, I will not lay this burden upon the children of Adam;" but it is not possible that, after the eternal Son of God has become man, and has bowed His head to death, God should say, "Yet after all I will not save men for Christ's sake." Stand and look at the Christ upon the cross, and mark those wounds of His, and you will become absolutely certain that sin can be pardoned, nay, must be pardoned to those who are in Christ Jesus.

I do not know whether I shall get into the very soul of this argument as I desire, but to me it is very sweet to look at the difference as to the causes of the two effects. Look now at the occasion of our ruin—"the offence of one." The one man transgresses, and you and I and all of us come under sin, sorrow, and death. What are we told is the fountain of these streams of woe? The one action of our first parents. Far be it from me to say a word to depreciate the greatness of their crime, or to raise a question as to the justice of its consequences. I think no one can have a more decided opinion upon that point than I have; for the offence was very great, and the principle which led to our participation in its results is a just one, and, what is more, is fraught with the most blessed after-consequences to fallen men, since it has left them a door of hope of their rising by which led to their fall.

Yet the sin which destroyed us was the transgression of a finite being, and cannot be compared in power with the grace of the infinite God; it was the sin of a moment, and therefore cannot be compared for force and energy with the everlasting purpose of divine love. If, then, the comparatively feeble fount of Adam's sin sends forth a flood which drowns the world in sorrow and death, what must be the boundless blessing poured forth from the infinite source of divine grace?

Furthermore, I would have you note the difference of the channels by which the evil and the good were severally communicated to us. In each case it was "by one," but what a difference in the persons! We fell through Adam, a name not to be pronounced without reverence, seeing he is the chief patriarch of the race, and the children should honor the parent: let us not think too little of the head of the human family. Yet what is the first Adam as compared with the second Adam? He is but of the earth earthy, but the second man is the Lord from heaven. He was at best a mere man, but our Redeemer counts it not robbery to be equal with Good. Surely, then, if Adam with that puny hand of his could pull down the house of our humanity, and hurl this ruin on our first estate, that greater man, who is also the Son of God, can fully restore us and bring back to our race the golden age.

And look, my brethren, what this man did. Adam commits one fault and spoils us; but Christ's works and achievements are not one but many as the stars of heaven. Look at that life of obedience: it is like a crown set with all manner of priceless jewels: all the virtues are in it, and it is without flaw in any point. If one sinful action of our first covenant head destroys, shall not a whole life of holiness, on the part of our second covenant Representative be accepted for us?

But what is more, Adam did but eat of the forbidden fruit, but our Lord Jesus died, pouring out His soul unto death, bearing the sin of His people upon Himself. Such a death must have more force in it than the sad deed of Adam. Shall it not save us? Is there any comparison between the one act of rebellion in the garden and the matchless deed of superlative obedience upon the cross of Calvary which crowned a life of service? Am I sure that the act of disobedience has done me damage? Then I am much more certain that the glorious act of self-sacrifice must be able to save me, and I cast myself upon it without question or misgiving.

I feel the more confidence in the certainty of salvation by Christ because of my firm persuasion of the dreadful efficacy of Adam's fall. Think awhile and it will seem strange, yet strangely true, that the hope of Paradise regained should be argued and justified by the fact of Paradise lost, that the absolute certainty that one man ruined us should give us an abounding guarantee that one glorious Man has in very deed effectually saved all those who by faith accept the efficacy of His work.

Now, if you have grasped my thought, and have drunk into the truth of the text, you may derive a great deal of comfort from it, and it may suggest to you many painful things which will henceforth yield you pleasure. A babe is born into the world amid great anxiety because of its mother's pains, but while these go to prove how the consequences of the Fall are still with us, according to the word of the Lord to Eve, "in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children," they also assure us that can abundantly bring us bliss through a second birth, by which we are begotten again unto a lively hope.

You go into the arable field and mark the thistle, and tear your garments with a thorn: these prove the curse. but also preach the Gospel. Did not the Lord God say, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee." Through no fault of ours, for we were not present when the first man offended, our fields reluctantly yield their harvests. Well, inasmuch as we have seen the thorn and the thistle produced by the ground because of one Adam, we may expect to see a blessing on the earth because of the second and greater Adam.

Therefore with unbounded confidence do I believe the promise—"Ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off."

When you observe a funeral passing slowly along the street, or enter the churchyard, and notice hillock after hillock above the lowly beds of the departed, you see set forth evidently before your eyes the result of the Fall. You ask—Who slew all these? and at what gate did the fell destroyer enter this world? Did the first Adam through his disobedience lift the latch for death? It is surely so. Therefore I believe with the greater assurance that the second Adam can give life to these dry bones, can awake all these sleepers, and raise them in newness of life. If so weak a man as Adam by one sin has brought in death, to pile the carcases of men heaps upon heaps, and make the earth reek with corruption, much more shall the glorious Sun of God at His coming call them again to life and immortality, and renew them in the image of God.

Time fails me; otherwise I meant to have dwelt somewhat at length upon the last head, which can now only be cursorily noticed.

IV. It seems certain that if from the fall of Adam such great results flow, must flow from the grace of God and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ. Brethren, suppose that Adam had never sinned, and we were at this moment unfallen beings, yet our standing would have remained in jeopardy, seeing that at any moment he might have transgressed and so have pulled us down. Thousands of years of obedience might not have ended the probation, seeing there is no such stipulation in the original covenant. You and I therefore would be holding our happiness by a very precarious tenure; we could never glory in absolute security and eternal life as we now do in Christ Jesus. We have now lost everything in Adam, and so the uncertain tenure has come to an end, our lease of Eden and its joys has altogether expired; but we that have believed have obtained an inheritance which we hold by an indisputable and never-failing title which Satan himself cannot dispute; "All things are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

The Lord Jesus Christ has finished the work by which His people are saved, and that work has been certified by His resurrection from the dead. There are no "ifs" in the covenant now; there is not a "peradventure" in it from beginning to end; no chances of failure caused by unfinisheed conditions can be found in it. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Do you say "I believe he shall be saved if he—"? Do not dare to add an "if" where God has placed none. Remember what will happen to you if you add anything to the book of God's testimony. No, it is written, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved:" "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." Thus we have obtained a surer standing than we could have had under the first Adam, and our hymn is true to the letter when it sings—

> "He raised me from the deeps of sin,
> The gates of gaping hell,
> And fix'd my standing more secure
> Than 'twas before I fell."

Our Lord has not only undone the mischief of the Fall, but He has given us more than we have lost: even as the Psalmist saith, "Then I restored that which I took not away."

By the great transgression of Adam we lost our life in him, for so ran the threatening—"In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die;" but in Christ Jesus we live again with a higher and nobler life, for the new life being the direct work of the Spirit, and being sustained by feeding upon the person of the Lord Jesus, is higher than the life of innocence in the garden of Eden. It is of a higher kind in many respects, of which we cannot now speak particularly, but this much we may say, "The first Adam was made a living soul, the second Adam is a quickening Spirit."

The Lord Jesus has also brought us into a nearer relationship to God than we could have possessed by any other means. We were God's creatures by creation, but now we are His sons by adoption; in a certain narrow sense we were the offspring of God, but now by the exaltation of the man Christ Jesus, we are brought into the nearest possible relationship to God. Jesus sits upon the throne of God, and manhood is thus uplifted next to deity: the nearest akin to the Eternal is a man, Christ Jesus, the Son of the Highest. We are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones, and therefore we share His honors and participate in His triumphs.

THE REPRESENTATIVE OF US ALL,

O beloved, hath not the Lord Jesus Christ done much for us, and ought we not to expect that it should be so, for the grace of God, and the gift by grace by the man Christ Jesus, are infinitely stronger forces than Adam's sin. There must be much more sap in the man, the Branch, than in that poor plant, the one man who was made from the dust of the earth. Oh the bliss which opens up before us now! We have lost Paradise, but we shall possess that of which the earthly garden was but a lowly type: we might have eaten of the luscious fruits of Eden, but now we eat of the bread which came down from heaven; we might have heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day, but now, like Enoch, we may walk with God after a nobler and closer fashion. We are now capable of a joy which unfallen spirits could not have known: the bliss of pardoned sin, the heaven of deep conscious obligation to eternal mercy.

Those who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb will be nearer and dearer to Him, and He will be nearer and dearer to them, than all the ministering spirits before the throne, for He took upon Him our nature and not theirs. Glory be unto thee, O Christ! As I look into the awful deeps of Adam's fall, I tremble, but when I lift up my eyes again to the eternal heights whither thou hast raised me by thy passion and thy resurrection I feel strengthened by the former vision. I magnify the infinite grace of God, and believe in it unstaggeringly. Oh, that I had power to magnify it with fit words and proper speech, but these are not with me. Accept the feeling of the heart when the language of the lip confesses its failure. Accept it, Lord, through the Well-beloved. Amen.

THE LONDON MANSION HOUSE.

On March 16th, as narrated in a former number of this journal, a policeman on duty near the Mansion House—the official residence of the Lord Mayor of London—discovered a box of compressed gunpowder with a lighted fuse attached inserted in a recess of the building. Although the edifice is very substantially built it would have been severely injured if not destroyed but for the providential discovery of the policeman.

There was no doubt that the plot originated in the Irish agitation and was the work of Fenians. The present Lord Mayor of London is a gentleman so universally respected and beloved for his private and public virtues that it is difficult to imagine that personal injury to him could have been the object of the outrage. It has, however, transpired that owing to his vote in the House of Commons in favor of coercion he has received many threatening and abusive letters from Land Leaguers, who appear utterly unable to conceive of worth or excellence holding itself aloof from their seditious schemes. Many congratulations have been offered to his lordship, and the Wesleyan Church, to which he belongs, and the great municipality of which he is the present chief, and hopes expressed that both may long have the benefit of his invaluable services.

THE PLOT TO BLOW UP THE LONDON MANSION HOUSE.
Finding the Box of Powder.

The detective police were at once intrusted with the task of tracing the criminals who had attempted to execute the wicked plot, and they satisfied themselves that the chief agent was an Irishman named Patrick Moore, who had assumed the name of Patrick Coleman. The seaports were placed under surveillance and every outgoing steamer was watched. It was, however, discovered that a passenger named Coleman, having very much the appearance of the missing man, had left by the steamer Australia for America. Measures were taken to intercept him but it appears to have been a ruse to divert pursuit, for when the Australia arrived it was found that the suspected man was not the Coleman sought.

While the attention of the authorities was thus diverted the criminal escaped in the disguise of a priest and arrived in New York a few days ago. Asked by a reporter as to the motives which prompted him to the deed he said, "It was intended to be only the beginning of the end. When the government were busily occupied framing the Coercion act we sent Gladstone and his Cabinet warning that if they arrested Irishmen and crowded the jails with prisoners, and if evictions continued, that retaliatory measures would be instituted. They disregarded our warning. While England continues her brutal policy we will continue our policy. It is war to the knife with us. There is not an Irishman in London who is not imbued with our principles and determination. Let me tell you that more surprises for Her Majesty's government are in store, and you will not have long to wait until my words receive verification."

The desperate deed, which, had it succeeded, must have involved the sacrifice of many lives besides those of the inmates of the Mansion House, is thus made the subject of boasting instead of shame, and shows how lost to all sense of right and justice are the leaders of the Fenian movement.

The Mansion House, of which one side is shown in our illustration, is about 129 years old. It was built by the Corporation of London at a cost of $215,000, from the plans of Dance, and its first occupant was a Lord Mayor of the noble House of Cecil, the head of which at the present time is the Marquis of Salisbury. As originally designed it had a large central courtyard, but that has been roofed in and converted into the magnificent apartment known as the Egyptian Hall, where the banquets given by the Lord Mayor to distinguished foreigners and royal visitors are held. It is also used for meetings for charitable and civic purposes in which the Lord Mayor takes a special interest.

THE HOUR AND THE MAN.

The Stage of the Disease—A Revolutionary Catastrophe Impending—Diverse Lines Converging—Danger of Anarchy—The Present Situation Unique in History—Mr. R. W. Dale's Opinion—Beacon Lights—II. The Removal of Both Hindrance and Hinderer—Not Necessarily Identical—The Hindrance.

It may be objected, however, that "lawlessness" has existed during every period of the Church's dark and troubled history, that the Apostle Paul himself tells us, in the very Scripture under consideration, that it had commenced its secret working even in his day, and that consequently its prevalence at the present time can afford no clear indication that the manifestation of Antichrist draws near. In the first place we must distinguish between the existence of an evil and its successive stages of development. The question to be decided is whether "lawlessness" has ever previously prevailed to so great an extent and in such a multiplicity of forms as it does at present. Our moral diagnosis must have respect rather to THE STAGE WHICH THE DISEASE HAS REACHED than to the mere fact of its existence. Do we see any signs that our social order is being undermined, and that a great revolutionary catastrophe is impending, not only in our own country but throughout Christendom? It is with no desire to indulge in mere sensationalism that we feel constrained to answer, "We do;" and our ground for this conclusion will be best indicated by connecting it with the second answer to the objection above referred to. The second answer is as follows: The gravest significance of the present increasing sign of "lawlessness" arises from the fact that it manifests many unmistakable signs of coming to a head; in other words, the various diverse lines on which it works seem very plainly to be converging to a central point, a final issue, namely, that materialistic Atheism of which Antichrist is to be in his own person the embodiment.

This is not simply our own reading of the signs of the times; it is not the opinion merely of idle, narrow-minded "prophecy-mongers;" it is the distinct admission of men who have themselves relinquished all faith in Christianity and in God, and who anticipate a godless future without sorrow, but not without dismay. Take, as an example, the words of a distinguished writer of this class as quoted by Dr. Anderson in his "Coming Prince:" "The denial of the existence of God, and of a future state, is the dethronement of conscience, and society will pass, to say the least, through a dangerous interval before social science can fill the vacant throne. In the mean time mankind, or some portions of it, may be in danger of an anarchy of self-interest, compressed, for the purpose of political order, by a despotism of force.

That science and criticism, acting—thanks to the liberty won by political effort—with a freedom never known before, have delivered us from a mass of dark and degrading superstitions, we own with heartfelt thankfulness to the deliverers, and in the firm conviction that the removal of false beliefs, and of the authority of institutions founded on them, cannot prove in the end anything but a blessing to mankind. But at the same time the foundations of general morality have inevitably been shaken, and a crisis has been brought on the gravity of which nobody can fail to see, and nobody but a fanatic of materialism can see without the most serious misgiving.

"There has been nothing in the history of man like the present situation. The decadence of the ancient mythologies is very far from affording a parallel. The Reformation was a tremendous earthquake: it shook down the fabric of mediæval religion, and, as a consequence of the disturbance in the religious sphere, filled the world with revolutions and wars. But it left the authority of the Bible unshaken, and men might feel that the destructive process had its limit, and that adamant was still beneath their feet." But now the fact that the Bible itself has any Divine authority is called in question, if not contemptuously denied, and at the same time materialistic science claims, in the grand generalization of evolution, to have discovered the key to the solution of the mystery of the creation, the part of the Creator being omitted. Thus the world "finds itself brought to a crisis the character of which any one may realize by distinctly presenting to himself the idea of existence without a God" (Goldwin Smith, Macmillan's Magazine, February, 1878).

These are indeed startling and remarkable words from such a source; and they do not stand alone, but are echoed by men of every school of thought. "There are clear signs," says the eminent Congregational minister, Mr. R. W. Dale, "that the movement of theological speculation which began in the sixteenth century, and which has assumed a permanent form in the confessions and creeds of the great Protestant churches, is coming to an end."

"The attempt to put back

says the author of the "Coming Prince"—who is, we are disposed to judge from internal evidence, one of "the brethren"—"is hopeless. Indeed the movement is but one of many phases of the intense mental activity which marks the age. The reign of creeds is passed. The days are gone for ever when men will believe what their fathers believed, without a question. Rome, in some phase of its development, has a strange charm for minds of a certain caste, and rationalism is fascinating not a few; but orthodoxy in the old sense is dead" (p. 15).

"Half a century ago," writes the broad church historian, James Anthony Froude, "any one who openly questioned the truth of Christianity was treated as a public offender and was excommunicated by society. Now, while one set of men are bringing back mediævalism, science and criticism are assailing with impunity the authority of the Bible; miracles are declared impossible; even Theism itself is treated as an open question, and subjects which in our fathers' time were approached only with the deepest reverence and solemnity are discussed among the present generation with as much freedom as the common problems of natural philosophy."

In a word, and to speak in plain terms, the most essential doctrines of the Gospel are not only being called in question, but the fundamental conceptions of even natural religion, such as the existence of the Divine government and the immortality of man, have day by day less hold on the consciences of the majority of those who nevertheless still profess and call themselves Christians. Thus society breathes an atmosphere charged with the germs of moral disease and death, and a dull gray mist of negative atheism, in the form of agnosticism, is spreading over Christendom, out of which, as by a kind of ghastly condensation, there will speedily be evolved, first in portentous outline, and then in hideous and terrific distinctness, the form of him "who opposeth and exalteth himself above everything that is called God, or an object of worship; so that He sitteth in the temple of God, shewing Himself that He is God" (2 Thessalonians 2 : 4).

Nevertheless it remains unquestionably true that this reign of lawlessness, of which we have spoken as the moral sign of the coming of the lawless one, is of necessity somewhat indefinite in character; it indicates the approach rather than the arrival of Antichrist's "own season," and should warn the Christian watcher, as nightfall warns the mariner on a dangerous shore, to gaze more earnestly into the deepening darkness for the flashing forth of those beacon-lights whose welcome beams will either assure him that the danger is passed,* or, at all events, will enable him to judge of the position of his vessel. Such beacon-lights, we believe, God has graciously provided us with in His prophetic Word.

II.—Concerning the second of the four principal signs of the coming of Antichrist, to which reference has been made, we read in 2 Thessalonians 2 : 6–8; "And now ye know what restraineth him (i.e., the Antichrist) that he might be revealed in his own season. For the mystery of lawlessness doth already work: only he who now restrains (will restrain), until out of the midst he be gone. And then shall the lawless one be revealed, whom the Lord Jesus shall consume with the breath of His mouth, and shall destroy with the forthshining of His presence."

In this passage it is carefully to be noticed that both and a hinderer are spoken of. There was some thing which restrained the manifestation of Antichrist—which, as it were, blocked the road and prevented his approach. And there was also some person whose presence was incompatible with the presence of the Antichrist; as light cannot co-exist with darkness, or God and Satan occupy the same throne at one and the same time. Hence this person—whoever he may be—must be "gone out of the midst" before the lawless one can be revealed. It is, moreover, to be observed that with regard to the character of the restraining thing or power, the Thessalonian believers to whom St. Paul wrote were under no danger of misapprehension; he had himself given them explicit information on the subject. "Remember ye not," he says, in the fifth verse, "that when I was yet with you I told you these things? And now (therefore) ye know what restraineth."

Nothing of this kind, however, is said with reference to the restraining person; for aught we know the Thessalonians, though they knew what the restraining thing was, may have been ignorant as to who the restraining person was. The two are not necessarily to be identified; nor does the removal of the one as a matter of course imply the simultaneous removal of the other. But when both are gone, the season of Antichrist's revelation will assuredly have arrived; for when it is said, in the eighth verse, "Then shall the lawless one be revealed," the Greek word used is tóte, implying immediate sequence of events, as when it is said, in the parable of the Ten Virgins, "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be like ten virgins," etc.

Now the inquiry as to what the restraining thing—the "hindrance," as distinguished from the "hinderer"—may be, is not attended with much difficulty. There can be no reasonable doubt that what St. Paul thus speaks of, though in words of studied ambiguity, is the Roman Empire in its then existing state. This is the general opinion of the early Christian writers. Thus Chrysostom, one of the greatest of the so-called "Fathers," significantly observes, "A man may naturally seek to know what 'that which letteth' is, and after that, what possible reason St. Paul had for putting it so indistinctly. What, then, is 'that which letteth'—i.e., hindereth—him from being revealed? Some say the grace of the Spirit, others the Roman Empire.

"Among the latter I class myself. Why so? Because, had he meant to say 'the Spirit,' he would not have said it indistinctly, but straight out; that now he is restrained by the grace of the Spirit, i.e., the supernatural gifts. Otherwise Antichrist ought to have presented himself ere now, if he were to present himself at the failure of those gifts, for, as a matter of fact, they have long failed. But seeing that he says this of the Roman Empire, he naturally put it enigmatically and very obscurely, for he had no wish to subject himself to unnecessary hostilities and unprofitable perils. For had he said that shortly after the Roman Empire would be dissolved, they would soon have transfixed him for a miscreant, and all the believers with him, as living and fighting for this end."

This interpretation of the "hindrance" is adopted by Mr. Grattan Guinness, in his "Approaching End of the Age." He remarks, "The very earliest traditions tell us that the 'hindrance' was as then existing, and that Paul, having previously, by word of mouth, made known that fact to the Church, avoided from prudential reasons more explicit reference to it in this written communication. He did not wish to expose the persecuted Christians to fresh dangers, by putting into the hands of their enemies proof of what would by them have been considered a seditious creed.

"Tradition is often an unsafe guide, but in this case it seems peculiarly entitled to respect. The point was both an important and a simple one. Those who received the information from the Apostle were not likely to forget it, and could scarcely err in repeating it, and from no other source than tradition could the Church of later ages learn a fact communicated by word of mouth only, and purposely omitted from the inspired letter of the Apostle. We may, therefore, be thankful that the tradition as to what this hindrance was is of a very early date, is explicit, and agrees with what we learn from other Scriptures; as well as that there is no counter-tradition on the point.*

"From Irenæus, the disciple of Polycarp, the contemporary of St. John, we first hear that the hindrance mentioned by Paul, when he was with the Thessalonians, and alluded to in his Second Epistle, was the Roman Empire, and from him downwards the Fathers are unanimous in this assertion. Paul says to the early Church, 'ye know;' the early Church (though not the identical generation) tell us what they knew, and who are we, that we should say they are mistaken?" (pp. 164, 5).

But even accepting the correctness of this view, as we seem almost constrained to do, the question remains—and it is a very important one—in what relation does the "hinderer," of verse 7, stand to the "hindrance," of verse 6? On this point, curiously enough, Mr. Guinness says nothing; he does not even seem to recognize the distinctness of the two. Yet it is with the removal of the "hinderer" that Paul immediately connects the revelation of the Antichrist. Interpreters of the historical school generally, as they regard the Roman Empire as the "hindrance," so do they regard the Roman Emperor as the hinderer; and this is no doubt Mr. Guinness's opinion, though he does not say so. But here a very serious difficulty presents itself. If we are to regard the Man of sin, or lawless one—in other words, the Antichrist—as an individual man, which in the early Church was an opinion quite as universal as that the "hindrance" was the Roman Empire, we must either suppose him to be some particular emperor or some personality altogether distinct from the Roman Empire.

Now the former supposition is clearly inadmissible. With the submission of Romulus Augustulus to Odoacer the Goth, at Ravenna, the long line of the Roman emperors came to an end in A.D. 476; and though the Eastern or Byzantine Empire survived for nearly a thousand years, it, too, fell before the attacks of the Ottomans in A.D. 1453; the last of the Cæsars, as Gibbon expresses it, being "buried under a mountain of slain."

Even if it be maintained that in some sort "down to the memorable year 1804," when the Emperor Francis I. resigned the title of Emperor of Germany, and the holy Roman Empire came to an end, "the world has never been without an emperor of the Romans;" still, since this latest possible date nearly eighty years have passed away, and the Antichrist has not appeared. Yet there stand the Apostle's words: "He who now restrains (will restrain), until out of the midst he be gone; and then (tóte—immediately) shall the lawless one be revealed."

Perhaps Chrysostom, in the quotation which we have already given, may supply us with the needful clue. Let it be observed that in reply to the question, "What, then, is that which hindereth him from being revealed?" he says, "Some say the grace of the Spirit; others the Roman Empire. Among the latter I class myself. Why so? Because, had he meant to say 'the Spirit,' he would not have said it indistinctly, but straight out; that now he is restrained by the grace of the Spirit, i.e., the supernatural gifts."

Is it asked how it will be known on earth when the rapture of the waiting saints has taken place? Our answer is, How is it known that a thief has been in our house, save by the loss of that which he has carried away? How was it known that Enoch was translated, save by the fact that he was not to be found any longer upon earth? How was it known that Elijah had ascended to heaven in his chariot of fire, save that the fifty men of the sons of the prophets, after their three days' search for him among the mountains, "found him not" (2 Kings 2 : 16, 17)?

Even so shall it be at the day when the returning Lord shall receive His waiting ones to Himself. "For as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it also be in the days of the Son of Man." And when the translated saints are thus removed, the world will have lost its preserving salt; and against a sky black with coming judgment shall be revealed in lurid splendor the form of that lawless one, who, by his great signs and wonders, would, if it were possible, deceive the very elect.

* Those who shall share in the first translation of the wise virgins will, of course, not be on earth to observe any such signs—their removal will be a sign to the world.

* This statement is hardly correct; see the above quotation from Chrysostom.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Marshall Sups at the Saloon—His Wife's Death—His Little Daughter's Plea—Good-By to the Saloon—Job's Wife Visits Him—Invited to the Coffee Room—Hal Signs the Pledge—Pictures out of Beer—Mrs. Clemence and the Boys.

THE saloon-keeper's wife, on hearing Marshall confess he was hungry, produced a long piece of sausage on a tin plate, and two crusts of bread, with a foaming pot of porter. As she presented it she winked to Sally Ann, the barmaid. That wink meant—

"I think we've cotched him this time!" She meant, that this good action would do their custom "a world of good," and that he would always feel under an obligation to "The Spread Eagle."

When Marshall came home the next evening, his wife lay on the bed, asleep as he thought; but when he looked, and touched her, she was dead! Oh! horror! how he revolted from that cold touch, and shuddered! Yes; shuddered from head to foot. The little child—cold, dirty, hungry, sobbing, little Rosie had wept herself to sleep on the corpse's neck. Sound asleep she was, her little arms tightly locked about all that was left of her mother. It was mother's face, though so altered; mother's hands, though so cold; mother's poor old faded gown. It must be mother, and yet there was no kiss, no sigh, no word, no breath. The child slept there on that cold bosom while she waited for a response.

The father seized the child, pulled apart her tiny hands, wrenched her from her clasp, and lifting her on his arm carried her out of the cottage.

"Where are you going, father?" sobbed the child.

"Be quiet," was the only answer, gruff and harsh.

"Where are you going to take me, father?" she wept and pleaded.

"Where you'll get something nice," was the only answer.

As they went down the street, the father stopped opposite the well-known swinging signboard, and turned to open the glass door.

"I won't go there, father," shrieked the child. "Father, I can't go there!"

"What's the matter?" said the father, as he tried to silence the little curly-headed girl by a heavy blow.

This only redoubled the child's screams, and she cried all the more—

"O father, father, don't take me there! I can't go there!"

The riotous company inside began to collect at the door. Men and women began to crowd around from the street.

"What are you doing to your child?" they said. "You great, heartless brute! Let that child alone, or we'll call for the police."

"What's the matter?" said the father again; "why won't you go in?"

"Oh, mother's not there!" sobbed the little one. "I want to go where mother's gone! O father, take me where mother's gone!"

It was a strange scene! There under the dark sky, beneath the flickering glare of the street lamp, surrounded by a low crowd ready to lynch the man who was no worse than themselves, stood Ferdinand holding in his arms the one treasure left to him here. Her blue eyes, all bathed in tears, were beseeching him to take her where "mother had gone."

A moment's hesitation! a mighty struggle in that inmost heart between the powers of light and the powers of darkness—and then! the fortress yielded. The proud heart gave way; and turning his back once and for ever upon the den of fire that had stripped him—literally stripped him—of all but this little child, he re-trod the narrow street, fed the child as best he could with the dry crusts the cupboard furnished, and then, wrapping her in his coat, he laid her down to sleep, saying all the time—

"Yes, my child! I will try to take you where mother's gone!"

Ferdinand Marshall spent that night kneeling by a broken chair before an empty grate. Death was in the room, but Life was there also. When morning dawned, and the first dim streaks entered the wretched chamber, and Ferdinand knew that it was morning, he knew also that God had visited his soul. There was life out of death for him. His prayer had been answered. He knew now that he might take his child to the land where her mother had gone.

The mother's prayers and teachings had not been lost. She had, doubtless, imparted to her little one a horror of that dark haunt that was fast becoming her father's ruin, and had told her in simple words many times that "mother would soon be gone"—gone away to a holy, beautiful, happy land. The child's passionate love for her mother, and simple repetition of those words, were used as the instrument of that man's salvation. The turning-point of his life dated itself at the moment of his hesitation before the public-house door. The welfare or misery of many a long period turns upon a small pivot. It was so in Ferdinand Marshall's case.

But there were other adjustments of the great machinery of Providence in his history, as in every other page of reclamation. When Job reached his own little home at the dinner hour, on the day after poor Ferdy's trouble, he was full of the news.

"A poor thing's been and died all of herself, when her man was out at his work! I never heard on such a thing! They do tell he never gives her no money nor nothin', and she were all spent. Left a young 'un too, a girl—jist a babby like."

"Well, if I ever!" said Mrs. Job. "All the troubles the people has comes to you, jes' like the birds to a tree. There's nobody but you'd ever come home with a tale like that, and all so sudden too!" she continued, considering the tidings, and sinking down on a chair with her arms wrapped in her apron, which was a favorite attitude of thought with her.

She asked Job several questions, none of which he could answer, except the name of the man. This being of the most practical intent, was the most important. When her good man had taken his dinner, and gone again, she set off in search of the house where the death had taken place. The "house of mourning" was better to her "than the house of feasting." She soon found the little room, dark and cold. All that was needed the true neighbor did with her own hands; never waiting for thanks, never expecting them.

It was a touching sight from that time to see Ferdinand Marshall taking his little child to the Infant School daily, when he had finished his breakfast, on the way back to his work. Job's invitation to him to come to the coffee-room with him, had, until this particular evening, been disregarded, in spite of coaxing and entreaties and promises that "the missus" would "look after the little 'un." Remorse and shyness and shabby clothes had hitherto formed a sufficient obstacle to this enjoyment in his eyes. But to-night, the special ticket, the social cup of tea, and the knowledge that "a whole lot of new ones" were going, overcame his scruples, and he went.

Albert Eldridge was in great force that night, going round the tables with great jugs of tea and plates of cake, talking to the different men, cheering them up, and putting them at their ease by his homely remarks. Bright young fellow he was! the love of God just shining in his face. He had developed immensely since the birth of the coffee-room. In "watering others," his own soul had been refreshed, and his spiritual life invigorated. His nature was a giving-out one. This disposition consecrated was invaluable as an agency in this work.

When all were satisfied with their meal, they moved their seats into more easy positions, and the meeting began.

There were sweet, touching melodies sung in two or three parts by a few volunteer friends; some temperance songs given by a small choir that Lady Isabel had formed out of the weekly gathering of temperance men, and a number of recitations. Both songs and recitations were varied in character, sometimes comic, sometimes pathetic, appealing. A short passage of Scripture was read, and a few very earnest, entreating words spoken to the men on the subject of total abstinence.

And they rose to sing, "Oh! what are you going to do, brother?"—that most touching, decision-question, so much sung at one time in America as the watchword of the Young Men's Christian Associations, in some of her large towns.

At the close of this she requested the men to sit down, and then saying, "I want one man to come forward and sign! Will any man present give my little 'army' a start?"—with a bounce into the air of his manly form, that almost startled gentle Lady Isabel, Henry King suddenly stood up, commonly called "Hal."

"I'm your man," he said. "I hain't a werry good fist, not for writin that's to say, but I'll do my best, and put my name till't."

Tremendous clapping was the result of Hal's confessed decision. He swung his way forward to the front, and, stooping over the table, wrote his name. Need we say that when Mr. Hamilton came in five minutes after he found his wife sitting, the centre of a little crowd, all busily signing their names. About twelve signed that night, giving in addresses as well as names. Marshall was one of them.

Hal did a good night's work! Through God's goodness he kept the pledge, and never broke it! and from that hour he was a temperance champion! All might go to him for encouragement and sympathy. He was a true friend to the cause. None could tell you better than he of the ins and outs of that desperate struggle. But a little fighting did the force good. Soon their ranks numbered very largely.

Albert very modestly called himself the "Secretary;" he called Hal, the "King;" and when Loudon said,

"Don't make him vain, Mr. Eldridge!" he would answer, smilingly,

"No fear! Mr. Loudon; he's too great for that. Besides, you know, King is his name!"

Each guest carried away with him a tiny bouquet of the first snowdrops, a picture sheet-almanac, and a little book; while every newly pledged abstainer had his temperance card to be framed and hung upon his wall as a reminder of the resolution of that night.

As the men put on their caps going out at the door into the cold street, Hal laid his hand heavily upon Marshall's shoulder, and said,

"Poor old Ferdy! you and I'll be brothers, won't we?"

To Wobbles, who had stoutly refused the pledge, though he candidly acknowledged, "We've had a fust-rate evening, I say!" Hal said,

"Come it next time, old Wob! won't ye?"

"Good-night, mister," was the laconic reply; "I'll be in again o' Saturday."

Bob Banting talked all the way down the street, about wishing he could sign; "but then, his business—it warn't for him that kind o' look out—no! it warn't."

The brewer was smoking his cigar at home at this very time, perfectly unconscious of the very prominent part he was taking in the battle of to-night—and every night—on the enemy's side!

His wife was writing to ask Lady Isabel and Mr. Hamilton to come and see their new gallery of pictures.

Mr. Hamilton's comment, when the note arrived by the hand of the groom the next day, was,

"I don't like pictures that come out of beer." Lady Isabel wrote a note politely declining.

* * * * * * *

It was a soft, cool evening. You could not call it cold. Compared with the long frosts and sleety rains of mid-winter, the delicious puffs of a first breath of spring air were balmy and health-giving. Enjoyable in the extreme were the early approaches of nature's awakenings; and you would have found their genial influences at a climax in Mrs. Clemence's garden. She revelled in the beauty of her tiny, milk-white snowdrops, with their dark green sheathing of upright leaves.

Two of Mrs. Clemence's nephews were staying in the house, enjoying a few days' respite from the rigors of study, to which, like most of their race, they were duly subjected during a large proportion of the year. Her reverie was interrupted by the bounding, sudden rush of these boys.

"Auntie! there are such lots of dreadful cats about! They eat your little birds, and they come to steal the milk, and they do no end of mischief. Mayn't we try and shoot some of them this afternoon?"

The first answer was an unhesitating refusal. Even the clever reminder, most appositely suggested, that the tame pet robin was likely to have its life endangered by the marauding murderous visits of the intruders, failed in its purpose; and Mrs. Clemence, in her pitying love for every animate and inanimate creature, rejected the terrible proposal of death to the cats!

"Oh! but auntie! they are such hijious creatures, and quite wild," pleaded the youngest boy.

"And, you know, auntie," continued the eldest, "there is one horrible cat, with only one eye, and three legs, and no tail! It's frightful," he added, puckering up his eyebrows, and spreading out his fingers with a look of unmitigated disgust; "it's quite yellow and striped, and has only a bit of one ear!"

"Yes! auntie!" almost shouted the younger boy in his earnestness, "do let us shoot it! it is quite wild.

At last "auntie" yielded! What with the danger to the pet robin and the milk in the dairy, as well as the miserable condition of the "wild cat," she consented that if it came near the house again it might be shot.

THE PRODIGAL SON.

S.S. Lesson for May 8. Luke 15: 11-32. Golden Text ver. 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

In the series of Lessons for the last half of the year 1878, when the subjects for the International Sunday-school Lessons were mostly the same as are given for the present time, we treated the chapter from which last Sunday's lesson, and that for today are taken, as applying to backsliders. The lost sheep had been once in the fold, the lost silver retained the image and superscription of the king, the lost son had been in his father's house. But although this is one side of the teaching contained in it, yet, since the Lord Himself in the seventh and tenth verses applies it to lost sinners, we can do the same.

The younger son is a true type of fallen humanity. Made in the image of God, but that image defaced by sin; made to have dominion over all created things, and especially over his own lusts and passions, and yet degraded to become their slave, such is poor, fallen, lost man. "Yet I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed: how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto Me?" (Jer. 2: 21). The debasement of our natural hearts is beyond all conception, and our blindness to it still more so, until we learn to see things in the light of God. We do not, in our natural state, disallow that God is our Father, that He made us, that it is our duty to obey Him, but we make use of the relationship in order to bring accusations against our God, to dishonor instead of to honor Him. "A son honoreth his father, and a servant his master: if I then be a Father, where is Mine honor? and if I be a Master, where is My fear? saith the Lord of hosts" (Mal. 1: 6).

The younger son in our parable used the relationship in which he stood to his father for no other purpose than to make requirements from him. He did not say, "Father, thou hast done much for me, by what service may I testify my gratitude to thee?" It would seem as though no such thought entered his mind. "Father," he said, "give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." He asked it as a right, not as a favor, he claimed that his father should do a father's part, while he was far from doing a son's part. And thus it is with lost man. If everything goes well with him, he looks upon it as only that which he has a right to expect; if anything goes ill with him he complains that God is not good, that he is being treated hardly, and he does not see the reason why he should suffer more than others, he has done no harm; and thus he claims from God, in his ignorance and pride of heart, exemption from all evil and a share of goods for which he has not labored, as that which falleth to him. And all the time he ignores that if God is a Father, and has a Father's responsibilities, then he himself is a son, and has a son's responsibilities. If he claims protection and sustenance from God as Father, then God has a right to claim trust, honor, and obedience from him as son. Either he must relinquish his claim upon God, or he must acknowledge God's claim upon him. But to this claim most men are utterly blind, and if one had never read the Bible or had any knowledge of God, one would be led to think from what they say that God was extremely culpable and man much to be pitied.

God's Word puts all things in their true place: it says of men, "They are without excuse, because that when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations and their foolish heart was darkened" (Rom. 1: 20, 21). "Neither were thankful." This is God's great charge against unconverted men. They accept at His hands life, mental power, superiority over the beasts which perish, air, food, sunshine, health, and peace, without being thankful, and when deprived for a little time of one of these blessings, instead of grateful wonder that God had granted them for so long a time, they blame Him as though He had withheld from them a right to which they were entitled. The younger son said no word of thanks to his father for all his long and patient love and kindness, for the care he had spent over his nurture and education; in heartless selfishness he demanded the portion of goods which fell to him, a demand with which the father complied, although it was at a loss to himself. The only communication of which we read between the father and the son is unwarrantable demand on the one hand and ready giving on the other; a fit type of the relation between God and the unthankful, unworthy creatures He has made.

When the son came into the possession of his demanded portion, what did he do with it? Did he seek to increase his father's prosperity, and strengthen his hands in his old age? On the contrary, he "gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living." O how true a picture is this of the miserable selfishness of unconverted man; ready to accept all at the hands of God, and then using His grace and gifts to His dishonor! "Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish people and unwise? Is not He thy Father that hath bought thee? hath He not made thee, and established thee?" (Deut. 32: 6). Created to serve a noble purpose, to commune with God, and to take part in His interests, to maintain His honor in His creation, man has sunk to a miserable state of slavery to lust and sin.

It was not long before the unhappy, despicable young man had spent all. Riotous living without any incoming, soon made away with his father's hard-earned gains, and he began to be in want. Many a prodigal runs a similar course. Looking upon God's undeserved gifts as his right, and squandering them upon self gratification, every resource soon fails him, money, credit, friends, reputation, all fail, and he begins to be in want. This is man's moment to oppress, and God's moment to hold out mercy. "He went and joined himself (or hired himself) to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him." Those who had eaten and drank with him in the days of his riotous living, were ashamed to know him now in his degradation, loss and misery; such is the friendship of the world: "The poor is hated even of his own neighbor, but the rich hath many friends" (Prov. 14: 20).

Alone and friendless, the prodigal began to think of his neglected father. He did not seem at first to have been imbued with a sense of his own sin against him. It was his misery which spake when he said, "How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!" This is the first step. God allows prodigals to eat the fruit of their own way until they learn to contrast their lives with those who are in the Father's house. Formerly His service has been distasteful, now they are willing to take the lowest place if only they may find an entrance there. He said, "I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants.'" Now for the first time he felt his responsibility, and saw himself and his father in a true light. Now he claimed nothing as a right, and although a son, he asked to be made a servant.

"And he arose," it was a purpose acted out, "and came to his father." He did not go round and curry favor with some of the servants and ask them to intercede for him, he did not go first to his elder brother, no; he would have it out with his father himself, and wretched, miserable as he was, he made straight for the old home. This is the right way for a sinner, straight to God, no shying, no subterfuge. When a sinner is determined to look his case in the face, and to come face to face with God about it, he is half way saved. Then it is that he discovers the precious truth, "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them" (2 Cor. 5: 19). "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him (for love is very far-sighted), and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son."

O how many would be afraid to receive thus a returning prodigal! They would say, "Let him prove first that he really is penitent, then it will be safe to receive him." But the father saw that the feeble tread was nevertheless not a wavering one, his eye of love could read whether there was reality or deceit in the downcast look, he could detect whether there was the ring of truth in that short but full confession, and the father, who had everything to gain or everything to lose, was satisfied, and took the returning wanderer to his heart. And more; before he had time to entreat his father to put him among the servants, the father said, "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet; and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it, and let us eat and be merry, for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found." What then, is there no reproach, no reprobation? No, for God breaks hearts by love and not by severity. Nothing makes a sinner so keenly feel his sin as the undeserved, unexpected mercy of God.

The elder son, who had had no experience of the bitterness of outward sin, who had never wandered like his brother from the father's house, but had perhaps often denounced his brother and condemned him, could not understand his father's joy at his return. What, the scoundrel who had wasted his property, dishonored his name, disgraced the family, was he then to be received back with the same joy as if he were a credit to them? The elder brother could not understand it, and would not join in the mirth. He thought his father was both lowering himself, and also slighting him. "Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends: but as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf." Just the complaint of those who having lived in religious surroundings, in conscientious service of God, cannot understand how God can give so much of His joy and peace to the worst sinners who come to Him. The father said to him what he could never say to the prodigal, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine." As though to add, "and thy brother hath nothing, let him therefore at least have the consciousness of his father's love with which to begin life afresh."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Death of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield, occurred April 19th, in London. He had rallied to a considerable degree from the worst features of his disease, but a relapse occurred on Monday, and he gradually sank into a state of coma, from which he had only a few intervals of sensibility, and died peacefully about five o'clock the next morning. By his death one of the most remarkable men of this century is removed from the world of politics. He was born in a comparatively obscure position in 1805; his father was a Jew of the noble governing line of the Sephardin, and the boy was admitted into the covenant of Abraham on the eighth day from his birth, according to the Jewish law. He died the leader of the most exclusive of British parties—a party remarkable for its reverence for aristocratic birth and territorial possessions—the ex-premier of Great Britain, and the trusted friend and adviser of the Queen. Such a career as Lord Beaconsfield's has few parallels in history, and is full of interest. A portrait of the deceased statesman, with a sketch of his eventful life, will appear in an early number of The Christian Herald.

Lord Beaconsfield's Successor in the Leadership of the Conservative party in the British Parliament will be designated at a meeting of the party, to be held soon after the funeral. The choice will be one of extreme difficulty. It is notorious that Lord Beaconsfield's tact had kept in the ranks of the Conservative party, many politicians who differ widely from each other on important questions, and unless a skilful leader is chosen to succeed him the party will suffer serious defections. The Marquis of Salisbury, Lord Cairns, and other distinguished statesmen are mentioned for the post, but in each case the name does not command the unanimous confidence of the party as Disraeli's did when the Earl of Derby died. Should an injudicious choice be made, Mr. Gladstone will either receive a large accession of supporters, or a powerful middle party will be formed, composed of Liberal Conservatives like the present Earl of Derby, and aristocratic Liberals such as the Duke of Argyll. The result of the choice may be fraught with momentous results to Great Britain, and the issue of the meeting is anxiously anticipated.

The International Monetary Conference Assembled in Paris April 19th. Fifteen States were represented in the conference. They are Germany, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, the United States, France, England, Greece, Italy, Holland, Portugal, Russia, Sweden, and Switzerland. The English delegate will, it is asserted, attend only to assist in consultation, and will not record a vote except as he may be directed by the Government. The vital question to be considered will be the position silver shall take in the currency of the world, and whether the gold standard of value shall be maintained alone, or a combined standard of both metals shall be established. The commercial prosperity of several nations will be materially affected by the decision arrived at. The representatives of each state will elect one commissioner to form a committee of fifteen.

An Effort to Induce All the European Governments to unite in a movement against conspirators is being made at the instance of Russia. Prince Bismarck does not seem to have yet taken any positive action on the resolution of the Diet in regard to the right of asylum, but it is certain that he will eagerly listen to whatever Russia or any other power may say on the subject. Meanwhile the Socialist law is being applied in Germany with renewed vigilance. Various suspected artisans and others have lately been expelled from Berlin, and scarcely a day passes without the name of some proscribed publication appearing in the Official Gazette.

A Definite Reply to the Combined Note of the European Powers on the difficulty between Turkey and Greece has not been received from the latter Power. It is feared that, in spite of the more hopeful aspect the affair assumed two weeks ago, the details will not be finally arranged without danger of war. The correspondent of the New York World telegraphed on Saturday last: "The situation at Athens was never more serious than at present. There are frequent long Cabinet councils relative to the reply to the collective note. Premier Coumoundouros on Wednesday expressed surprise to the foreign ministers that their note is silent relative to the Epirotes, for whose welfare the Greek note strongly interceded. The ministers replied that they had no instructions from their governments relative to Epirus. As Greece considers it her imperative duty and interest to stand by her enslaved brethren, it is believed that if the choice is between war or the abandonment of their cause, there is little hope for the maintenance of peace." The King of Greece and his Cabinet are inclined to accept the proposals of the Powers, but fear that if they did so the populace would rise in arms and overthrow the Government. It would seem that unless the matter is arranged, the King will have to choose between revolution on the one hand, and war ending in certain defeat on the other.

The Young Czar of Russia Lives in Daily fear of assassination, and extraordinary precautions are taken to insure his safety. His palace is surrounded with six cordons of guards, and no one is allowed to enter who is not personally known to the authorities. In spite of all the precautions taken, the Czar found a Nihilist warning one morning last week in the pocket of his overcoat. Numerous arrests are being made, but the correspondents of foreign journals are forbidden to telegraph any word respecting them.

There is a possibility that the demand of the people for a constitutional government may be met by a tentative concession. The Czar recently presided at a council of ministers, at which the proposition of General Melikoff, confirmed by the late Czar, for convoking a committee of elected representatives for the consideration of state questions was discussed. The result was that nine members of the Council were in favor of the proposal, and five against it. The Emperor then announced that he agreed with the majority, and that the Minister of the Interior would draw up the necessary ukase.

A Convention of the Irish Land League has been convoked to consider the Land Bill. After an exciting discussion a resolution was unanimously carried giving the Irish Parliamentary party full latitude to devise amendments to, and watch the progress of the bill in the House of Commons, and oppose it if they fail to obtain adequate amendments. A resolution was also adopted to summon another convention before the Land Bill passes its third reading, in order to decide whether the bill, as amended, can be accepted. The convention then adjourned. The impression prevails that the real danger to the passage of the bill is to be expected from the land-owners, and that Mr. Parnell and his friends will be glad to accept the bill as an instalment of reform.

The Duchess of Marlborough has just completed arrangements for the entire outfit of fifteen Irish families, who will be provided with free passages to Manitoba, and located there in neatly furnished farmsteads.

The Marquis of Ripon, the Roman Catholic nobleman whom Mr. Gladstone selected to represent Queen Victoria in the great British dependency of India, though he has abstained from any abuse of his authority in favor of his own Church, has certainly been the means of increasing the influence of Popery in that country. At Simla, where the adherents of Rome were very few before his appointment, it is now proposed to celebrate his vice-regal reign by the erection of a Roman Catholic cathedral. This, of course, implies that very considerable progress must have been recently made by the Romish party.

A London Magistrate has Interfered to Prevent religious services being held in variety theatres and other buildings of a like character on Sundays. As a rule, these services have been conducted with appropriate decorum, and have been of essential service in attracting those classes of the people who are not likely to become attendants at either church or chapel. One particular service, conducted in an orderly manner, and attended by a large congregation of respectable persons in the Edgware Road, London, has now been peremptorily closed, and Mr. Charles Cook, who has for four years ministered in the building, has cause to complain of the arbitrary conduct of the magistrates, and the discourteous treatment which he received at the hands of Captain Morley, the chairman, who, when waited upon for an explanation, sent down by a servant the curt reply, "Captain Morley has no answer to give you." The result is that the services have been held in the open air, and on April 3d three thousand persons assembled in Hyde Park, and unanimously adopted a resolution strongly protesting against the action of the magistrates, and calling upon them to rectify the error. The Home Secretary has been appealed to on the subject. The Earl of Shaftesbury has promised to do what he can to help Mr. Cook, and Lord Mayor McArthur has consented to preside at an indignation meeting on the subject.

The Butchers' Annual Festival was Held in Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Metropolitan Tabernacle, on the evening of April 5th, Mr. W. S. Caine, M.P., presiding. The vast edifice was crowded in every part. Much regret was expressed on account of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Spurgeon, from whom a letter was read by his son, Mr. Charles Spurgeon. Mr. Henry Varley delivered a forcible address, in the course of which he mentioned that the gathering was the largest ever held on such an occasion. He urged his audience to abstain from the use of bad language in their every-day work, and from gambling, offering a reward of £5 to any man who would help obtaining the conviction of one of "the skulking thieves called bookmakers," who by means of gambling at the Meat Market extracted their hard-earned money from the men.

A Studious Pitman was among the Victims of the recent explosion at Penygraig, in Great Britain. A missionary visitor called at a house where the blinds were down and the dead body of a father was lying. He found four children inside in great grief. Close to the coffin there was a chest, upon which were laid fifty volumes of good and superior books, and also a few copy-books. Besides a Welsh Bible and Barnes's Commentary he discovered some English books, well thumbed, containing Euclid, books on geometry, astronomy, grammar, and other educational works. "Whose books are these?" said the visitor to the eldest sister. "My brother William's," she replied, bursting into tears. She added, "He is still in the pit unrecovered, and here are his copies," bringing the visitor a pile of copy-books which quite astonished him. In looking over these copies he found that the seventh problem, book 4, in Euclid was the last lesson the poor lad had done before he lost his life. He was only twenty-one years of age, and had never been to school since he was a boy. He had acquired all this knowledge in the higher branches by attending evening classes and by private study during his leisure hours.

IN 1853, one of the New York daily papers, describing the dedication of the Five Points Mission building, wrote as follows: "Let us look back a few years and see what the Old Brewery was. That it was the nest of crime; that the worst passions which deform our common human nature had there their sowing-time and their fruit-season; that young children were there immolated to Moloch, and men and women of ripe years were transplanted thence to bloom upon the gallows, is not half the truth—is but a small portion of it. There were deeds done in the body that will only be revealed in the spirit, when the Book of Accounts shall be opened. The foulest crimes were hatched and fostered, and often developed, there. There was the home of the assassin, the thief, and the prostitute.

"Riot swaggered and drunkenness staggered thence, bent on brawls and brutalities; and up those curious stairs and along those winding passages, through nests of chambers ingeniously contrived to prevent the escape of the victim or elude the search of his friends, has been borne many and many an unhappy wretch, who by his friends was never heard of again, and never will be heard of till the morning of the resurrection. The Old Brewery was, at one time of its history, not excelled by any haunt in London or Paris, as the lazar-house and infectious centre of crime.

"It is gone: it is now a matter of history. Where it stood, a church has been erected, with a house for the preacher, school-rooms for the ignorant, bath-rooms for the dirty, and tenements—clean, wholesome, and inviting—for the homeless. Such a change has been effected by a few earnest, pious ladies, who have succeeded the apostles, who teach Christianity not by words only, but by deeds; who think it not enough to counsel the erring to sin no more, but who take them by the hand and lead them to the pleasant places."

The passage we have quoted gives

A GREAT FACT WELL DESCRIBED.

One of the ladies whom the writer commends so forcibly was Mrs. Julia M Olin, whose sudden death was mourned in New York toward the close of spring, 1879. So modest and retiring was that lady while she lived, that now, when she is dead, only few and scant materials are available for a biography of her "who was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did" (Acts 9: 36).

She was born on the 10th of December, 1814, in the city of New York, where she passed her childhood, and where she resided during the greater part of her maiden and her widowed life. Her father was Judge James Lynch, and her mother Janet M. Tillotson, granddaughter of Judge Robert Livingston. The family being members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Mrs. Olin was confirmed, at the age of sixteen, by Dr. Anthon, in St. Stephen's Church in West Forty-Sixth Street; and she afterward joined Ascension Church, under the rectorship of the Rev. Manton Eastburn, who afterward became Bishop Eastburn. She is said to have shown, in those early years, a lofty conscientiousness, being habitually true to her convictions of the law of God, and carefully keeping on the safe side in regard to doubtful practices of fashionable society. She took the safe ground of the Psalmist: "I have refrained my feet from every evil way, that I might keep Thy word" (Ps. 119: 101).

Mrs. Olin's Christian activity began at Rhinebeck, N. Y., on the uplands of the Hudson, where her grandfather, Thomas Tillotson, had invited Freeborn Garrettson, the pioneer minister of a hundred years ago, to open Methodist preaching there. When she was eleven years of age the same relative presented her with a piece of land picturesquely situated in an extensive grove; and on that site her father, in 1837, built the house and laid out the grounds which afterward became widely known as "Glenburn," Mrs. Olin's summer residence during many of the later and most useful years of her life.

While still a young lady Mrs. Olin opened a Sunday-school at Glenburn, and patiently and indefatigably collected children from the country round about, and taught them summer after summer till, in her twenty-ninth year, she became the second wife of president of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn. Then the work of the Sunday-school was taken up and carried on by her sister, Mrs. Dr. Montgomery, till 1854, when the death of her husband sent Mrs. Olin back to the home and associations of her youth.

The eight years of Mrs. Olin's married life were a time of happy service in the kingdom of Christ. Dr. A. S. Hunt, who had the privilege of intimate acquaintance with Mrs. Olin for thirty years, said at her memorial service: "Sunshine filled their home. Her influence, too, was very decided beyond the domestic circle. Assuming nothing because of her position, she moved among her associates of the college circle with quiet grace and with magnetic sway. Her bearing, too, toward the students was very winning. I can never forget the welcome she gave me to her home, and I am sure I can speak for scores of young men in most grateful recognition of her kindness to them in their college days."

Especially it may be remarked that in Dr. Olin she had a husband full of heavenly zeal, who incited her to work for her Saviour, and to seek out opportunities to redeem the interval allowed for gathering sheaves in the Lord's harvest. He wrote to her from the South in 1845: "Seek, I pray you, to be wholly consecrated. . . . Cast about you during my absence to see if there may not be some way of doing good that we have not tried."

From the time of her bereavement till her death she lived in steady industry and activity, confined by her increasing engagements to New York and Glenburn. That monotony—if such a term can be applied to a course of absorbing interest—was broken by a sojourn in Europe in 1867 and 1868; which, however, was not her first visit to the Old World, for she had accompanied her husband thither in 1846.

The Sunday-school at Rhinebeck grew in importance, and led to general mission operations in that locality, and eventually "Hillside Chapel" was projected and built, being opened in June, 1855, by the Rev. Dr. Reid, Missionary Secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Church; for after her husband's death Mrs. Olin continued to identify herself with the denomination of which he had been so prominent a member. Dr. Hunt, who has already been mentioned, was the first pastor of the little mountain church, and his words with reference to the deceased lady are: "Her very name will be a benediction at Hillside for long years to come." The Rev. E. B. Otheman, another of her cherished friends, has written of the opening of the chapel: "A powerful revival soon prevailed, and ever since a continued influence for good, especially in the instruction and conversion of the young, has embraced the surrounding region."

Hillside Chapel is picturesquely situated over against Riverside Chapel, which was built by Mrs. Olin's cousin and dear friend, Miss Mary R. Garrettson, at Wildercliffe, on the bank of the beautiful river upon which Rhinebeck looks down. This Miss Garrettson preceded Mrs. Olin to heaven by barely two months, and was herself mourned by a large circle of Christian friends. She was a daughter of the famous preacher of the same name, and died in her eighty-sixth year. Although quite blind in her later years, she labored with indefatigable zeal in the cause of the Gospel.

Mrs. Olin's permanent residence in New York began in 1852, soon after the death of her husband, when she united with the Mulberry Street Methodist Episcopal Church; and when that organization was merged in the St. Paul's M. E. Church in 1858, and the magnificent edifice was erected which stands at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-Second Street, she became a member of the new church, and held various important positions of usefulness therein up to the time of her decease.

The members of the Quarterly Conference of the Church recorded a minute in her memory, in which they said: "Mrs. Olin was especially endeared to us by those amiable and social qualities which adorned her character; by those gifts of grace and culture which made her benevolent work and her self-denying life so useful; by that purity of motive and that devotedness to the cause of the Master, which make the memories of her so fragrant; and by that humble and hopeful and consistent walk and conversation which ever testified that she had been with Jesus and learned of Him."

In the Sunday-school this lady was a power for good, "feeling the pressure of responsibility so greatly that it is to be feared that her strength was overtaxed by her incessant labors." Her connection with the school began at Mulberry Street in 1857, when she became the leader of a young ladies' band and the teacher of the Bible class. When she died she had a class of more than forty members, although when it was organized the number was only three. "Her careful study brought out fresh views of the Word, her gentle manner and unassuming methods of statement fixed them in the minds of her scholars, and her devout trust in God and manifest experience of His promises made an impression of reality. Others might have views and opinions of truth; Mrs. Olin, they thought, knew all about what she taught."

Mrs. Olin was active and earnest in the cause of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and was president of the New York branch of the society from its origin in 1869. About two years before her life closed she invited the young ladies of St. Paul's Church to her house, and having kindled their love and zeal with the overflow of her kindness, she induced them to organize a Young Ladies' Auxiliary Society.

OUTSIDE OF ST. PAUL'S

Church Mrs. Olin was actively identified with the New York Female Bible Society, and was its Corresponding Secretary for twenty-five years. The Secretary of the American Bible Society, to which the other is auxiliary, remarked at her funeral: "The reports which she prepared form a very remarkable series of public documents. I do not know anything in their line to be compared with them for their interesting presentation of facts." The last of those reports, which was in the press when the gifted writer laid down her pen forever, contained the following beautiful sentiment:

"This society is writing its history in the life of New York. We have not light enough to read it now. Its records are not always legible, and our eyes are dim—not able to see the lines which may be plainly read by angels with clear vision and serene brows. Some day we shall no longer see through a glass darkly, but, face to face, meet those who have been redeemed through the prayers and labors of this society. So may we enter hopefully upon the labors of another year; and while our Bible women are toiling through the heated streets, and meeting the old poverty in its changed conditions, may our prayers not be wanting for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, which can give pathos and power to the story of the Cross, taking captive the hearts and subduing the unruly wills of sinful men."

But the glory of Mrs. Olin's life's labor was in her twenty-six years' connection with the New York Ladies' Home Missionary Society, more generally known as the

the operation of which is vividly sketched in the quotation that introduces the subject of this article. Her interest in that Mission increased to the end of her days, and her last work with the pen was the preparation of its Annual Report, which was written in fragments on detached slips of paper, and had to be put together and copied out by other hands when her own were closed in her last sleep. The work of Mrs. Olin, and of her like-minded lady associates, in transforming the most dreadful and horrible locality of New York City, will not bear description. It must be illustrated.

third cousin, "Jane of the Park," because when I admired wild flowers she laughed at me, and thought the principal use of butter-cups and daisies was to color butter and cheese. Amid the grinning, grub-eating gins of Baroo I thought of her as of a form of queenly refinement. I thought it odd I did not marry her and settle down on a patch of the "green sod." It was really odd now how the sight of an ordinary white woman, not to say lady, awoke feelings of romantic admiration, as if she moved in all the lines and hues of beauty. But it was odd one saw such a sight so seldom, except one went forty miles to church in Bathurst, where the sights were to me, alas, as interesting as the sermons. But it is odd I am not coming to the end of these oddnesses.

Well, to be more historic and minute about Baroo. The station was formed many years ago by an old government man, who had been assigned to "old Iron Bark Lawson." His name was Davy M'A——. He was Mr. Lawson's shepherd; and a right trusty one was he. One morning as Davy was going by sunrise to look after sheep, he saw something blazing on the ground about a hundred yards off. He thought it a live coal some one had dropped. But who should drop it there? and, lo! why does it get brighter and not smoke? Davy lifted up a precious stone—I think a ruby—of almost fabulous worth.

He showed it to Mr. Lawson, who took it to a jeweler in Sydney. Report has it that Mr. Lawson said, "Davy, I'll keep that thing you found; and on the day you're free, I'll give you a hundred maiden ewes, fifty three-year old heifers, and a brood mare." Davy fell on his knees overpowered, and thanked his benefactor. His "ignorance was bliss;" for, had he known the value of his gem, he would probably have melted it in rum less delicately than Cleopatra did her pearl. Mr. Lawson kept his word, and set Davy up on Baroo Narang—which he found and formed for himself—as a free man. He lived a wizened old bachelor, and died an old miser; and friends he never acknowledged divided his spoils. A Sydney lawyer was the flesher that quartered the carcase of the miser's fortune for the young eagles who gathered to the spoil at Baroo.

Ash and Alder heard of the intended sale; and they engaged Lock to survey the stock and station—huts, yards, and all—and buy all, if possible, by private contract. There was no man in the colony could do this better than Lock. He bought the concern three hundred pounds, I should say, under its real value. When Ash saw the purchase and papers he could hardly believe his eyes; and, in gratitude and self-interest, took Lock into partnership, giving him legal security of drawing one-fifth of all—principal and profits—on dissolution of partnership.

AN UNDERDRAIN.

By Miss Sarah Smiley.

WHILE my garden rejoices in all these blessings—rain and showers and dews—still, such is the excessive heat and dryness of this climate, that without one more gift it would often be desolate. But, as I have said before, the very centre of my little domain is "a spring of water whose waters fail not." This it is that makes glad my garden. And now I must, at last, redeem my promise to give its little history.

In accepting this location as my future home, the one pressing necessity to be met, first of all, was the supply of water; and some friends came over with me, to discuss the matter. The valley below me was full of its healing springs, and other springs of pure water gushed all along the hillside; but from this one spot, so far beyond the others in all else, the gift of water seemed strangely withheld. So we stood rather sadly in the little hollow, yonder, looking at the bracken and rushes at our feet.

"This is, at least, a damp spot," I said; "why may there not be a spring below the surface?"

My good friend smiled a little as he answered, "Because if it could be there at all it would be there already. The soil is so sandy that there is nothing to hinder it from springing up."

To this wisdom I could make no answer; but just then his little boy, who had come with a garden-trowel in his hand, stooped to dig up a pretty fern, and as our eyes followed his work we saw, as the roots were lifted, bright drops of sparkling water bubbling up. "A good omen at least," I urged; "if a little springs up, why not more?" So a man was soon set to work. A space was excavated; the water rushed in and filled it, and when allowed to settle it was perfectly clear and pure. But it failed to overflow, and therefore it was not yet a spring. Again he dug deeper, but with the same result. It was clear, and full to the brim, but after a long waiting there was no more. There was plainly some mystery about the matter, and one after another those who were counted wise in such matters came to examine it, but could give no explanation. Still my instructions were, "Dig deeper." This had gone on for some days, the wonder constantly increasing how there should be so much water, and no more, when, as I stood watching the workman, he gave a sudden shout,

"Ah, lady, I've got it!"

"Got what?" I asked.

"An old underdrain," he answered, as he went on to explain how, in the first settlement of the country, a very rude but effectual underdrain was often made by laying the trunks or branches of trees in a trench, and then covering them with earth. Such a one had been laid here, it was plain, from a once copious spring; but now, as soon as the axe had done its work and the tree was removed, it ceased to steal away this treasure of waters and to carry them along this hidden pathway to the broad stream in the valley. And now up gushed at once the living waters, and overflowed, and overflowed, as though they would sweep all before them. It has flowed ever since, and so abundantly that it could quench the thirst of thousands daily. It meets all the needs of my home and all the needs of my flowers; and when it has fed the little fountain below, and performed all its manifold services, there is still the half of it to flow away.

I always associate this deep spring with that promise of our Lord, "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life." Yet, in reality, how few know either the fulness or the overflow! How few can call the gift of the Spirit to their souls a well for depth and a fountain for freshness! How few can claim in their inner life the spontaneity and the unwearied energy of a fountain.

It is not every home that has an unfailing spring. The majority of the country-folk are well content with pumps; and it is the pump rather than the fountain that may best represent the activity of a multitude of Christian workers. We all know the law of a pump—that it is simply a stroke and a stream, another stroke and another stream; and then, when you stop, it stops. In like manner we see all around us effort, effort, with blessing following, but short-lived blessing; then redoubled effort, till the laborers grow weary. And yet a pump is a good thing. I am only saying that a fountain is far better.

I have, however, a most vivid recollection of an old pump, familiar to my childhood, that had a sad trick of running down. How often have I stood looking on as the vain attempt was made to raise it! Up and down the strong hands would ply the handle, swifter and swifter, till the sign of utter impatience would be heard. And then, as a last resource, some water would be brought from another well with which to start it; but still, as soon as it was left to itself, down it would go, and the same process have to be renewed. Is the antitype far to seek? The soul that has lost all its own power, and that can only borrow a brief stimulus from some other full soul, and then sink back into its own emptiness—there is something utterly wrong about it all. Such lives are not according to the purpose and provision of our Lord.

The old prophets were full of the thought of spiritual spontaneity. The first Psalm is alive with it: the tree is planted by the rivers of water, and that secures its growth and fruitfulness. But nowadays Christians seem ever sinking into a stupor, from which they try to rouse themselves by galvanic shocks. Only a second-class work can ever be the result. The first great need of a servant of Christ is an inner and impelling power, like a fountain springing up. Human energies are full of restless effort; the Spirit of God is full of quiet power. We can never find anything that will supply its place in the Word of God.

And why is it, we all ask sorrowfully, that we see so little of His power? We know that, as truly as we are Christ's, we have the Spirit of God—that He does dwell already in each believing heart. There can be no staying of the hand of God in pouring out abundantly this His best gift. Into every spirit renewed from above the living waters surely come. But, alas, for all our underdrains, that will not let them gush and flow! Some other affection, or interest, or pursuit enters into the life, and the stream disappears. It matters very little what it is, so it be anything coming between us and our devotion to our Lord. I cannot tell whether that tree, which for a hundred years had caused one spring less to be numbered along the hillside, were oak or pine. It matters not; it was an underdrain.

And ask me not to say whether this or that pleasure or pursuit be wrong; but let us ask ourselves, rather, "Does it at all withdraw my heart from God?" A little thing or a great, an evil thing or a good, may alike prove the hindrance. We cannot at once live unto ourselves and unto Him who died for us. And what is there so good that it is worth the loss of the living waters gushing in our hearts and overflowing—that can for a moment be worth a full and overflowing and abiding love and joy and peace? God give us all the grace to go down below the surface of our lives, till somewhere in its hidden depths we find our hindrance, and thrust it away forever; and so may He fulfil to each of us His gracious promise, "Thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water whose waters fail not."

The Returned Convict.—At an Open-air Meeting in Stevenson's Square, Manchester, England, one Sunday afternoon, there was among the crowd a forlorn, desolate-looking creature, without a coat on his back, with his wife and child near him, passing through the city on tramp. He was evidently impressed by the address, and was passing out weeping, when a kind friend said to him, "You have found it good to be here." His reply was, "I have found there is a Saviour for me. Salvation for a wicked wretch like me! Oh, what a wretch I have been! I am a returned convict, having been everything that is bad. Oh, how vile I have been! What a villain to my poor wife and child! and I have found there is salvation even for me." The friend assured him that there was indeed salvation for him. Some time after, one of the young men who addressed the meeting was passing along Swan Street, when he was saluted by a respectable-looking man with his wife. "You don't remember me, sir?" "No, sir," was the answer, "I do not." "I am the poor returned convict who was led to the Saviour through your instrumentality. I am now, by the blessing of God, filling a responsible situation." He is now not only doing well in temporal matters, but is seeking opportunities to bring others to Christ.

A Beautiful Envelope.—A Poor London Servant-girl, who had attended the ragged schools and received spiritual as well as mental benefit from them, one evening, at the close of the school, put into the minister's hand, much to his surprise, a short note which contained a half-sovereign. Her entire wages were only eight pounds a year. She offered this as a thanksgiving tribute to God for the blessings received from the schools, very modestly remarking that it was not much. "But, sir," she added, "I have wrapped it up with an earnest prayer and many tears." Here is, indeed, a most rare and beautiful envelope. Would that our offerings, as we lay them upon God's altar, were more generally inclosed in such golden envelopes. "An earnest prayer and many tears." "Assuredly she shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," for she did "what she could" (Luke 14:14; Mark 14:8).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Caucus of Republican Senators Held on Wednesday, April 27, is an evidence that the deadlock is becoming as wearisome to them as it has long been to the general public. Whether the lengthy discussion which took place will tend to the advancement of national business is doubtful. The division in the Republican party seems as wide and as difficult to bridge over as that between the Republicans and the Democrats. The appointment by the caucus of a committee to arrange a programme for an executive session indicates that an attempt at arbitration is being made and may issue in the consideration of the Chinese Treaty and of the uncontested nominations. On the subject of the Robertson nomination no progress has been made toward bringing the administration and the Stalwart wing of the Republican party into accord. Five members of the caucus committee waited on the President on Friday, and in the course of a conversation with him suggested the withdrawal of Judge Robertson's name in order to promote harmony in the party, and intimated that if such a concession were made, the other nominations might be confirmed. It is understood that the President said with emphasis that no such proposition could be entertained. Should an executive session be arranged, as matters now stand, it is expected that a determined opposition to the nominations of Robertson, Chandler, and Matthews will be waged by Senator Conkling and his friends. Among the propositions discussed is that of a basis of agreement as to all future nominations. It is that nominations to office shall be submitted to the two senators of the State to which the office belongs and that their decision as to its propriety shall be supported by other senators.

The Police Commissioners of New York were indicted by the Grand Jury on April 30th for their negligence in the matter of the dangerous condition of the streets. The indictment was handed in on April 30th, and sets forth that the commissioners were "fully authorized and enjoined by law to clean and to keep clean the streets, avenues, piers and heads of slips of the city, and that they had sufficient moneys and appliances to enable them to do the work. But that those places were very unclean, dirty, and filthy, and were choked and obstructed by great quantities of mud, dirt, filth, mire, slush, stagnant water, garbage, ashes, sweepings, refuse, decaying vegetable and animal substances, and divers other unclean and noxious matters, whereby the streets and avenues named were rendered inconvenient and unsafe for the people. It is next charged that the commissioners well knew, and had notice of, the dirty condition of the city, and that they wilfully, unlawfully, and contemptuously neglected, omitted, and refused to perform their duty from March 12th to April 30th, 1881." The district attorney said that he should cause the commissioners to be informed of their indictment and should demand their presence in court.

How far the action of the Grand Jury will tend to the improvement of the streets is not clear, but the danger of allowing them to remain dirty admits of no doubt. The number of deaths which have occurred in the city during the first four months of this year is 12,420, being 3154 more than occurred during the corresponding period of last year. The most serious aspect of these figures is that the deaths arising from the impure atmosphere and similar causes have been this year 3145, that being an increase over the figures of 1880 of 1244.

The Excitement Produced by the Enforced resignation of Second Assistant Postmaster Brady continues. The Postmaster-General is proceeding with his investigation of the Star Route contracts, and it seems probable that if he is sincere in his determination to make the department thoroughly clean several other resignations or dismissals will occur. Chief Clerk French, of the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, has been dismissed. So far as can be learned no allegations of dishonesty are made against him. He was filling a responsible position in the office of General Brady, and it is held, must have known of the irregularities of his chief. He has never taken any steps to make known to the Postmaster-General or the President that improper practices were going on in the office, and for this reason he was dismissed. Mr. James assumes the entire responsibility for everything that has been done in connection with the investigation, and does not—as has been asserted—seek to put it upon the shoulders of the President, on the one hand, or of the special agents on the other. There is, nevertheless, evidence that Mr. James has the unqualified approval of the President in what he has done.

The Floods in the West are, According to Recent telegrams, subsiding. A dispatch from Kansas City, Mo., dated April 30th, says: "The waters have made no further encroachment upon the city. There is a great deal of suffering among the six or seven thousand people who have been driven from their homes. Business with the East is almost entirely suspended. A man was killed by a government steamer crashing into a house on the balcony of which he was standing." Another dispatch of the same date from Atchison, Kansas, says: "The river has fallen about three inches since last night. The Champion learns that the village of Oak Mills, in the lower part of this country, has been almost destroyed by the flood, seven buildings having been washed away. At Iowa Point the water is up to the windows of the station. At Burr Oak Bottom, northeast of Troy, the water reaches to the eaves of many houses."

The Revised English New Testament will, it is definitely announced, be issued to the public on the 17th of May. We are sorry that a good many excellent people have a prejudice against this revised translation. They imagine that any interference with the old translation, which our fathers have reverenced from generation to generation, implies tampering with our religion. But these good people may rest assured that the improvements will be in the words, not in the doctrines of the English Bible.

The present version was made two hundred and seventy years ago. Since that time many additional manuscripts of the original Hebrew and Greek Scriptures have been discovered in the ancient archives of Europe, while the knowledge of biblical antiquities has vastly increased. So it is possible now to have a version which, although not materially different from the one in use, will be more accurate in little particulars, and a great deal more intelligible in passages like Luke 16 : 9. Infidels and other enemies of the Gospel have sneered at the Bible because in our version the same Hebrew or Greek word is sometimes translated in two ways in different places, although the two ways really mean the same thing; but in the revised version that ground of fault-finding will be removed as far as possible. One providential result of the revision will be that the New Testament will be read this year as it was never read before. People who have not opened a Bible for many years except in church will buy and read the revised version.

It should be well understood that the Revision Committee will not sell any copies, and will be responsible only for the copies printed at the Oxford University press. The copies sold by booksellers in this country will be of three classes: Oxford copies imported from England; copies printed here from Oxford plates; and reprints of the Oxford edition from type set up in this country. The revision of the Old Testament will not be completed for some years.

The Ohio State Christian Temperance Union has issued a circular calling a convention at Columbus on May 20th and 21st. The Ohio Anti-Liquor Alliance has also issued a call for a convention to be held here on May 18th and 19th. The object of these two prominent temperance organizations in holding conventions so near the same time is to bring together as many as possible of the temperance people of the State, and to organize an independent movement which will give them as much strength as possible in the next general assembly and agree upon a platform of principles. If their platform is indorsed by either political party at the conventions which will be held later, or if candidates of known temperance principles are nominated, they propose to throw the whole temperance influence in support of that party. If neither party presents suitable candidates, they propose later to call a convention and nominate a candidate of their own. The indications are that this movement will be of a more formidable character politically than temperance movements have been heretofore.

A Fatal Ferry-Boat Disaster Occurred at Elgin, Ill., on Thursday, April 28th. The bridge connecting the east and west sides of the city having been carried away by a freshet, a scow was used to transport children to and from school, and operatives to and from factories. The scow was rigged to a wire cable and appears to have been a wretchedly inadequate affair, so dilapidated that it was half full of water before it had completed its first trip. On Thursday morning, when overloaded and sunk nearly to its edges in the whirling stream, still swollen by brooks and flooded meadows, the scow yielded to a strong wave, and with its living freight of thirty men and children was overturned in mid-stream, and the passengers were instantly precipitated into the mad current and carried down the river uttering piercing shrieks. The crowd on the bank who witnessed the horrible sight set about rescuing those who kept their heads above water. Some daring acts of bravery occurred in this effort, and sixteen persons were picked up and drawn ashore by means of ropes. Of the other passengers, four are known to have been drowned, and the other ten, whose fate is unknown, having been carried down the river it is feared must also have perished.

An Interesting Fact in Connection with the increased business activity of the South is reported. A box of oranges was recently sent to the English market as an experiment, from Jacksonville, Fla., and although the voyage occupied three weeks the oranges arrived in good condition in London, and were pronounced to be much finer in quality than those from Spain and Portugal, to which the English are accustomed. All sections of the country will rejoice if this experiment is followed up by an increased export trade in Southern products with European countries, resulting in an accession of wealth to the Southern States.

Failing Health has Led to the Resignation of Dr. Stuart Robinson, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Louisville, Ky. He went to that city in 1858 from the Danville Seminary. During the war he was strongly in sympathy with his native State, Virginia, but took the ground that as a minister of Christ he should have no part in Cæsar's quarrels. He did not, however, refrain from service in the war, but the part he took is well remembered by men who fought under both flags, for he ministered in spiritual things to Confederate as readily as to Union soldiers.

The Jury in the Trial of the Two Steamboat inspectors, indicted at New York for manslaughter in connection with the burning of the Seawanhaka, June 28th, 1880, were unable to agree upon a verdict, and were discharged, after being locked up thirty-two hours.

Mr. George C. Needham, the Eminent Evangelist, who has during the past two years been settled as pastor of the church at Chicago over which Mr. Moody formerly presided, is about to resume evangelistic labors. He believes that the work has been so developed and systematized there that he can now leave it in other hands. He will probably spend the next twelve months in the Southern States. In the services he proposes to hold, Mr. Needham will aim specially to educate young men in Bible study, and thus help to train others for Bible work.

An Englishman Residing in New York Met his death under deplorable circumstances in the Fifteenth Ward Hotel last week. He went to bed intoxicated and insisted on smoking after he had lain down. During the night the boarder who slept in the room underneath was awakened by burning pieces of wood falling around him from the ceiling. He gave an alarm, and the Englishman's room was entered, when it was found to be on fire from end to end, the lighted cigar having set fire to the bed clothing and thence to the room. The drunken man was burned into an undistinguishable mass. The daily journals teem with warnings of the dangers of indulgence in intoxicating liquor yet the traffic goes on unchecked.

An Extraordinary Escape From Death is related in the Kansas City (Mo.) Times. It appears that, on April 27th, a stone contractor was walking along the Missouri Pacific track, just below the gas works, when a freight train approached unnoticed from the rear. The pedestrian's attention was attracted by a passenger train passing on the Chicago and Alton track at the same time, and he failed to hear the approach of the first train. The engine struck him, throwing him violently in the air and off the track. He was badly hurt, but after a time was able to crawl to the city, where his wounds were dressed. It is hoped that he will recover from the shock. Such an event is typical of some moral experiences. Young men who settle in great cities often get into bad company and tread a dangerous path. Happy are they if the catastrophe God sometimes permits to overtake them "throws them off the track," and yet leaves them space for repentance and regeneration through Jesus (Deut. 4 : 30-31).

Ex-President Hayes Explains in a Letter to a contemporary the motives which led him to exclude intoxicating liquors from the White House during his term of office. He says :

"When I became President I was fully convinced that, whatever might be the case in other countries and with other people, in our climate and with the excitable nervous temperament of our people, the habitual use of intoxicating drinks was not safe. I regarded the danger of the habit as especially great in political and official life. It seemed to me that to exclude liquors from the White House would be wise and useful as an example, and would be approved by good people generally." That the ex-President was correct in his impression of the usefulness of the course he adopted has been proved by many testimonies, and not least by the decrease in the quantity of liquor sold in Washington during his term.

A Fatal Fire Occurred at Greenpoint, L. I., on Tuesday, April 26th. As the men in a large box factory there were eating their dinner they noticed smoke issuing from the elevator shaft, and on examination it was found that the building was on fire. A general stampede ensued ; the men on the top floors jumped from the windows on to a shed beneath, many of them being injured in the fall. The engines were telegraphed for, but by the time they arrived the fire had obtained such a hold of the building and the inflammable stores accumulated there that it was impossible to save it. Three lives were lost in the fire ; in one case the circumstances were very melancholy. The previous day had been pay day at the factory, and some of the men had spent the evening in dissipation. One of them had been drinking again on Tuesday morning and was so inebriated when he came to his work that he lay down in one of the rooms on some shavings and went to sleep. He was forgotten in the panic and was burned to death.

An inspector who investigated the scene of the disaster expressed his belief that the conflagration originated in the sawdust house. The sawdust accumulated there had evidently got damp, in consequence of which a combustible gas had been formed, which only needed a little extra heat to ignite it. He thought it possible that the fire might have been smouldering in the sawdust for a week or two before it was discovered. The thought of so many men working on day after day unsuspiciously while the elements of the catastrophe were quietly gathering force, reminds us of that last conflagration when the world will be similarly panic-stricken.

An Insane Woman Displayed a Strange Antipathy to food at Middletown, N. Y., from the time of her seizure until a few days ago. In the fall of 1879, when she was committed to the asylum, she developed a melancholy mood, and during the entire period she has been there she has not spoken a word to a person or partaken of a mouthful of food. In the meantime the officials have kept her alive by injecting into her stomach liquid food in the shape of soup, beef tea, oatmeal, etc. On Wednesday, April 13th, she surprised the officials by suddenly sitting up in bed and exclaiming, "Give me something to eat ; I am hungry." She was furnished with food, of which she partook with great relish, and since that time her appetite has been prodigious, while she has kept up a constant stream of conversation. She says that she was perfectly conscious during the entire period of her silence, but cannot explain the cause of her refusal to speak or partake of food. She is now apparently sane, and when she recovers her strength will be discharged. How many people who are supposed to be sane thus reject the Bread of Life, which, when the Holy Spirit has awakened them, they eagerly desire (John 6 : 34-35).

A Baby was nailed to the Floor by its Clothing at Trenton, N. J., recently ; that being a device invented by another child to combine inclination with obedience. The Trenton Gazette says : "Mrs. Burchell, residing on Second Street, having an errand out, left her baby, just able to creep around the floor, in charge of her eight-year-old son. She instructed the latter to stay with the baby till she returned. She was only gone about fifteen minutes, and when she got back she found the infant tacked to the floor and the eight-year-old missing. During her absence he got two tacks and a hammer and tacked the baby's dress to the floor, after which he went out to play." Christians too often display the spirit of this eight-year-old boy. Responsibilities to their own families, their households, and perishing sinners around them are shirked in order that they may enjoy themselves. Sometimes expedients such as the boy's, which appear to keep the letter of God's injunctions but not the spirit of them, are adopted to quiet the conscience (Col. 1 : 28).

A Scattered Family of Emigrants is one of the most pitiful sights a sympathetic spectator can witness. Last week a family arrived in New York who had come to America under the impression that the Western lands offered by our Government were within easy reach of New York. When they discovered how many hundreds of miles they had to traverse before reaching their destination they were full of distress. Only sufficient money was in hand to pay for one passage, and the husband sent his wife forward with her baby in the hope that she might find friends at Cleveland, O., he resolving on working in New York until he had saved enough to follow. The parting was a very painful one to husband and wife, and before the latter arrived at Cleveland her babe had died in her arms, and she was almost beside herself with sorrow. In that great emigration of the spirit to its eternal home, the believer is cheered by the assurance of the Saviour, "I go that I may prepare a place for you" (John 14 : 2).

THE COMMON SALVATION.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Delivered on Sunday Morning, April 10th, 1881.

"The common salvation."—JUDE 3.

Writing for Writing's Sake—Elementary Truths Need Repetition—I. Present Salvation—Enjoyed Now—A Conscious Possession—Includes Spiritual Life—Nearness to God—Peace with Him—Emancipation—Denominations Like Furrows—Four Essentials—II. Common in the Widest Sense—To be Preached to all Nations—Every Believer Saved—III. Common to all Believers—The Same Grace—The Same Saviour—The Same Faith—The Same Spirit—The Same Results—The Same Heaven—IV. Lessons—A Monopolizing Spirit Forbidden—A Spirit of Benediction Fostered—Contention for the Common Faith—A Common Question—A Common Song.

JUDE says, "Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you." The apostle did not write for writing's sake, and in this he sets us an example ; we are not to speak for speaking's sake, nor even to preach for preaching's sake. When we take upon us to write concerning divine things it ought to be because it is needful for us to write, and when we speak in the name of God it should be because we have something to say which it is needful should be said. Unless a man feels an imperative necessity to speak he will not speak as an ambassador of God.

The necessity in the present case was that he should write of the common salvation. If it was common—commonly understood and commonly received—why should he need to write about it? Surely a common subject has enough written upon it already, and it affords no room for freshness and novelty, which are so much desired by readers. Yet experience and observation prove that it is more needful to preach the common doctrines of the gospel than any other truths, and that just those things which appear to be the most elementary and the most generally received are those upon which it is most important to lay stress again and again.

If there be certain high doctrines, speculative theories, and dogmas which are rather outgrowths of the gospel than the gospel itself, let them be preached in due proportion ; but if they be not preached, the risk and danger will not be extreme. As for the root facts, the fundamental doctrines, the primary truths of Scripture, we must from day to day insist upon them. We must never say of them, "Everybody knows them ;" for alas ! everybody forgets them. We must not cease from proclaiming them from fear of being charged with uttering mere platitudes ; that which is revealed of the Holy Ghost must not be spoken of so reproachfully. Let men call the doctrines of the gospel platitudes if they will ; we will only answer, that on such platitudes our salvation rests. The gospel message is full of and well-known facts. What said Paul : "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." If worthy of all acceptation, it is surely worthy of all proclamation. It is worth while for the whole Church continually to rehearse that Jesus came to save sinners, for common truth as it is there is a necessity that we should perpetually and diligently make it known. The common salvation should be commonly spoken of ; but I fear it is uncommonly neglected in these days.

The immediate necessity to write of the common salvation arose out of certain men who had crept into the Church unawares. Some of these attacked the gospel on its practical side with Antinomian subtlety. They cried up the grace of God, but said little of the holy living which it produces. They made light of sin under pretence of magnifying the grace of God ; they called careful watchfulness a legal spirit, derided humble self-examination, and claimed as children of God to be in no sense bound by the precepts of the moral law. The apostle calls it "turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness."

Side by side with these there crept in another gang of evil ones, "who denied the only Lord God and our Lord Jesus Christ." They robbed Christ of His divine glory, and so denied His atonement and sovereignty as to dethrone Him from being either the Saviour or the King of His Church. This was the essence of Arianism. They said that Jesus Christ was an admirable example, that He was one of a number of persons who have discovered important truths, and that He is therefore to be greatly admired; but they asserted that still higher truth would yet be discovered as the race proceeded in its progress, and so forth. These "men of thought" crept into the Church, and stabbed at the heart of the common salvation.

We used to have in our churches a sad amount of the Antinomian leaven; we had among us men who preached the doctrine of grace without the grace of the doctrine, and professors who for evermore spoke about "the truth," but seemed little careful about following "the way" or exhibiting "the life." I hope that this evil principle has pretty well departed from us, though I fear that in its removal it has dragged away precious truth with it; and now we are assailed by quite another school of thought.

I see no choice in the two kinds of foes, they are equally bad; these last are denying this truth and paring down the other, moving landmarks and overthrowing monuments, shaking every wall and kicking at every foundation. Having crept in among us unawares, defiant of common honesty, they preach against the gospel from our own pulpits, and wage war against our Zion from within her own gates. It is essential at this day that such as fear God, and are His servants, should again and again both write and preach concerning "the common salvation," and over and over again rehearse the first lessons of Christ, the very alphabet of grace. We must make the joyful sound of the common salvation to be more common than ever. I wish to ring it out this morning with all the power that I have and with all that God will grant me by His Holy Spirit.

I. Our first observation at this time shall be that is enjoyed by the followers of Christ, otherwise there could be among them no 'common salvation." Those who are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called, are saved. In the Church of God salvation is this day the privilege of all believers. It is not a matter of the future alone, a blessing to be sought for on a dying bed and reached in heaven; but is a blessing for this world and this present time. Those greatly mistake the meaning of salvation who suppose it signifies nothing more than escaping from hell when you die and entering into heaven when the time has come: Salvation means being at once delivered from the power of sin, and being once for all washed from the guilt of sin.

As salvation is not a future benefit only, so it is not a benefit reserved for a few of the more saintly people among believers. It is supposed by some that you cannot know whether you are saved till you are in the article of death; or that, if any do know it, it must be a few eminent teachers or specially holy persons, who have lived a very religious life, and consequently know that they are saved. It is to be confessed that the more holy and godly our life the brighter our evidence of salvation becomes; but still, the blessing itself is common to all the children of God, and those whose faith is feeble, and whose spiritual life is weak, are still saved in the Lord.

Beloved hearer, you ought not to rest without knowing that you are saved. You may know it: if it be true you ought to know it. I do not think that you have any right to sit quietly on that seat for ten minutes without knowing that you are saved; for it is an awful thing to be in doubt as to whether you are under the bondage of sin, in doubt as to your being at peace with God. This is not a subject upon which uncertainty can be endured. You say, "'Tis a point I long to know." It is well that you long to know it; I beg you to long to know it so intensely that you must either know it or become unutterably wretched. Let every doubt on that point be like a sword in your bones. May God cause your heart either to rejoice with full assurance, or else to be in agony as with death pangs till you are confident that you are built on the sure foundation.

We count it no presumption to say that we are saved, for the Word of God has told us so in those places where salvation is promised to faith in Christ Jesus. The presumption would lie in doubting the word of God; but in simply believing what He says, there is far greater humility than in questioning it. Being, then, partakers of like precious faith we share in salvation bought with precious blood, which though it be costly beyond all price is, nevertheless, to all believers the common salvation.

This common salvation consists in many works of grace for us and in us. In part it consists of deliverance from spiritual death. We were dead in trespasses and sins, but the Spirit of God has quickened us into a new and heavenly life, and thus we have salvation from spiritual death. This belongs to-day to all believers; for how can a man be a believer and not have the inner life? Having that life he is conscious that it is there. True, he may fall into a fainting fit, and lie swooning, scarcely conscious of being alive; but such is not his usual condition. Healthy life is conscious life, and rejoices in being, acting, and growing.

This common salvation consists in deliverance from that awful distance at which we once stood from God. We were far off from Him by wicked works, and when the quickening began in us we felt that distance, and we mourned it, fearing also that it never could be removed. But now in Christ Jesus we are brought nigh, and have become dwellers in the house of the Lord. Abba, Father, is the cry which the blessed God hears and accepts, as it rises from our hearts.

We have also been saved from the gloom of heart which once hung over us, because we were conscious of being under God's displeasure. We thought that we could never be forgiven, but we are forgiven; we concluded that our heavenly Father would never accept us, but we are accepted in the Beloved; we wrote ourselves down among the condemned, but now are we justified by faith which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. The darkness hath passed, and the true light shines into the spirits of the faithful. Peace with God is a sweet part of the common salvation.

Now are we delivered also from the love of sin. We cannot find pleasure in it as once we did. We sin, but it costs us dear. When we do so we lament it with our whole soul. It was our natural way to run the downward road, but now when our feet tread that path it is as wanderers who are out of their way. Once sin was our element, as the water is the living element of fish; but it is far otherwise now, for sin is death to us. Transgression now breeds sorrow in our conscience, and creates misery in the heart, for it is alien to the life of God which is in us.

The Lord has also delivered us from that cowardly fear of man which bringeth a snare, and holdeth men as slaves to evil customs. He has also brought us out of the dark dungeon of spiritual ignorance, and renewed us in knowledge; thus has He broken the dominion of the former lusts of our ignorance, and given us liberty to serve Him with godly fear. Pride, too, is laid in the dust, and we are saved from that dreadful tyrant. The dominant power of selfishness is destroyed, and we have learned to love. The woes of others afflict us, the joys of others rejoice us, our soul flows out beyond the narrow confines of our own ribs. Our heart is enlarged with love toward God and to all His creatures. Blessed salvation this! And it is common to all believers.

SALVATION FROM SIN,

leading upward to perfection and heaven, is called in the text "the common salvation." It is, then, the salvation of all God's people—the salvation about which all true Christians are agreed; for, notwithstanding all you hear about our divisions into sects, the Church is really one. The denominations of the Christian Church are very like the divisions of a ploughed field by means of furrows which mark the surface, but the land remains to all intents and purposes one field. I speak not of mere professors, but truly spiritual people; such are all one in Christ Jesus, and their salvation is in all respects the same. If they have not all things common, at least they have one and the same salvation.

All converted men and women believe in the same essential truths, feel the working of the same Spirit within them, and press forward to the same end, namely, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord. You shall take a High Churchman, who is a truly spiritual man, and there are such people, and you shall set him down side by side with the most rigid member of the Society of Friends, and when they begin to talk of Jesus, of the work of the Holy Spirit in the soul, and the desire of their hearts after God, you will hardly know which is which. The nearer we come to Him who is the salvation of God, the more plainly we see that among the children of God the basis of agreement is far wider than the ground of division.

Andrew Fuller well and pithily said, "There are, I conceive, four things which essentially belong to the common salvation; its necessity, its vicarious medium, its freeness to the chief of sinners, and its holy efficacy." We may differ on the "five points," but we are agreed upon these four points. Ask any true Christian if it be not so. You shall get together, if you like, a collection of the odds and ends of Christianity—and certainly there are some queer Christian people about, whose light comes from above, so they say, I think through a crack in the roof; but if they are really genuine, and their hearts are right, you shall find that even in these wrong-headed folk there is an agreement upon their need of a Saviour, their faith in His death, the freeness of His grace, and the change of heart which it produces. All believers in Christ have a common delight in a common salvation.

II. We go a step further, and note, secondly, that this salvation is in some respects common in the widest possible sense. It is common because it is to be to all classes, to all characters, to all ages, and to all conditions of men—in fact, it is to be preached to every creature under heaven. It is the common salvation so far as this, that a proclamation of mercy through Jesus Christ is to be made to all mankind; for it is declared that if they believe in Christ Jesus they shall be saved. You need not be afraid of being too free and unreserved in your delivering of the gospel. Let the great trumpet be blown, and let every mortal ear attend.

I am as firm an adherent to the doctrines of sovereign grace as any man living; but never shall this tongue hesitate to declare the common salvation. Whenever I am called upon to address a congregation, I will always cry, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!" "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." The invitation of the gospel is so far-reaching that it may well be called "the common salvation."

It is common in the widest sense, because every man that believeth in Christ Jesus will be saved; not the Jew only, but the Gentile also; not the poor man only, but the rich man also; not the black man only, or the white man only, but men of every color; not the ignorant or the learned, the rude or the refined, exclusively, but every soul of Adam born that believeth in Christ Jesus shall be saved.

It is common in this wide sense, that if any man be saved he will be saved by this common salvation. Men talk as if there were half a dozen different roads to heaven, and yet there is but one; they prattle as if there were seven or eight Saviours at the least, or as if every man must be his own Saviour, as we heard the other day of every man being his own lawyer; and yet there is but one name given among men whereby we must be saved. He who tries to be his own Saviour has a fool for his client. He will utterly fail, to his eternal confusion; why did Jesus die to save us if we can save ourselves?

III. But I am persuaded that this is not what Jude meant, so I come, in the third place, to say that it is COMMON TO ALL BELIEVERS.

Do you recollect what this same Jude once said to the Saviour? He asked Him, "Lord, how is it that Thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?" He understands that matter now:

but he is not looking so much at the "not unto the world" as at the first fact in his question, "Thou wilt manifest thyself unto us." He is evidently full of joy that the manifestation of the salvation of Jesus is common to all believers. Upon that blessed fact let us dwell.

Certain offices, gifts, attainments, and enjoyments are given to some and not to others. "Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles? Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret?" It is not every believer that possesses full assurance, or enjoys esctasy, or is made largely useful to others. But all believers have the common salvation. There they share and share alike, and every one of them is saved in Christ Jesus and called. An apostle may say to the newest of his converts, "I long to see you, that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, to the end ye may be established; that is, that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you and me."

For, first, it is a common salvation which all believers possess, since it springs from the same grace. There are not some saved by grace and others by works, many by pure grace and more partly by works; but salvation is altogether of grace in every case, and that grace is the same in all who possess it. All believers are chosen by the same electing love, for the same reason, namely, to the glory of the Father's grace; and being so chosen, they are all ordained unto the same life, secured by the same covenant, and given into the hands of

THE SAME SURETY.

It is a common salvation—common because we are all saved by the same Saviour. We are not some of us looking to Jesus, and others to Moses, or to ourselves; neither are we some of us looking to the atoning death, and others to the perfect life of Christ; but we are all saved by the same one work, life, death, resurrection and intercession of Christ Jesus. When He made atonement by blood it was for all His redeemed; when He rose it was to justify all who are in Him; when He stands at the right hand of God to plead, He intercedes for all the saints; and when He cometh it will be that all His saints may be with Him where He is, and may behold His glory.

It is a common salvation, because we are all saved through the same faith, we believe the same precious truth, and receive Christ in the same way. All the saved possess faith, though not all to the same degree. Would God we were all strong in faith! Still, faith is a child-like confidence in God in the greatest as much as in the least of God's people, and this is the essential requisite to salvation in every case. He that believeth in Christ is not condemned, but he that believeth not is condemned already. To all participation in Christian privilege we have only one right: "If thou believest with all thy heart thou mayest." Faith makes a man a fellow-commoner with the saints of God.

It is a common salvation, because faith and spiritual life are wrought in us by the same Spirit. Faith does not come to one by the operation of free will and to another by free grace, but to every one by the same Spirit. You, then, my brother, are plucked like a brand from the burning by the power of the Spirit of God, so also is thy friend who rejoices with thee. All are quickened by the same Spirit, and kept alive by the same Quickener. The love of the Spirit should be joyfully acknowledged by us all without exception, for the Spirit has wrought all our works in us.

It is a common salvation as to its results; for all believers are equally born again, and they are all renewed by Him who saith, "Behold I make all things new." Brought into the one family of God, they are all made children of God and joint heirs with Christ Jesus. They are all justified, accepted, preserved, guided, upheld, and comforted. Their feet are set upon the selfsame rock, they are led in the same King's highway, and a new song is prepared for every one of their mouths. The common salvation, like the common table of a household, satisfies all their mouths with good things, and renews their youth like the eagle's.

By and by they shall meet in the same heaven. There will be no division before the throne between the different tribes and denominations of believers. One family we dwell in Him even now, with all our petty strifes; but the great family relationship shall be more fully developed by and by when imperfections and errors shall be cast aside. The saints before the throne will sing a common hymn unto the common Saviour as they gather in the common home, saved with a common salvation.

Brethren, I am right glad of all this. I feel inclined to stop the sermon and ask you to join in singing Charles Wesley's verse—

> "Partners of a glorious hope,
> Lift your hearts and voices up;
> Jointly let us rise and sing
> Christ our Prophet, Priest, and King."

To me it is a joyous thing that God's best gifts should be the commonest. It is so in nature; the sunshine, the dew, the air, the heavens, these cannot become the particular estate of a few; they are common blessings. When Richard the Second banished Bolingbroke, that nobleman is represented as saying—

> "This must my comfort be,
> That sun that warms you here, shall shine on me;
> And those his golden beams, to you here lent,
> Shall point on me and gild my banishment."

There is no monopolizing the best gifts, for heaven ordains them to be the right of all mankind; and so the chief things of the covenant of grace are common to all believers.

One may have greater powers of speech than another; but God hath spoken to the silent brother the same promises. Gifts are to this man and to that; but the gift of salvation is to all who believe. The choicest saint may have far less of this world's riches than his brother; but the riches of God's grace are all his own by equal title. We live on common ground here, fed by our Father with the same bread from heaven.

IV. That brings me to close, by noticing that this fact of the common salvation was mentioned by Jude that he might use it as an argument. So then this fact has

MANY LESSONS.

First, this common salvation forbids a monopolizing spirit. The old divines used to say that inclosures were contrary to law. I am afraid that I may not say so now; for almost everywhere the commons have been taken from the poor man and his goose. May there yet be an end to such inclosings. But inclosures in spiritual things are contrary to the law of Christ. Who are we that we should cut off from fellowship with us those whose fellowship is with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ?

Yet we have those around us who make it a point of Christianity to be exclusive. Their exclusions are perpetual. Shut that door! Shut that door! Shut that door! seems to be the one great command of their house, and the second is like unto it—make more doors, one within the other, and take care to bolt them all. Their sheep must keep within their fold without fail, for if they once get a bite of pasture outside the inclosure their doom is sealed. In many forms this spirit has been among our denominations, but I do not believe in it. If the spirit of Christianity begets in us love to all mankind, much more, my brethren, are we to love those in whom there is the life of God.

If I could do it, the last thing I should attempt would be to wall in my own special company and say, "The temple of the Lord are we." I would not wish to set a fence round about the baptized and say, "These be the Church of Christ, even as many as have been immersed in water that they may be buried into His death." Beloved brethren, our Lord hath a people that are on other points as right as right can be, who on the point of baptism are as wrong as wrong can be; but, for all that, they are His people, and in other respects are sound in the faith and valiant for the Lord our God. Unto such our love goeth forth, and must go forth, despite their grievous error.

Upon other matters there are distinctions among believers, but yet there is a common salvation enjoyed by the Arminian as well as by the Calvinist, possessed by the Presbyterian as well as by the Episcopalian, prized by the Quaker as well as by the Baptist. Those who are in Christ are more near of kin than they know of, and their intense unity in deep essential truth is a greater force than most of them imagine; only give it scope and it will work wonders.

Next, this doctrine fosters the spirit of benediction. Jude begins his epistle with "Mercy unto you, and peace, and love be multiplied." Brothers and sisters, fill your lungs with this healthy air. You are saved with a common salvation; desire the profit, the growth, the happiness of all who partake of this one salvation. You are in one ship; seek the good of all who sail with you. You are enlisted in one army; pray the Captain of salvation to make every soldier strong in the Lord and in the power of His might. The common salvation should excite us to seek the prosperity of every part of Zion; we would seek the good, not of our Tabernacle alone but of every tabernacle or temple where Christians meet to worship the Most High.

Next, this fact arouses in us a common spirit of contention for the one faith. For what saith the apostle? "It is needful that I write unto you of the common salvation, and exhort you that you should earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints." When the gospel is assailed we must all rise in its defence, for it is the common salvation which is involved in it. When they frightened this nation years ago with the rumor of an invasion by the French, the Russians, or somebody or other, what was the result? Everybody became warlike. Our young men joined rifle clubs, and our elderly men furbished up their old blunderbusses. Every man, woman, and child would have found some fork, or scythe, or spade, or axe wherewith to protect our common fatherland.

COMMUNITY OF INTEREST

begets community of feeling. We are all Englishmen, and we all sing, "Britons never will be slaves;" so, in this case, when the gospel of Jesus Christ is assailed, it does not matter by whom, I feel I may call upon all Christians to take action for the common salvation. Brothers, rouse you to the fight, for more than our hearths and homes is now attacked. Do they deny the deity of Christ? It is not only my religion that is assailed, it is yours as well. Do they turn the grace of God into lasciviousness? It is not this branch of the Church that is now endangered. The entire Church is placed in jeopardy. This gospel is not my heritage or yours, it is the common domain of all the faithful, and I beseech you feel it to be so.

I want to see more backbone in all professors, more determination never to stultify their faith by pretending to believe that black is white and that white is a shade of black. Love: do I not preach it with all my heart, and do I not bid you manifest it in your deeds? But with that love mingle a firm adherence to the truth as it is in Jesus, and a zealous resolve that it shall not lose its honor while you are capable of upholding it.

This fact, I think, puts every one of us to the question, It is a common salvation, but have I a part in it? It belongs to all the people of God, but am I one of them? I should like you this morning, when you get home, to write on a piece of paper, if you will, whether you are saved or not. It would be a timely searching. Here you are, on this tenth of April—write down "Saved, bless the Lord for it," and if you are obliged to feel you could not write that down, go up into your chamber and cry mightily unto God till you can. Well, if you are able to write "saved," then inasmuch as it is a common salvation go and try to spread that salvation among others.

And, lastly, this text calls for a common song of praise from all those who have the common salvation, and I cannot suggest to you a better doxology than that with which Jude closes his epistle, "Now unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen."

A SCOTCH STUDENT'S STORY.

An Invalid on Board—An Attempted Suicide—A Fellow Student's Meeting—A Terrible Confession—Dying Despair Cured by Faith in Christ.

"On a beautiful summer day, last year, I went on board a steamer at Leith for Rotterdam. The cabin was filled with passengers, some of them very pleasant people, as I afterwards found; but from among them I singled out one whose gentlemanly appearance and bearing attracted me. I accosted him, and found that his looks did not falsify his appearance. He seemed in very delicate health, which might be the cause of his extreme melancholy. He appeared about my own age; and there was something in his face, especially in his dark flashing eyes, and in the tones of his voice, that reminded me of some one I had seen before.

"We had a pleasant conversation down the Frith till within sight of Dunbar, when he suddenly left me, went down into the cabin, and I did not see him again that night, nor till late next day, which was bright and calm—a true Sabbath—to the cheering influences of which, whether external or internal, the faces of all on board seemed to respond, except his, which looked haggard and doubly miserable amid the general cheerfulness. My attempts to draw him into conversation were vain. Yes, or No, was all his answer. He sometimes leaned over the bulwark, looking at the calm deep sea. Once I saw him turn round to the deck. Large drops of perspiration stood on his face, and his eye had an unnatural, glassy stare.

"At the dinner-table I sat opposite him. He seemed more composed, but ate almost nothing. Near the end, a gentleman beside him asked for a glass of brandy. A strange light gleamed from his eyes. He rose with a deprecating gesture, and hurried on deck. Late in the evening a gentle breeze sprung up, which raised long swelling waves, and all the passengers, including the invalid, retired to their berths. I lay on the poop enjoying the cool breeze, the gentle heave of the ship, and the play of light and shadow on the water, as the moon shot her pale ray across it, or was obscured by the passing cloud. My thoughts naturally turned to the invalid. Suddenly, like a flash of lightning, it struck me that it was Roberts. But, oh, how changed from the rosy, vigorous schoolboy! As I mused, a figure glided out of the cabin door to the side of the ship and jumped overboard.

"'Man overboard!' I cried.—'Reverse the screw,' said one to the engine-man.—'Lower the boat on the starboard quarter,' cried the mate.

"The whole passed in a moment. The moon shone out clear as day, and in five minutes the man was on board. It was the invalid. He was stripped on deck, and carried to the captain's cabin, where he soon recovered. It was Roberts. I introduced myself next morning. He was subject to somnambulism, from his weak, nervous state, and had not awakened last night till he was in the water. He was going to the water-cure establishment on the Righi, his health having been completely shattered by his heavy duties, first as popular assistant of a city clergyman, and then as the incumbent of a large country parish. I intended remaining a fortnight in Belgium, and we parted at Rotterdam, expecting to meet again on the Righi.

"On Saturday evening I left Cologne for Bonn. As it was late when I got to the Trierscher Hof at Bonn, after taking some refreshment and writing my name in the hotel book, I retired to my room. I was writing, when the landlord knocked and came in. 'There is in the house, sir,' said he, 'a countryman of yours, very ill—dangerously so, the doctor says; we asked the English clergyman here to come, but the gentleman would not see him. Only to-night, when I told him that a Mr. Cameron had come, he was anxious to see you.'—'Certainly,' I said, 'I'll go,' and followed him up to a room nearly above my own.

"Who could it be? I entered, and there on the bed lay Roberts. His former look, miserable as it was, was calmness and peace compared with his present—so full of terror and despair. The paroxysms of his disease were past, and I feared this was but a lucid interval before the extinction of that life begun so brightly and hopefully. 'Thanks for your coming,' he said in a low hollow voice, 'I am dying.' The doctor told me last time that my next attack would kill me. I believed him and now I feel it. Drinking has brought me to this. Oh the shame and horror of the last two years! terrible! terrible!' He paused a little, exhausted. I was silent—what could I say?

"'Cameron,' he resumed, 'it was no somnambulism. I intended it that night; but I was saved unwillingly. It would have been better not. It is just as much suicide still.' His frame shook with agony, and large drops of sweat stood on his brow. —'You must have been sorely tried, Roberts; how did it begin?'

"'Why, you know,' he whispered, 'I was very young when I became Dr. M——'s assistant. All the active work fell on me, and in visiting I was always asked to take wine, and took it as a matter of course. At presbytery dinners, and Dr. M——'s own house, I had also a share of what was going; and it so exhilarated and stimulated my mind, that when at home, attempting, but unable, to compose, I began to use it, and became addicted to it; and when I got to my country parish I got worse. I tried to give it up, but could not. No one suspected, however. No one knows yet but my sister, who kept my house, and my medical attendant. At last mind and body fairly gave way, and I was laid aside.

"'Ten months ago I had an attack of this kind. Since then I have carefully abstained. You can't know the awfulness of the temptation. The very smell, Cameron, sometimes causes agonizing desire. But I kept my resolution—till the other day. I was dining in my hotel at Cologne. What a beautiful view that is up the Rhine?' and as he dwelt on it for a moment, his face softened down a little. 'Oh,' he bitterly exclaimed, 'that room was the door of hell for me. Two or three gentlemen from Scotland sat near me; one of them, a great advocate of total abstinence, sat opposite. We knew each other, having met before. "May I have the pleasure of drinking wine with you, Mr. Roberts?" "Why, I thought you were an abstainer, Mr. B——." "Oh, yes," he said, "at home, for the sake of example, you know; but I have no superstition on the subject; and these light wines are so different from ours." '

"'What tempted me, I know not; but without thinking—without the least desire for it, I drank wine with him, then with others. It then came on me irresistibly; I felt that the demon had laid hold on me; but having arranged to go by an afternoon train, and it being now the hour, I had fortunately to leave—but not till I had put into my portmanteau four bottles of cognac, which I drank here that night, and now it's all over. You will see me buried, and write my sister, will you not? and send home my effects, and say it was—fever—as indeed it is. Oh, Cameron, take a lesson from me. Touch not the accursed thing. A life of happiness and usefulness here and hereafter lost—a lost soul!'

"His frame quivered, and his face was agonized. 'A drink of water, John. No, John, dip the tip of your finger and touch my tongue—that's more than I deserve, and soon more than I'll get.'—'Don't say so, David; you know that as long as there is life the greatest sinner may return.'—'Ah, John, it's too late. I know all you can say. I have often said it all myself on occasions like this; but I have no faith in death-bed repentances.'—'Nor I, David; but have faith in the Saviour.'—'He has cast me off, John, or He would not have let me fall into this last sin. I have applied to Him, and you see the result.'—'Did you apply to Him that afternoon, David, or that night you came here?'—'No, John.'—Well, then, don't blame Him but apply to Him now.'—'Blame Him! God forbid; it is my own doing—not His. Will you pray then, John?'

"After the prayer he became more composed. 'You must hope,' I said, 'David; remember your namesake's experience—"He took me out of a deep pit, and out of the miry clay." '—'The pit is deep, very deep: I have been digging it for the last four years.'—'But He can draw you out of it.' —'Oh, if He would! I hope He will; "His blood cleanseth from all sin." '

"I repeated the verse commencing

"'There is a fountain filled with blood,' and to my glad surprise he took up the second verse—

"'The dying thief rejoiced to see,
That fountain in his day;
And there may I, though vile as he
Wash all my sins away.'

"A sweet composure seemed to fill his mind. There was even a kind of smile when he added, 'Lord, wash me, and I shall be clean.' This was the last flicker of the expiring lamp. He became insensible, and remained so till he died, as the faint light of morning struggled in at the window. I remained with him to the last; and it was sad and lonely enough to sit there beside that dying young man, and hear occasionally the loud, boisterous song of some party of students going home from their club. What a contrast! the rough, lively energy of health, and the dead and dull inertness of the last hour of life.

"I will not describe to you that Sunday—how I walked in the morning in the quiet, beautiful suburbs of Bonn, and after breakfast attended the Lutheran College Church, where the service braced me with some of the faith and hope of the brave old Reformer. I attended, of course, to poor Roberts' wishes, and when I came home I visited his sister, whose account of her brother's terrible humiliation and deep repentance up to the time he left home to endeavor to recover health of body and mind by change of scene and occupation, gave me better hope of his latter end."

III. The Political Sign—The Roman Empire—The Ten Kingdoms Reconstituted—A Capital Error—The Ten Toes—Two Feet—The Greek and Latin Halves—Present and Probable Developments—Never to be Destroyed—The Little Horn to Arise from Them—After a Brief Interval—IV. The Seven Years' Covenant—Daniel's Separated Seventieth Week—The Gap in Prophetic Chronology—The Literal Day Fulfilment of Revelation—The Identification of Antichrist—Where do We now Stand?

THE rapture of the waiting saints, taken in connection with the previous destruction of the Roman Empire, constitutes the second of the great signs of the arrival of Antichrist's "own season;" and though this sign has manifestly not yet come to pass, the whole aspect of things in the moral, ecclesiastical, and political world, leaves us little room for doubting that it is soon, very soon, to be revealed.

III.—The third and exclusively political sign of the arrival of the special season in which Antichrist is to be revealed, will be the reformation and division into ten parts or kingdoms of the old Roman empire of the Cæsars; which will apparently synchronize, or nearly so, with the more spiritual and heavenly sign of which we have just spoken. This still future decemregal division of the Roman Empire is clearly predicted by the prophet Daniel, being represented both by the ten toes on the feet of the great metallic image (Daniel 2 : 40-45) and the ten horns of the fourth beast (Daniel 7 : 23-25); as well as by St. John in the corresponding ten horns of the beast (Revelation 13 : 1; 17 : 3).

Now it has been fully demonstrated by many of the best expositors of prophecy that this distinct prediction has never as yet been fulfilled, for though it is maintained by writers of the historical school to have received its accomplishment after the dismemberment of the empire by the babarians (Elliott, for instance, gives the following list: the Anglo-Saxons, Franks, Allmans, Burgundians Visigoths, Suevi, Vandals, Ostrogoths, Bavarians' and Lombards), yet the fact that more than twenty-eight different lists, including sixty-five kingdoms have been given by writers of this school, is sufficient proof how precarious and unsatisfactory is the basis on which this interpretation crests.

Moreover, as Mr. B. W. Newton, in his "Prospects of the Ten Kingdoms," long ago pointed out, these expositors are all of necessity involved in the capital error of finding all the ten toes on one foot! "If," he observes, "the iron legs of the image denote the whole Roman Empire, why do expositors, after admitting this, suddenly forget their admission when they begin to treat of the ten divided parts, and write as if half only of the Roman Empire were indicated? If a whole is to be divided, we must divide that whole. Nothing but error can ensue if we divide only half. Yet this is the mistake that has been committed.

"The Greek or eastern half of the Roman Empire has been forgotten, and the Latin or western half only considered. Expositors have written as if the ten toes of the image were all found on one of its feet; and have persisted in seeking the ten kingdoms which those toes represent in one part only of the Roman Empire. That modern expositors should have committed so fatal a mistake appears truly unaccountable. And the error is the worse because the eastern part of the Roman Empire—that part which expositors have forgotten—has, even in secular history as well as in Scripture, a claim to be regarded as the more important division of the two" (pp. 18, 19, 2d Ed.).

It is by no means denied that there may be found in past times a partial and shadowy accomplishment of this prophecy; but that it has never received any adequate or plenary fulfilment is simply a matter of fact. That the early Christian writers, who lived while the iron unity of Rome was as yet unbroken, should have supposed that the dismemberment of the empire would be immediately followed by the formation of the ten predicted kingdoms and the revelation of the Antichrist was but natural;* but that writers of the present day, acquainted with all the facts of modern history, should continue to ignore them would be strange indeed were we not constantly reminded of the blinding influence of a theory, whether doctrinal or prophetic.

At all events, one thing seems very sure, viz., that whatever excuse for this error may still exist will speedily be removed. The rapid evolution of history in these last days is even now bringing out, with a sharpness and distinctness which will leave no room for doubt, that final tenfold division of the revived Roman Empire which will, so to speak, form whereon Antichrist is to play his brief but fearful part.

Already, if we assume that England, separated legislatively, at least, from Ireland and her numerous colonies, is to be one of the ten kingdoms, we can hardly err in identifying France (with her frontier extended to the Rhine, and including Belgium and part of Holland), Italy, Spain, and Austria after its division and reformation, as the other four toes on the western foot of the image. While in the East the rapidly progressing dissolution of the Turkish empire is steadily resulting in the formation of the other five toes. Greece is already independent; Egypt, though still nominally the feudatory of Turkey, may at any moment break the feeble bonds that bind them together; while it seems almost certain that Syria, Thrace with Bithynia, and Bulgaria, will form the remaining three kingdoms.

We cannot, therefore, agree with Dr. Anderson that even now "the attempt to enumerate the ten kingdoms of the future is a profitless inquiry." That the exact delimitation of each particular kingdom can as yet be drawn with exactness, no one, so far as we are aware, presumes to assert; but the elements of uncertainty are every day becoming fewer, and of this, at least, we may feel assured—that the identity of the ten kingdoms, when once they are actually formed, will be so obvious as to preclude mistake. "No one," says Mr. B. W. Newton, "doubts that Chaldea, Persia, Greece, and Rome have existed and ruled as sovereign empires; and the development of the ten last kingdoms must be no less decided." Moreover, when once formed, these kingdoms will continue to the end; for, as we know, it is "in the days of these kings that the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, but stand for ever" (Daniel 2 : 44).

Inasmuch, then, as it is from among these ten kingdoms that the little horn of Daniel 7—in other words, the Antichrist—is to arise, "before whom three of these horns are to be plucked up by the roots," it follows, as a matter of course, that their formation will furnish an unmistakable indication that Antichrist's "own season" is at hand. We are nowhere told, indeed, that his revelation will immediately follow the rise of the ten kingdoms, but at the same time all the concurrent circumstances lead us to the conclusion that the interval between these two events will be a very brief one; and when their formation shall become an accomplished fact, and the rapture of the waiting saints has taken place, only one other sign will be wanting to assure us that the "hour" has at length struck, and that the Man of Sin has actually appeared.

IV. THAT LAST SIGN

will be the ratification of the seven years' covenant between Antichrist and the Jewish nation, of which we find the prophecy in the ninth chapter of Daniel, where we read, "And he shall confirm a covenant with many (lit., "the many") for one week, and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolater" (Daniel 9 : 27).

Now the personage here spoken of as concluding a covenant with the Jewish people is understood by all the best expositors to be the Antichrist, and the period—one week or heptade—for which this covenant is made is the seventieth separated week of Daniel's great prophecy of the seventy weeks. The making of this treaty, therefore, is, with the single exception of the Second Advent itself, the most important epoch in unfulfilled prophecy.

It marks, in the first place, the point at which the chronology of prophecy is resumed. Since the termination of the sixty-ninth week with the "cutting off of Messiah" (Daniel 9 : 26) there has been no such thing, strictly speaking, as prophetic chronology, though the seventieth week may have cast back its dark shadow over the intervening centuries, and rendered a rough approximate calculation of times and seasons possible. But with the commencement of the seventieth week—the week of Antichrist's covenant—the more exact and literal chronology of prophecy will recommence, and consequently, those who witness the confirmation of a seven years' covenant between some "prince" of the revived Roman Empire, and the Jewish people will be in a position to estimate with the utmost nicety the precise point in the world's history which has been reached, and almost the exact order in which succeeding events are to occur.

Secondly, the making of this covenant between Antichrist and the Jews will mark the commencement of the literal day-day fulfilment of all the visions of the book of Revelation, from the sixth to the nineteenth chapter inclusive. The first half of this last week being occupied, apparently, by the establishment of the lawless one's power over the ten confederated kingdoms and the restored Jewish people, the great work of evangelization, symbolized by the going forth of the rider on the white horse, under the first seal, and the wars, famine and pestilences, symbolized under the second, third, and fourth seals respectively, while the latter half of the week forms the "1260 day," or "42 months," or "time, times, and half a time," so often spoken of in Daniel and the Revelation (Daniel 7 : 25; 12 : 7; Revelation 11 : 2, 3; 12 : 6, 14; 13 : 5); in other words, the period of the "great tribulation."

Thirdly, the making of this covenant will bear witness to the solemn fact that Antichrist will be revealed. It is, of course, fully admitted that Antichrist will only drop the mask and fully declare himself when, in the midst of the week, he breaks his covenant, "causing the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," and planting his idol on the pinnacle of the Jewish temple; but nevertheless the initial stage of his revelation will be his entering into the seven years' covenant with the Jews, for in that act he will be once for all identified.

When once the ten kingdoms have been manifestly established, whoever—be he prince, prelate, or potentate—shall form a seven years' covenant with the Jewish people, he and he alone is the Antichrist. Other corroborative signs—such as the mystic number 666 being found in his name—there will doubtless be, but the covenant will in itself be sufficient. Whatever uncertainty may previously have existed as to his identity will thus be at once removed. Then, if not till then, to the watchful ear the "hour" will have struck, and the "man" will stand forth revealed beyond the possibility of doubt.

In conclusion, then, let us ask, and endeavor to answer, the important question.

WHERE DO WE NOW STAND?

Of the four signs of the approach or arrival of Antichrist's "own time" to which attention has been drawn, the first, or moral sign, viz., an all-pervading spirit of "lawlessness," already shows manifest indications that it is soon to reach its consummation and concentration, if we may so speak, in the person of the lawless one. The second and third, i.e., the revival of Cæsar's Roman Empire, and its division into ten parts or kingdoms, have not indeed as yet come to pass, but it has even now reached so advanced a stage that the next great European convulsion—a catastrophe which statesmen and people alike see to be impending—will probably result in its complete realization.

And when these things shall once have become matters of fact, only one remaining sign—the making of the seven years' covenant between the Jews and Antichrist—will be wanting to assure us that the last and most awful seven years of the present dispensation have commenced to run their course.

Meanwhile, the words of our Lord once spoken on earth, are with added solemnity repeated to us from heaven: "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh" (Matthew 24 : 42, 43).

[We consider that one very distinct sign identifying the personal Antichrist will be his political appearance, after the formation of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, as an eleventh little horn (Daniel 7 : 24) or petty sovereign reigning over a small originally Greek province carved out of one of Alexander the Great's four Eastern kingdoms, and then his "waxing exceeding great toward the south (Greece), and toward the east (Thrace and Syria), and toward the pleasant land (Judea)," and subduing those three horns or kings, and himself becoming "King of the North" (Syria), before he makes his seven years' covenant with the Jews (Daniel 7 : 24; 8 : 9; 11 : 21-40). His first rise as an eleventh little horn may be several months before he makes his seven years' covenant. M. BAXTER.]

* The learned Greswell writes:—"Another opinion on which great unanimity is seen to prevail among the Fathers, is this: that, before the appearance of Antichrist the Roman Empire was to be dissolved, and broken up into ten different parts: yet at his appearance was to be reunited, and restored to its pristine integrity under him. And as the coming of Antichrist could not take place without that dissolution, nor that dissolution without the breaking up of the existing political state of things, very many of the ancient interpreters of prophecy understood St. Paul's to katechon, 'that which letteth or hindereth' (2 Thessalonians 2:6), of the Roman Empire in particular; as presenting, while it lasted, an effectual, insuperable bar to the appearance of Antichrist. And in the spirit of this construction, the Christians, we are told, prayed daily and fervently for the stability and preservation of that empire: whose convulsion and dismemberment were to bring with them so dreadful and disastrous an event" (Exposition of the Parables," etc.).

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Mourning For the Cat—Mr. Jardine again—Mr. Fennecker's Visit—Lady Isabel goes to Ferncroft—She and Mrs. Clemence visit Mrs. Fennecker.

THE unsuspecting cat had been prowling about all the afternoon, and after some time of eager watching on the boys' part, puss appeared stealing round the corner of a wall. Bang! bang! went the gun, and a helter-skelter rush of the two sportsmen to examine their "bag." The shot had been an effectual one. Their feline victim lay prostrate under the hedge in her last agonies; and after being exhibited to one or two witnesses triumphantly, as the "defunct thief," she was carried away to a lone, dark spot, amid the mazes of the shrubbery, and there in a deep hole buried.

When Mrs. Clemence returned from her stroll, she was eagerly besieged.

"Did you hear a great bang, auntie? Well, that was the old yellow cat that has done all the mischief. She was a miserable old creature, all battered to bits. She must have been in many a game-trap."

"Many a trap!" echoed the younger boy in chorus.

Both thought they had accomplished a very successful afternoon's work—done a "good deed," in fact! even going to the cook for congratulation.

"Well, Master Harold!" commented that august personage, who did far more in the small household than literally "rule the roast," "I am sure it's a good riddance. The poor beast has been the plague of my life lately."

"No more about it, boys!" said Mr. Clemence sternly, as soon as he was informed of the news that evening.

Thus the subject passed away, having evaporated like most of their little excitements, which bore a chronic character of evanescence.

Two days passed, and at the housewife's usual busy hour, Mrs. Clemence was concluding her morning's interview with the back regions of her house, when the cook suddenly said—

"There she is again, ma'am, I do declare! She is a worry. It's a woman from the village, who keeps on askin' if we've shot any cats about here, or if we have seen any goin' round the place. As to that last, I've told her they're always a-plaguin' of us, and don't give us no peace; but I haven't told her nothin' more."

A clean, careworn-looking cottage woman was seen curtseying at the back-door that opened into the yard. Mrs. Clemence went to speak to her, and after receiving homage in the shape of a profusion of very low "bobs," the poor woman in profoundest whispers confided the startling fact, the communication of which had been the object of her repeated visits—

"I've got a poor daughter, mum, and she ain't not altogether right in 'er 'ed. But she do have a lot o' cats; and she takes on about 'em too, and makes ever such a fuss with 'em. An' she's lost one. 'Twas a old cat, what 'ad lost a heye an' a hear, and it 'adn't but three legs."

"What color was it?" interrupted Mrs. Clemence with a gasp.

"Yaller! a all-overish sort o' color," continued the woman; "an' she 'asn't seen it this two days, an' she's pretty near wild about it, she is. We can't do nothin' with her. She keeps on a screamin' an goin' into fits; and so I thought I'd just come in and ask your servants if they know'd anything about it."

Mrs. Clemence beat a hasty retreat to re-question the children as to the description in detail of the unfortunate animal of whose death and burial they had been the authors. With open eyes and terrified whispers they acknowledged the identity of the two accounts, and were sent forthwith to offer to the poor mother, who was in very real distress, their meekest apologies, and confess the ill-fated end of poor puss. In reply, she only begged that the corpse might be then and there disinterred and given to her to carry home! Nothing else "would quiet her daughter!" So it was! Carrying in her apron the murdered remains, she was seen wending her way up the steep village street. The boys were in dire dismay. Visions of police and every other form of justiciary vengeance haunted their troubled minds.

It was discovered by inquiry that the girl had eight cats, was a harmless lunatic, and found her sole amusement and occupation in the companionship of these creatures, conversing with them like human beings, feeding them and teaching them herself all day long. Ranging the seven living cats round an open grave, which she had prepared in her own garden, she solemnly, and with much hysterical weeping, reburied the unfortunate deceased. After the disappearance of her pet beneath the sod, her violent fit had subsided, and she was perfectly quiet.

On the following Sunday she made a rush into the church, with a large pocket-handkerchief to her eyes, dressed in a colored dress, over which were fluttering morsels of black crape. Monday morning found Mrs. Clemence in her tiny cottage, seated beside poor "Pussy," as the girl was called, and holding in her warm, gentle clasp the iron-cold hand of the unfortunate imbecile.

"Poor Pussy!" she was saying, "do you know that Jesus loves you? He died to make you very happy. Jesus can comfort and bless poor Pussy now. Shall we ask Jesus to come here, and teach you about His beautiful Heaven?"

Repeating one simple text after another, this strange interview was continued until the girl's wild stare gradually relaxed, exchanging itself for a look of restful calm. Keeping her eyes fixed on the face of her visitor, she seemed slowly to drink in the ineffable sweetness that shined in her eyes, and from that most unusual hand-clasp to receive a new thought of loving comfort. At the end of the visit they were fast friends.

An agreement was made that Pussy was to call upon Mrs. Clemence twice a week; and on these occasions she would come regularly at the appointed day and hour, taking her place in the little room on a low seat beside her teacher, who gently and slowly reiterated time after time the saving, satisfying truths of the Holy Word that she herself so dearly loved, and which she felt must be all-powerful even with so painful a case as that before her. The pupil's devotion to her lessons was strangely ardent.

"What is your first name?" she would say to Mrs. Clemence. "I like you very much, and I must call you by your name."

The tuition of this poor, imperfect mind was one of the fragments of lowly, patient work that shed a fragrance over the daily life of the lady who was so beloved among her neighbors, and helped to hallow the precincts of the "little room." It had its blessed effect in tranquillizing and soothing poor Katharine (for that was her real name), and in bringing before the other inmates of that cottage home the love and power of Jesus—that mighty Saviour, that tender Friend, to whom hitherto they had been strangers.

On one of her visits to her devoted protégée, Mrs. Clemence passed Etta going into the street where "Bill" lived. She knew well the kindness she was showing in that sad little home, and lifted up her heart in prayer for her, as she saw the black dress, pale face, and hurried step glide out of sight into the maze of small houses that flanked the little white pavement.

From time to time old Mike brought little whispered histories of the good that "Miss Etta" was doing to Bill and his parents, and others of Mike's friends. Mrs. Clemence, rejoicing to hear of this entrance of another laborer in the midst of the dark little town, with her own true tact and delicacy of feeling, avoided interrupting or supplementing Etta's work by anything that might possibly seem like an invasion of it! So, on second thoughts, she had not visited that particular house, where she well knew her young stranger-friend might be found almost every day at some hour. However, they were not long to be strangers, and this is how the introduction came about.

When next Mr. Jardine visited Lionel Court, he had not forgotten Mr. Hamilton's hearty acceptance of his former request, that he might bring a friend to enjoy a "whiff of country air," as he said, "in the quiet old house and awfully pretty grounds." He arrived at the little station, portmanteau and all, and friend too! As the two young men made their appearance in the drawing-room, where Lady Isabel sat before a small table that was almost covered with a welcoming array of china cups and saucers, hissing silver tea-kettle, and other appliances for "the cup that cheers but not inebriates," Mr. Jardine, having shaken hands cordially himself with his hostess said—

"My friend, Mr. Fennecker—Lady Isabel." And after a little talk they subsided into low chairs for the enjoyment of their preliminary meal. Dinner followed, and after dinner, in the course of the evening, Mr. Hamilton said—

"You should take your friend down to see the new coffee-house, Jardine."

"All right!" said Mr. Jardine, addressing himself to his companion. "When will you come? It's just a stroll, isn't it, Lady Isabel?"

"Yes," she answered, "if you go by the short way. But don't do it to-night. Go to-morrow."

"No time like the present," they said, going off with their cigars lighted.

When they came back, Mr. Fennecker ensconced himself on a low chair beside Lady Isabel, and said—

"What a jolly place! It's awfully nice and comfortable. And, I say, Jardine, how many men should you say were sitting there?"

"Fifty, I should think," said Mr. Jardine.

"All quite at their ease," he continued. "I must tell my sister about it. She's taken an awful fancy to going about among the poor lately. My mother didn't half like it at first; but she does not seem to mind it so much now. It's ever since my poor brother's death—I lost a brother lately—and really it's made a great difference to poor Etta. They were next in age, and it cut her up dreadfully."

"How sad!" said Lady Isabel. "Where is your house?"

"Not very far from this," he said. "That is to say, about three-quarters of an hour's rail; in the neighborhood of Shenstone."

"I know where it is, then!" said Lady Isabel, her face brightening. "Do you know Mrs. Clemence? She lives there."

"Mrs. Clemence!" said young Fennecker, looking straight into the fire. "Oh! ah! yes! There is a family of that name. But I think we only know them slightly. I think my mother and Mrs. Clemence have exchanged visits."

"Only think of your not knowing her better than that!" exclaimed Lady Isabel. "Why she is a person I would drive any distance to see. She is a perfect treasure, a delight, a—well, I don't know how to describe her except by saying you have had a loss in not knowing her!"

"Really! I am quite surprised," said Mr. Fennecker, rather apathetically. "We have never met either her or Mr. Clemence at any of the county balls, and I don't fancy they even come to the concerts. But I know where they sit in church. She dresses very plainly, does she not?"

'Oh! well, really! all I know is that you ought to know her, and your sister too;" . . . thus the conversation ended.

But the next morning, when her guests were leaving, Lady Isabel sent a pretty collection of her favorite hymns by Harold Fennecker to his sister.

Of course a letter of thanks came back, and thus a friendship began.

Suddenly, one day, Lady Isabel appeared in Shenstone. Driving direct from the station to Ferncroft, she found Mrs. Clemence alone, and not a little delighted to see her bright, sweet face appearing like a rainbow on the scene!

Nowhere did she get a warmer welcome than at peaceful little Ferncroft. She and Mrs. Clemence were devoted friends, and though the latter was several years her senior they had so many subjects in common, and were so closely united in heart on the One great Theme, that she felt no hesitation in coming straight to the point at once, in telling Mrs. Clemence the special object of her visit that day.

"I want you to come with me and call upon Miss Fennecker," she said, "this afternoon if you will. She seems to have rather a lonely life, though she has so many brothers and sisters; and really her letters to me are very nice. Very interesting they are! showing so much thought and feeling. Her one desire seems to be to do right, and to be kind to the people, and, in fact, to 'live for an object,' as she says, 'instead of quite aimlessly.' Will you try and make friends with her?" Lady Isabel asked, as she looked earnestly into her friend's thoughtful face.

It was easy for Mrs. Clemence to explain how, from the extremely opposite tenor of their respective lives hitherto, their paths had never seemed to blend, or even to touch at any given meeting-point; that, in fact, she only slightly knew Etta's mother, and though lately her prayers had been much drawn forth for the pretty-looking girl in her sable garments who so often passed her windows, she had not ventured to make any effort toward cultivating Etta's special acquaintance.

"I know she would like you," said Lady Isabel eagerly; "and it would be so very nice if you could comfort her, or help her in any way. Let us go and call, at any rate."

So after a little more conversation on various topics of mutual interest, they set off on the expedition. Very soon they were driving up the handsome avenue leading to Mr. Fennecker's house, which stood facing the lake, with its green sloping background of endless green, lawns melting into park, and park into distant fields, their gentle undulations shading off every rigid line or barrier into an uncertainty of detail that was perfectly ravishing to the eye.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

S. S. Lesson for May 15th, Luke 16: 19-31. Golden Text, Prov. 14: 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

NOT receiving from the Lord any fresh light on the subject chosen for to-day, we transcribe, with some little alterations, our lesson for October 27th, 1878. Our golden text for to-day reads: "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness: but the righteous hath hope in his death." The Hebrew word here for hope signifies "a just claim," for he obtained "precious faith . . . through the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (2 Pet. 1: 1); he claims life justly, because Christ has died for him.

Our subject presents to us two men, the one lost, the other saved. No positive outward sin is recorded of the lost man, and no righteous action of the saved man. The Pharisees, who were covetous, had heard the Lord's teaching concerning the unjust steward, and then of the utter impossibility of serving two masters, God and mammon, "and they derided Him." To them it was that He addressed this parable: "There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day." The Lord does not condemn either his food or his clothing; most rich men have better coats than poor men, and better food upon their tables: it was not in this that his sin consisted; he paid for what he had, and encouraged trade, and no doubt it was better than hoarding up his money. He seemed to have been kind to the poor, for the beggar who lay at his gate (not outside his gate, but in the lower part of the house) was so well known there, that the very dogs had become familiar with him, and instead of driving him away, as dogs usually do beggars, they "licked his sores." He was outwardly a religious man, for Abraham called him "Son," and he called Abraham "Father." He was more than usually kind-hearted, for even in hell, where his own case was hopeless, he wanted to warn his brethren from following him. Most men while suffering pain have no thought for any but themselves, but this man amid the agonizing torment, which drove him to besiege Heaven for one drop of water, could think of the lost state of his brethren.

What, then, was his sin? That of tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands in our land—perhaps your sin, dear reader; he lived for time, when God had created him for eternity. Sumptuous fare and clothing, ease and comfort, success in business, a good name among men—these were the things he lived for. The light of eternity had never dawned upon his soul; perhaps for one thought he gave to God he would give five hundred to his business or his pleasure, to the fashion of his clothing, to the material, the color; for all such things were an object to him. If the tailor called when family prayer was going on, the interruption was rather a relief than otherwise, and he would give the tailor the precedence, instead of inviting the man to join in prayer for the sake of his soul. No doubt the invitations which he made to his sumptuous feasts were given to the great and noble; the world was in his heart, and in all these things his calculations were for time and not for eternity, for himself and not for God. A business engagement could not be postponed, but a prayer-meeting might be. As a man of business, no doubt every transaction was definite in the extreme, clear, unmistakable; but in his devotions, public or private, there was nothing of the kind. Regular at the synagogue, of course—it was "the thing," he was not a heathen; but in the secret of his soul there was no intercourse with God, a few hurried prayers might appease his own conscience, but the ominous silence between him and his Creator had never been broken; it was the death-sleep of a soul "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. 2: 1). And this was a man living under the avowed obligation to love the Lord his God with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might (Deut. 6: 5).

The beggar who lay at his gate had but one earthly desire—it was "to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table;" he did not so much as ask for the broken bread and meat, but only that which fell among the dust as the dogs' portion. His calculations for time were small indeed, because he was living for eternity. The heir of heaven could afford to take his place among the dogs on earth: he knew that it was not forever; for one day he would "enter in through the gates into the city" where "without are dogs" (Rev. 22: 14, 15). "And it came to pass that the beggar died"; perhaps the dogs missed him more than any one upon earth, but he was not unknown in heaven, for he was carried by the angels into "Abraham's bosom." He had no one to minister to him on earth, but they who "minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation" (Heb. 1: 14), were waiting for him.

"The rich man also died, and was buried." Probably there was a magnificent funeral to celebrate the entry of this ruined soul into its endless misery and desolation. And God lifts the curtain and shows us the great hereafter. We see the rich man in hell, not because he was rich, for Abraham, Joseph, and many of God's children have been rich, who nevertheless faithfully served God. Why, then, do we find him in hell—a man who was no murderer, no thief, no adulterer, no swearer, as far as we know? He was guilty of the loss of his own soul; and so are you, my reader, if your soul is not saved. Some one must be guilty of it, and the guilt lies between you and God; either He is unwilling to save you, or you are unwilling to be saved, for the Bible is witness that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" (1 Tim. 1: 15), and that "He is the propitiation . . . for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2: 2). Can you, do you, judge it possible that He should make a perfect provision for your salvation, and yet be unwilling to save you? Why, then, are you not saved? Where can the fault lie but in your own guilty indifference to the claims upon you of that God who formed you for Himself (Isa. 43: 21)?

In hell the rich man "lift up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham after off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me." None of his formal prayers to God could avail him now, everything appeared in its true light, all was fearfully, unchangeably real. He did not know God, but Abraham, who had once been on earth, seemed more approachable and he appealed to him. Send Lazarus, he cried, "that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame." Poor unhappy soul! he had made his choice for mammon, and he must abide by it. How awfully true it is that "God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting" (Gal. 6: 7,8). The rich man had sowed to the flesh, and there could be no other harvest than that which he so bitterly reaped.

"Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things;" this is all the accusation which Abraham lays to his charge. He had wholly, deliberately, and with perfect freedom of will, chosen to live for time, and the consequences were irreversible. "And likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented." Lazarus was not saved because he was a poor man, but because he honored God and his own soul. If it is a piteous thing when a rich man despises his immortality by living only for time, how much more mad is a poor man who, having so little upon earth, throws away also his chance of heaven! A man who believes that he is in the possession of an immortal soul, and who, by his own free will, for most unworthy considerations, refuses, with his eyes open, that salvation which cost God so much, proves himself to be the suicide of his own soul, and "unworthy of everlasting life" (Acts 13: 46).

All hope was cut off from the poor unhappy man. "And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed; so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence." It is a touching proof of the kind-heartedness of this mistaken man, that just at this juncture he thought of his brethren, and implored that if Lazarus could not come to him, he might at least be sent to warn them. But although on earth, God's people can and should make themselves servants unto all men (1 Cor. 9: 19), yet those who are in heaven are no longer at the disposal of their former superiors in earthly position during their sojourn here. Abraham answered, "They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them." The rich man now knew his own heart, and how little he himself had heeded Moses and the prophets; "Nay, Father Abraham, he said, but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent." And the answer, how solemn it is! "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead." And the Holy Ghost says, "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven (Heb. 12: 25).

"I did not Know I had a Soul" was the confession made at a meeting in London, by a man who had spent his life from boyhood in that city. He was a hostler in a cab-yard. Being called upon lately to speak at a meeting in the Great Ormond Yard Mission Hall, he said: "I ain't ashamed to say what God has done for me. Many of you know what sort of a booser I've been. About four years ago I drunk as heavy as most men. I was soaked with drink; and frequently at night, after a drinking bout, I've had a pail of water by the side of the bed, with a jug swimming on the top, so that I could quench my burning thirst. I didn't care for God nor devil. I don't remember ever entering a church but three times for the last twenty-two years. The first time was to get married, and twice afterward to the christening of two babies. No one ever spoke to me about my soul. I didn't know that I had one until the missionary came and invited me to come to his mission-hall. I came, but I did not care for it. I at length made up my mind if ever I could go twenty-four hours without the drink I would never touch it again. My home was neglected, and both wife and children were afraid of me. I at length gave up the drink, and continued to come to the room; and one Sunday night the missionary spoke about the five bleeding wounds which Christ bore for sinners, and I felt that night as it He was wounded for me. Thank God, I believed, and have been happy ever since."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland have formulated their objections to the Land Bill introduced by Mr. Gladstone in a declaration published and signed by twenty-eight prelates. They recommend the perpetuity of tenure to future tenants; deprecate the exclusion from the benefits of the bill of lease holders and tenants in arrears; recommend a further limitation of the landlord's power to object to an intending tenant, to resume possession and to raise the rent; strongly condemn the emigration provisions, and the omission of laborers from the benefits of the bill, and recommend a comprehensive scheme for the purchase and reclamation of waste lands, arterial drainage, and liberal advances to tenants for improvements. Mr. Gladstone in reply states that while the government will thankfully receive suggestions tending to make the measure more practical and beneficial to the people they cannot accede to the changes the prelates propose, which would give a new character to the bill.

The Remains of the Late Earl of Beaconsfield were interred, in accordance with a request contained in his will, in the churchyard at Hughenden. Among the distinguished persons who attended the ceremony were the Prince of Wales, and his brothers the Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold. The colleagues of the late Earl were also present. It is announced that Mr. Gladstone will propose the vote of a sum of money from the National Treasury to erect a monument in Westminster Abbey in memory of the deceased statesman.

The difficulty of selecting a leader of the Conservative party in the room of Lord Beaconsfield has been met by a temporary expedient. Sir Stafford Northcote, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer in the late Conservative Cabinet, will lead in the House of Commons, and the Duke of Richmond in the Lords. This expedient obviates the invidious task of choosing between Lord Cairns and the Marquis of Salisbury, one of whom will in all probability ultimately become the leader of the party.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Infidel, Recently Re-elected member of the British Parliament, presented himself on April 26th at the Speaker's table to be sworn. Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the Conservatives, objected to the oath being administered. Mr. Gladstone, Mr. John Bright, and several members of the Liberal party spoke in favor of Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to take the oath, but when the House divided on the question permission was refused by a majority of thirty-three. Mr. Bradlaugh was removed by the sergeant-at-arms, but presented himself the following day, when he was again removed. Mr. Gladstone has given notice that he will introduce a bill permitting members of Parliament to swear or affirm, as they may prefer. Mr. Bradlaugh has undertaken, pending the consideration of the bill, to abstain from pressing his claim to his seat.

Anti-Jewish Riots Have Broken Out at Argenau, West Prussia. A mob led by a school teacher has wrecked the houses of some Jews and maltreated the inmates. Serious disturbances, originating in the belief of the peasantry that the Jews used human blood in celebrating their Passover rites, have occurred at Elizabethgrad, in the Government of Kherson, Russia. A mob destroyed the synagogue. Many rioters were killed by the troops which were summoned to repress the riot.

Society in Russia appears to be in an Extremely critical condition. The Czar is still secluded in his country palace, the room, he occupies being the last of a suite which can only be entered by passing through the other rooms, which are occupied by a guard of soldiers. A prominent diplomatist at St. Petersburg reports that the Czar and his favorite counsellors are disposed to adopt rigorous repressive measures having no example in Russian history.

A St. Petersburg despatch says: "It would be difficult to exaggerate the gravity of the situation in Russia at the present moment. Never before was the need of a steady hand at the helm so deeply and so universally felt. It required nothing less than the tragedy of the 13th of March to open men's eyes to the fact that the reform which the revolutionists endeavored to wring from the government by deeds of bloodshed cannot and must not be long delayed." The correspondent goes on to say that a great change has come over the Russian peasant. Servile politeness has given place to an independence, rude and sometimes brutal. "While an old man," he writes, "bows to the passing stranger, a young man goes on his way with a sullen stare. The latter has a dangerous opinion of his rights and wrongs, which makes him in many cases a willing listener to the insidious counsels of revolutionary propagandists. Go where you will, from the White Sea to the Black Sea, from the Danube to the Amoor, the peasants are awaking from the deathlike slumber of centuries."

Abdul Aziz, the Late Sultan of Turkey, who was said to have committed suicide by opening a vein with a pair of scissors, was it appears murdered by his attendants.

Four persons, formerly domestic servants in the imperial palace at Constantinople, have been arrested, charged with the assassination. They have confessed that they suffocated him, after which they opened the veins in his arms to make it appear that he committed suicide. Two ex-palace officials and an ex-war minister are also said to have been implicated. The ex-war minister referred to is believed to be Hussein Avni, who was murdered by Hassan, in 1877, soon after the death of Abdul Aziz.

Edward Miall, a Prominent Leader Among British Nonconformists, died April 30th. He was formerly a Congregational minister at Leicester. He subsequently became editor of the Nonconformist, a journal devoted to the effort to liberate the Episcopal Church from the control of the State. Subsequently he was elected member of Parliament, and so faithfully did he discharge his duties there that a testimonial of $52,000 was presented to him by his constituents as a mark of their esteem. He was sixty-two years of age when he died.

A Jewish Agricultural School has been Established at Jaffa by the Alliance Israelite Universelle. The scheme has obtained encouragement from the Prince of Wales and other royal personages, and it received the approval of the late Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury. A society, comprising already a hundred Jewish families, and which has subscribed 40,000 fr., has been formed at Bucharest; and in influential quarters the movement is now being furthered. It is believed that if they were convinced that their lands would be secured by inalienable rights large numbers of Jews would relinquish trade and become farmers in Palestine. Students of prophecy are watching the growth of this nucleus with profound interest.

Human Sacrifices at Abomey, in Equatorial Africa still prevail, as witnessed by the Rev. J. Milum, who is the general superintendent of the Wesleyan mission station in the Yoruba and Papo districts. He left Lagos on the 15th of December last, and visited Porto Novo, Godoney Whydan, Grand Papo Aghway, Little Popo, Porto Selguro, and Abomey. During the missionary's stay, the annual "customs" were being held at Abomey. These were of the most horrible description, several hundreds of the natives being killed in the most barbarous manner, and offered in sacrifice. The customs were observed, notwithstanding the presence of the missionary. Abomey is under French protection, King Gelele being the reigning monarch. Mr. Milum had a conference with the king and the prince respecting the re-establishing of a mission-house at Whydah.

France and Tunis.—The Nations of Europe are so jealous one of another, and distrust each other so thoroughly, that a slight spark may kindle a general European war at any time. On this account the complication in which France is now involved with the Bey of Tunis occasions some anxiety. The cause of the trouble is as follows: A marauding tribe, or collection of tribes, on the Algerian border, called Khroumirs, having crossed the frontier, attacked a military post, killing several of the French soldiers who defended it. A French force has been dispatched for the purpose of chastising the marauders. The incident has been much magnified in France by a large class of politicians who would gladly see their country make a step forward in the direction of Tunis. The Khroumirs do not acknowledge the sovereignty of the Bey of Tunis, but occupy a small patch of hilly ground between Algeria and Tunis, whence they descend and levy contributions impartially upon both countries. Italians, and, indirectly, Englishmen, have lately come into collision with French interests in Tunis. The Rubattino Railway and the Enfida questions have served to demonstrate French commercial activity backed up by the government at home. Taken together, they cannot fail to produce an impression that France would like to find in Africa an outlet for energies or ambition which have received a check on the continent of Europe. The Bey of Tunis has a considerable body of troops ready to march toward the frontier, but whether it is intended to co-operate with the French troops against the Khroumirs, or in hostility to France, is not known.

The Eightieth Birthday of the Earl of Shaftesbury was celebrated on the 28th of April, at the Mansion House, London, the use of which had been placed at the disposal of the committee of the Ragged School Union by the Lord Mayor, who presided on the occasion. In anticipation of this event the children and teachers of the Ragged Schools of London purchased the portrait of his lordship, lately painted by Mr. B. S. Marks, and presented it to him in grateful remembrance of his lifelong services in the cause of suffering humanity.

Major Whittle and Mr. and Mrs. McGranahan have received much of the Divine blessing upon their work in Aberdeen and Dundee, Scotland, where for about two months they have preached and sung the good news of salvation. The solemnity which has characterized the meetings has been an evidence of the depth and reality of the work. The severe winter through which these honored evangelists have passed in the north of Scotland has so affected their throats that they will probably go to the south of Europe for a short period before resuming work. They expect to sail for America in June.

A Public Meeting, Convened by the National Temperance League, was recently held in Exeter Hall, London, for the purpose of hearing addresses from some of the twenty-eight mayors of English cities and boroughs who are total abstainers from intoxicating drinks. The Lord Mayor of York (Mr. Rowntree) presided, and said that on his election to the municipal office he expressed his determination to carry into the Mansion House the practice of his own home, and not set intoxicating drinks before his guests. The Mayor of Leeds has also banished alcohol from the mayor's parlor.

FASCINATING and romantic as are many characters depicted on the pages of history and fiction, to very few can those epithets be so appropriately applied as to that of the distinguished British statesman, who on April 19th closed his eyes in death. Apart from his merits as a statesman, Lord Beaconsfield's strange yet brilliant life deserves careful study. His was the most remarkable and interesting figure on the stage of British public life. It piqued curiosity; for he loved to surround himself with a haze of mystery, and delighted in the sobriquet of "the sphinx," which political humorists gave him. It compelled admiration; for his success was an evidence of splendid genius and indomitable courage. It excited wonder; for while leading a party traditionally associated with conservatism and suspected of reactionary proclivities, he introduced and passed a measure so radical that even advanced Liberals trembled at its daring. It was so altogether unlike any other prominent figure in the history of British statesmanship, that while he was in power the public were not only unable to account for what he had done, but were in a perpetual state of uncertainty as to what he might do next. Such a character cannot fail to attract attention in any sphere of life, but when it is in so prominent a position as Lord Beaconsfield occupied, it becomes intensely interesting.

Benjamin Disraeli was born December 21st, 1804. His father, Isaac D'Israeli, was living at the time in chambers in the Adelphi, London, and there the future statesman first saw the light. The D'Israelis were Jews whose had formerly been settled in Spain; but owing to the persecutions of Torquemada and the Inquisition, they left that country in the fifteenth century and took refuge in Venice. The persecution they had endured had been fierce, but they had never wavered in fidelity to their race and faith. They clung to them even more tenaciously on that account, and when they removed to Venice they resolved, so far from concealing their race, to identify themselves still more closely with it. For this purpose they assumed the surname of D'Israeli (of Israel) a name never borne by any other family. In 1749 the grandfather of Lord Beaconsfield, hearing that the government of England were favorably disposed toward the Jews, decided on living there.

The Venetian Jew was disappointed on his arrival, as were many others of his people, to find the policy of the government reversed. The Jewish Naturalization Act was repealed and the immigrant Jews were forced to remain for a long time foreigners in the land of their adoption. Lord Beaconsfield often spoke in after years in strong terms of admiration of his grandfather, whom he described as a man of "ardent character, sanguine, courageous, speculative, and fortunate; with a temper which no disappointment could disturb, and a brain amid reverses full of resource." The old man died when his grandson was a boy of twelve years, but his memory was always cherished with pride and affection. He had sought refuge from the social proscription of his time in commerce and had amassed a considerable fortune.

His son Isaac, the father of the statesman, was the cause of grief and disappointment to the aged Jew. He had expended a large sum on his education, which had been conducted in England and Holland, but instead of devoting himself to the pursuits his father had followed, Isaac openly avowed Rousseauism, and cared for nothing but literature. He lived literally in a library and never went abroad except in quest of books. He still maintained a formal connection with the synagogue, so far as his annual subscription of fifty dollars was concerned, but he seldom attended the services. Even this slender connection was severed in 1813, when, on being elected to the office of warden of the synagogue, he refused to serve. He was fined $200 as the penalty of refusal, which he declared he would never pay, and requested that his name should be erased from the Yehedim or list of members. The fine, however, he subsequently paid, in order to procure certificates of the birth of his children, who had been admitted to the covenant with the usual rite (Genesis 17 : 10). But with the payment of the fine his connection with the synagogue ceased.

Although formally received into the Jewish community Benjamin Disraeli appears never to have had any subsequent connection with it. He was baptized in an Episcopal church in Holborn, London, on July 31st, 1817, when he was twelve years of age, and the record of the ceremony may still be read on the church registers. The circumstances which led to this event are variously described, but the generally accepted account is, that Samuel Rogers, a banker and a poet, a friend of Isaac D'Israeli, was struck by the abilities of the boy, and one day, when the father was absent from home, he took him to the church and had him baptized. Rogers does not appear to have taken this step from any desire for the spiritual good of the child, for he considered baptism a mere empty form, but he is said to have expressed the opinion that it was "hard a small matter should stand in the way of a clever boy's prospects." But though he became in name at least a Christian, he never wavered in his pride of his Jewish origin. Throughout his life he maintained that no race had ever done so much for the world as the Jews, and that in every department demanding genius and intellectual power—in literature, in music, in science and art, the brightest stars have been those who have had Jewish blood in their veins.

The

of the future Earl of Beaconsfield is involved in obscurity. It is known that he went to a boarding school when a small boy, and that subsequently a Unitarian minister had him as a pupil, but that is all that can be asserted on this point. What other teachers he had no one seems to be aware of, and none of the English public schools or universities ever claimed him among their students. His father doubtless did much to cultivate his youthful mind, and in accordance with that father's wish he became an attorney's clerk. He was put with the firm of Swain & Co., in the Old Jewry, London, but the project of making him a lawyer was speedily abandoned, with the consent of everybody concerned, and his brother took his place. It is however an evidence of his own abilities as well as his father's influence that in all the acquirements which it is popularly supposed a university training alone can give, Lord Beaconsfield never showed any deficiency. In all his speeches, public addresses, and works of imagination, Benjamin Disraeli exhibited a chaste diction, and showed that he had no inconsiderable knowledge of the subjects which form the curriculum at eminent universities.

On his return to his father's house, Benjamin Disraeli found himself in the midst of a brilliant circle of men of letters to whom Isaac D'Israeli had become known through his work on the "Curiosities of Literature." His father's fame and his own intelligence and talents easily obtained for him an entrance into a section of the best London society, to which the greater lights of literature, art, and music were drawn. The house of the famous Countess of Blessington was one of these meeting places. Here he met Prince Louis Napoleon, afterwards Emperor of the French, Thomas Moore, Theodore Hook, Horace Smith, Lord Lyndhurst, and other celebrities of the day. Here it was that his was fed and his resolution to distinguish himself as an author was confirmed.

It was in 1826 that his first notable work, "Vivian Grey," was published anonymously. It was very popular, despite its faults. It was the town talk, and society set to work to fix every character in the novel on a living representative, and before the end of 1827 "A Key to Vivian Grey" reached its tenth edition. The hero of the novel was a young man ambitious of political distinction, and the work read now in the light of the author's subsequent career, seems like a prophetic forecast of his own future.

The next two or three years Disraeli spent in foreign travel, visiting the chief countries of the East, and storing his mind with impressions which manifested themselves very clearly in his subsequent writings and in the development of his character; and notably his strong conviction as to "the supremacy of the Jewish mind." When the "Young Duke," which was published in 1831, was written is not clear; but his next novel, "Contarini Fleming," published in 1832, was distinctly a product of these years of travel. Its design was to describe the development and formation of the poetic character, but it was published anonymously in the midst of the social and political excitement occasioned by the first Reform Bill, and was little read. Disraeli on his foreign tour was accompanied by his sister and her betrothed, a Mr. Meredith, who died on the journey. He went to Constantinople, to Albania, Syria, and Egypt, besides the various civilized localities of Europe, including Spain. He had several narrow escapes, for at Janina he found himself inclosed by a revolt of the Albanians, and at Jerusalem he was nearly killed by an enraged Mahometan guard while trying to penetrate into the Mosque of Omar.

He returned to England with a fixed

and devote himself to a political career. During his absence his father had taken Bradenham House in Buckinghamshire, and when a vacancy occurred for the adjacent borough of High Wycombe, in 1832, the brilliant young novelist offered himself as a candidate. He described himself to the electors as a Reformer, and his candidature was upheld by the strong Reformers, Mr. Joseph Hume and Daniel O'Connell. The election was the last in England under the old form, for the Reform Bill had passed though it had not yet come into operation. Thirty-five voters were all the borough contained, so small a portion of the population had at that time the privilege of the franchise. In spite of an eloquent speech, Mr. Disraeli could only obtain twelve of the thirty-five votes, and his rival, General Grey, was therefore elected. He was not, however, disheartened, for when, a short time after his failure, the Hon. Mrs. Norton, who took an interest in the young aspirant, thinking an introduction to Viscount Melbourne might be useful to him, invited him to meet the Minister at her house. Lord Melbourne said to him, "Well, now, tell me, what do you want to be?" The quiet gravity of the reply "I want to be a Minister" astonished his lordship. "No chance of that in our time," the eminent statesman replied, but many years afterward when he listened to a vigorous speech his old acquaintance delivered in the House of Commons, he said, "I believe he will do it yet."

Three more attempts did Disraeli make to obtain a seat in Parliament without success; these were at a second election at High Wycombe, at Marylebone, and at Taunton. But in 1827 he was elected on the Conservative platform by the voters of Maidstone, in the County of Kent. His colleague was Mr. Wyndham Lewis, who was, during the remainder of his life, Disraeli's warm friend and prudent adviser. It was Mrs. Lewis, the widow of this gentleman, who afterward became Mrs. Disraeli, and who made him the most devoted of wives, as he was the most devoted of husbands.

While Disraeli had thus been struggling to become a member of Parliament his pen had not been idle. Although in a whirl of excitement he had written several fictions, among which the most prominent were "Contarini Fleming" and "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy."

HIS FIRST SPEECH

in the House of Commons would have disheartened any man less indomitable than himself. As he rose to address the house his appearance and dress were so showy and theatrical as to excite the derision of the members. The newspapers of the day give the following description of him: "He was very showily attired, being dressed in a bottle-green frock-coat and a waistcoat of white, the front of which exhibited a network of glittering chains; large fancy-pattern pantaloons, and a black tie, above which no shirt collar was visible, completed the outward man. A countenance lividly pale, set out by a pair of intensely black eyes, and a broad but not very high forehead, overhung by clustering ringlets of coal-black hair, which, combed away from the right temple, fell in bunches of well-oiled small ringlets over his left cheek."

He was greeted with shouts of laughter before he had uttered many sentences, and at length he was so persistently interrupted by ironical cheers and laughter that he became confused and broke down ignominiously. Before he resumed his seat, however, he gave utterance to the following prophecy, which in after days when the House hung breathless on his words was often recalled: "I am not at all surprised, sir, at the reception which I have received. I have begun several times many things and I have often succeeded at last. Ay, sir, and though I sit down now, the time will come when you will hear me." He delivered the last sentence in a very loud tone, and resumed his seat. A man of even ordinary sensitiveness would have felt this catastrophe so seriously as to hide his head, if not for ever, at least for a considerable period. Not so Mr. Disraeli. Seven days after his first calamitous effort he again addressed the "House." He spoke but three times after during the session of 1837–8.

During the two years which followed Disraeli's first appearance in Parliament he found time to write at least two novels, and the famous "Letters of Runnymede," which appeared originally in the London Times but were afterwards collected and published in book form. He was steadily working his way in Parliament as a member of the Conservative Party, of which Sir Robert Peel was the able leader. When in 1846 the crucial question of free trade arose and Peel abjured protection, the Conservative Party stood aghast at the act. A moment of suspense ensued and it was uncertain whether the well-disciplined followers would be faithful to their chief or to their principles. That was the supreme crisis of Disraeli's life. He rose in the House and denounced Peel as a traitor to his party. "Well do we remember," he said, "on this side the House—not perhaps without a blush—the efforts we made to raise him to the bench where he now sits. Who does not remember the sacred cause of protection, for which sovereigns were thwarted, Parliament dissolved and a nation taken in. I belong to a party which can triumph no more, for we have nothing left on our side, except the constituencies which we have not betrayed." That speech was in Disraeli's history and in British politics. The Conservative Party was rent in twain, and while many able members, of whom Mr. Gladstone was one, followed Peel and eventually joined the Liberals, Lord George Bentinck became leader of the Conservative Party, with Mr. Disraeli as his energetic lieutenant. In 1847 Bentinck died and Mr. Disraeli became the recognized leader of the Conservative Party in the House of Commons. He had toiled in the House twenty years to attain that position, but during that period he had by the sheer force of genius and indomitable perseverance distanced all his contemporaries.

It was at this time that Mr. Disraeli first displayed his consummate abilities as a party leader. Petty personal jealousies there were certain to be in the ranks; country squires proud of their pedigree and their broad acres; scions of noble houses whose ancestors for many generations had held honorable places in Parliament, were naturally disinclined to acknowledge as their chief the descendant of a Venetian Jew, a mere political adventurer. But with rare tact and skill all disposition to mutiny was overcome, and in a short time Mr. Disraeli was followed by a compact and loyal party, over whom he maintained his ascendency until his death.

The first time Mr. Disraeli ever held office was in 1851, when the late Earl of Derby became Premier and offered Mr. Disraeli the Chancellorship of the Exchequer. He was not a brilliant financier, for he had throughout his life a dislike of the small details of business, in which Mr. Gladstone takes so great a delight. For the various questions involved in the statement of the national balance-sheet he relied on his subordinates, and his financial projects were neither original nor profound. But his speeches on general questions of national policy, and especially on foreign affairs, called forth his best efforts and displayed his abilities as a statesman. His tenure of office under the Earl of Derby was but of short duration, and after a hostile vote of the House of Commons he and his colleagues gave place to a Liberal administration. On two subsequent occasions Mr. Disraeli held the same office under the same Premier, and during the last term he succeeded in passing a measure widely extending the franchise, after the Liberals had ignominiously failed in a like effort of a more moderate character.

It was in 1868 that Mr. Disraeli first grasped the great prize which is the summit of an English politician's ambition—he became

PRIME MINISTER OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Lord Derby suffered from an acute attack of sickness early in the year, and although he rallied for a time, he accepted the illness as a warning, and retired from office. Then Queen Victoria invited Mr. Disraeli to accept the vacant post, and it is related as a curious coincidence that the bearer of her autograph letter offering Mr. Disraeli the highest honor it was in her power to confer, was the very man who thirty-six years before had defeated him in his first attempt to obtain a seat in Parliament. His administration continued only ten months. The question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church became a prominent topic of the time, and Mr. Disraeli's policy with regard to it was condemned in the House of Commons by a majority of sixty-five. He appealed to the people by dissolving Parliament, but when a new House was elected many of his supporters lost their seats and a decisive majority was opposed to him. He therefore resigned and his rival Mr. Gladstone became Prime Minister.

The Gladstone administration remained in power five years and two months, and then the sudden resolution of Mr. Gladstone to dissolve Parliament was announced.

During the interval that occurred between the election of 1868 and 1874 a Conservative reaction had set in and had been steadily growing. The Liberal administration had inaugurated many needed reforms, but they had also made many enemies. They had offended the clergy by their Irish Church policy, the Nonconformists by their Educational policy, and the liquor dealers by diminishing the hours during which the saloons might remain open. These enemies of the government were powerful, and besides these there were many high-spirited Englishmen who felt ashamed of the foreign policy of the Liberals, who had allowed Russia to annul the Treaty of Paris. The result of the combined opposition was the defeat of Mr. Gladstone's followers at the polls. That statesman followed the example of Mr. Disraeli and resigned as soon as the result of the elections was known, and on February 21st, 1874, Mr. Disraeli again became Prime Minister.

The events of Mr. Disraeli's last term of office will be fresh in the recollection of our readers. Though he had been in office before, he had never really been in power, for his majority had been so small that he was forced to depend on independent members for the strength requisite to carry his measures. But in 1874 the supporters of Mr. Disraeli numbered a clear majority of fifty over all other political sections, and they could be relied upon for steady and unwavering allegiance. Mr. Disraeli's rivals have made it a matter for reproach that, with so large a majority at his command, he accomplished so little of really valuable legislation. But on the other hand it should be remembered that the principles on which the Conservative success was attained were those of rest and quiet. The country was tired of the rapid progress and general disturbance Mr. Gladstone had maintained. The value of the reforms he had effected were not denied, but a fear of disorganization had spread among the people and a dread lest further changes might be effected before society was prepared to receive them. Mr. Disraeli therefore would have been false to Conservative principles had he undertaken work comparable with the Repeal of the Corn Laws or the removal of Catholic disabilities.

A task was committed to his hands, however, and to this he set himself with ready and enthusiastic energy. It was that of re-establishing English influence in European affairs. Rightly or wrongly Englishmen regretted that the non-intervention policy of the Liberals, economical as it had been, had produced its natural result of lowering British prestige abroad. National vanity was wounded, and craved a renewal of bygone glory. The outbreak of the war between Russia and Turkey, followed by the defeat of the latter Power, and the dictation of humiliating terms by the conqueror gave the Conservative Premier the opportunity he needed. Russia was told courteously but firmly that England could not permit the Treaty of San Stefano to be executed; and as an intimation of her determination to prevent it by force if necessary, a detachment of troops was brought from India as a practical preparation for war. The Congress of Berlin followed, and the British Premier there confronted the Czar and tore his treaty to shreds. The "Peace with Honor" which Lord Beaconsfield and his lieutenant and former rival, Lord Salisbury, brought back from Berlin was the crowning triumph of his life. How far Turkey materially profited by the results of that Congress may be doubted, but there can be no doubt that British prestige in Europe was raised by the bold policy of Lord Beaconsfield.

Had Parliament been dissolved immediately after the Congress of Berlin Lord Beaconsfield would have probably been granted a further lease of power, but the opportunity passed by, and when in March, 1880, an appeal was made to the people, Mr. Gladstone's followers were elected by a large majority and Lord Beaconsfield resigned.

of Lord Beaconsfield's brilliant career was not at that time believed to be so near as it really was. Late hours in the House of Commons and the constant wear and tear of mind entailed on the leader of a great party there, had undermined his health, and he reluctantly consented some time before his defeat to quit the House of Commons, the scene of his triumphs, and by accepting a peerage, to transfer his labors to the House of Lords, where the sittings are not so long and where the strain of mind is not so great. He was created Earl of Beaconsfield, and on his return from Berlin was made a Knight of the Garter.

With the opening of Parliament in January last he was in his place and apparently robust; and when seen in society nobody could have detected any sign of weakness or decay in him. He was, however, seized with sudden illness at the end of March, and on April 19th he died.

But little has ever been made public of Lord Beaconsfield's spiritual state. As Premier it fell to his lot to nominate several bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and the selections he made indicate that he understood and appreciated the value of evangelical doctrine. The London Record, an organ of the Episcopal Church, in a notice of the deceased statesman says:

"Lord Beaconsfield's ecclesiastical patronage was well bestowed. Bishops Claughton, Jones, and Lightfoot were recommended by Lord Beaconsfield, as were those three excellent Bishops, Rowley Hill, Thorold, Ryle. Dean Fremantle was likewise appointed by Lord Beaconsfield as a worthy successor of Dean McNeile, and we believe that the excellent Canon Orlando Forester, whom he made Canon Residentiary of York, was one whom Lord Beaconsfield always consulted as a friend. We reckon it a cause of thankfulness that the departed statesman was in his last illness attended by a physician so well able to minister to the soul as well as to the body as Dr. Kidd. It is pleasant to know that the ex-Premier had by his dying bed one who knew the only solid ground of comfort, and could direct his patient to the Lamb of God, who died for our sins and was raised again for our justification."

Strong exhortation to Christian work, Christian development, Read and be strengthened in Christ, ONWARD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, May 8, 1881.

"Go forward."—EXODUS 14 : 15.

Masterly Retreat an Impossibility in Religion—Forward the only Battle-Cry—May-time in the Soul—Words of Counsel—I. Have a High Model—Fortunes in a Battered Ship—Avoid Pernicious Associations—Right Kind of Company—Better than Ourselves—Ten Chances to One—III. Be Actively Employed—Pride in Doubts—God's Judgment on Idleness—A World of Insects for the Lazy—IV. Be Faithful in Prayer—The Test of Christian Progress—Two Sabbath-School Teachers—Apparel or Prayer—V. Be Faithful in Bible Research——Decanted Mineral Water—The Crowning Meanness of the Centuries—Stealing a Compass from an Imperilled Crew—Robbing an Old Traveller of Light and Staff—Cling to the Bible.

[A very impressive scene was witnessed at the Tabernacle before Dr. Talmage commenced his sermon. Occupying seats on the platform with the preacher were nine clergymen, and ranged in the front seats in the area were three hundred and ten new members who have been received into the church as the result of the blessing of God on the revival services now concluded. Dr. Talmage read their names from the platform and then he and one of the elders passed through the throng and gave to each the right hand of fellowship. This addition raises the number of members in the church at the Brooklyn Tabernacle to twenty five hundred and eighty-nine.]

"MASTERLY retreat" is a term often used in military circles, but in religion there is no such thing. It is either glorious advance or disgraceful and ignominious falling back. I address the more than three hundred members added to-day, and indeed all Christians, in the order given to the Israelites by the Lord through Moses :—"Go forward."

It would be a strange thing if all our anxiety about men ceased the moment they were converted. You would almost doubt the sanity of that farmer who having planted the corn and seen it just sprout above ground, should say : "My work is all done. I have no more anxiety for the field." No. There is work for the plough and the hoe, and there must be a careful keeping up of the fences, and there must be a frightening away of the birds that would pillage the field. And I say the entrance upon Christian life is only the implantation of grace in the heart.

There is earnest, hard work yet to be done, and perhaps many years of anxiety before there shall be heard the glorious shout of "Harvest home." The beginning to be a Christian is only putting down the foundation ; but after that there are years of hammering, polishing, carving, lifting, before the structure is completed. It takes five years to make a Christian character ; it takes twenty years ; it takes forty years ; it takes seventy years, if a man shall live so long. In other words, a man dying after half a century of Christian experience feels that he has only learned the "A B C's" of a glorious alphabet.

It is May now in the natural world. The will soon scatter, but the pumps are busy in the trees, the apple-tree and the pear-tree and the plum-tree, sending forth fountains of life that will after a while hang out in luscious fruit. And so it is in the hearts of many of you this May morning. The May blossoms of your first experience will scatter and we are anxiously watching whether all those spring blossoms will show themselves in the grand, ripe, glorious fruit of Christian character.

The next year will decide a great deal in your history, young Christian man. It will decide whether you are to be a burning and shining light of the church, or a spark of grace covered up in a barrel of ashes. It will decide whether you are to be a strong man in Christ Jesus, with gigantic blows striking the iron mail of darkness, or a bedwarfed, whining, grumbling soldier, that ought to be drummed out of the Lord's camp with the "Rogues' March."

You have only just been launched ; the voyage is to be made. Earth and heaven and hell are watching to see how fast you will sail, how well you will weather the tempest, and whether at last amid the shouting of the angels, you shall come into the right harbor. May God help me this morning to give you three or four words of Christian counsel, as I address myself more especially to those who have just now entered the Christian life.

I. My first word of counsel is, hold before your soul

A VERY HIGH MODEL.

Do not say, "I wish I could pray like that man, or speak like this man, or have the consecration of this one." Say : "Here is the Lord Jesus Christ, a perfect pattern. By that I mean, with God's grace, to shape all my life." In other words you will never be any more a Christian than you strive to be. If you build a foundation twenty by thirty feet you will only have a small house. If you build a foundation one hundred by one hundred feet, you will have a large house. If you resolve to be only a middling Christian, you will only be a middling Christian. If you have no high aspiration in a worldly direction you will never succeed in business. If you have no high aspiration in religious things you will never succeed in religion. You have a right to aspire to the very highest style of Christian character.

From your feet there reaches out a path of Christian attainment which you may take, and I deliberately say that you may be a better man than was Paul, or David, or Summerfield, or Doddridge—a better woman than Hannah More or Charlotte Elizabeth. Why not ? Did they have a monopoly of Christian grace ? Did they have a private key of the storehouse of God's mercy ? Does God shut you out from the gladness and goodness to which they were introduced ? Oh, no. You have just the same promises, just the same Christ, just the same Holy Ghost, just the same offers of present and everlasting love, and if you fall short of what they were—aye, if you do not come up to the point which they reached and go beyond it—it is not because Christ has shut you out from any point of moral and spiritual elevation, but because you deliberately refused to take it.

I admit that man cannot become a Christian like that without a struggle ; but what do you get without fighting for it ? The fortresses of darkness are to be taken by storm. You may by acute strategy flank the hosts of temptation ; but there are temptations, there are evils, in the way that you will have to meet face to face, and it will be shot for shot, gun for gun, grip for grip, slaughter for slaughter. The Apostle Paul over and over again represents the Christian life as a combat.

When the war-vessel of Christ's Church comes into glory bringing its crew and its passengers, it will not come in like a North River yacht, beautifully painted and adorned, swinging into the boat-house after a pleasure excursion. Oh, no. It will be like a vessel coming with a heavy cargo from China or India, the marks of the wave and the hurricane upon it—sails rent, rigging spliced, pumps all working to keep her afloat, bulwarks knocked away.

I see such a vessel coming and I get out my small boat and push towards her, and I shout : "Ahoy, captain ! What are you going to do with those shivered timbers ? That was a beautiful ship when you went out but you have ruined it.' "Oh," says the captain, "I have a fine cargo on board, and by this round trip I have made ten fortunes." So I believe it will be when the Christian soul at last comes into the harbor of heaven. It will come bearing upon it the marks of a great stress of weather. You can see by the very looks of that soul as it comes into glory that it was driven by the storm and dashed in the hurricane ; but by so much as the voyage was rough, will the harbor be blessed. "If ye suffered with Him on earth, ye shall be glorified with Him in heaven."

Aim high. Do not be satisfied to be like the Christians all around about you. Be more than they have ever been for Christ. An old Arabian king was showing a beautiful sword that had been given him, when one of his courtiers said : "This sword is too short. You cannot do anything with it." Said the king's son : "To a brave man no sword is too short. If it be too short, take one step in advance, and then it is long enough." So I say to any Christian who may feel that he has poor weapons with which to fight against sin and darkness and death : "Advance upon the enemy. In the strength of Christ go forward. Put mo strength. God is for you, and if God be for yo who can be against you ? Remember that Go never puts you in battle but He gives you weapo with which to fight."

II. My second word of counsel to those who ha recently entered upon Christian life is : absta from all and take only those that are useful and beneficer Stay out of all associations that would dama your Christian character. Take only those ass ciations that will help you. A learned m said : "If I stay with that man Fenelon a longer, I shall get to be a Christian in spite myself." In other words there is a mighty pov in Christian associations.

Now, what kind of associations shall we, young Christians, seek after ? I think we ought try to get in company better than ourselves, ne going into company worse than ourselves. If get into company a little better than ourselves there are ten people in that company, ten chan to one we will be bettered. If we get into co pany a little worse than ourselves and there ten people in that company, ten chances to o we will be made worse than we were before.

Now, when a young Christian enters the churc God does not ask him to be a monk. God d not ask her to be a nun. There is no virtue monasticism. The anchorite that lives on ac is no nearer heaven than the man who lives on p tridge and wild duck. Isolation is not demand by the Bible. A man may use the world with restriction of not abusing it. But just as soon you find any surroundings pernicious to y spiritual interest, quit those associations.

This remark is more especially appropriate to the young. Now it is impossible that the you and untroubled should seek their associations w those who are aged and worn out. As God intended the aged to associate with the aged, tal over the past and walking staff in hand along the same paths they trod, thirty, forty, and fifty yrs ago, so I suppose He intended the young chief to associate with the young. The grace of God does not demand that we be unnatural. I do not wi you to take this caution I have given you as th of a growling misanthrope, hating hilarity. For ou must have a spring bow if you want to make the arrow fly. But while this is so, I want you t be especially on guard in this matter and let thre ligion of Jesus Christ control you in all your so ciations.

I know young people who have meant well enough, but they have floated off into evil influences, and they have associated day by day with those who hated God and despised His commandments, and their characters are all depleted. Can see they are changed for the worse, but the are not aware of it. O young man, come out of that bad association. I do not know what it is. I do not know to what place you may have a private key. I do not know to what place you go without the sanction of those who love you very much. I do not pretend to point out any evil influences but are there not some surrounding influences that are pernicious to your growth in grace ? Stand back from that furnace in which so many young Christians have been destroyed.

In this church there is a large company of young men and young women consecrated to Christ. I know of no better people than they are. Young convert, I invite you into their friendship. Contact with them will elevate you. All hail, young followers of Jesus Christ, my joy and my pride ! My heart thrills at every step of your advancement. I talked with you in that hour when you first fled to break from sin, and I now rejoice as I see you putting on the armor of a conflict in which God will give you present and everlasting victory. Stand off from all evil associations. A man is no better than the company he keeps. Go among those who are better than you are, and you will be made better. Go among those who are worse than you are and you will be made worse.

III. My next word of counsel is that you see a great many Christians with doubts and plexities, and they seem to be proud of them. eir entire Christian life is made up of gloom, and y seem to cultivate that spiritual despondency, en I will undertake to say that in nine cases out ten spiritual despondency is a judgment of God on idleness. Who are the happy people in the urch to-day? The busy people. Show me a n who professes the religion of Jesus Christ and dle, and I will show you an unhappy man. The y first prescription that I give to a man when I d him full of doubts and fears about his eternal erest is to go to work for God. Ten thousand ices are lifted up asking for your help. Go and lp.

Here is a wood full of summer insects. An eman goes into the wood to cut firewood. The ects do not bother him very much, and every oke of the axe makes them fly about. But let a n go and lie down there and he is bitten and uled, and thinks it is a horrible thing to stay in e wood. Why does he not take an axe and go work? So there are thousands of Christians now the church who go out amid great annoyances life—they are not perplexed, they are all the time sy; while there are others who do nothing and ey are stung and stung and stung and covered m head to foot with the blotches of indolence d inactivity, and spiritual death.

The first thing then you have to do, O Christian ung man, Christian young woman, is to go to rk in the service of the Lord if you want to be a ppy Christian. When an army goes out there e always stragglers falling off here and there, me because they are faint and sick, but a great ny because they are afraid to fight and too lazy march. After awhile the lazy men on the road ar the booming of the guns for hours, and they ar the shout of victory, and a man on horseback mes up and says: "We have won the day." en they hasten up. How brave they are after e battle is over. Poor at fighting but grand at uzza!" So there are stragglers going after the rd's host. There come days of darkness and ttle. Where are they. We call the roll of the st. They make no answer, but after awhile ere comes a day of triumph in the church, and ey are all about. "Huzza! huzza! Didn't we e it to them!"

IV. I have another word of counsel to give ose who have just entered Christian life, and that

BE FAITHFUL IN PRAYER.

You might as well, business man, start out in e morning without food and expect to be strong that day—you might as well abstain from food the week and expect to be strong physically, as be strong without prayer. The only way to get y strength into the soul is by prayer, and the only ference between that Christian that is worth erything and that who is worth nothing is the t that the last does not pray and the other does. nd the only difference between this Christian who getting along very fast in the holy life and this o is only getting along tolerably is that the first ays more than the last.

You can graduate a man's progress in religion by e amount of prayer, not by the number of hours, rhaps, but by the earnest supplication that he ts up to God. There is no exception to the rule. ow me a Christian man who neglects this kind duty and I will show you one who is inconsist- t. Show me a man who prays, and his strength d his power cannot be exaggerated. Why, just ve to a man this power of prayer and you give m almost omnipotence.

This afternoon you will see

hat one does not gain the attention of her class. his one does. What is the difference between em, their intellects being about equal? The first ought only of her own apparel. The other came om great prostration before God in earnest sup- ication, asking that God's mercy might come on the school, and that in the afternoon she ight gain the attention of those five or six im- ortals that would be around her. The one acher has no control over her class. The other sits as with the strength of the Lord God Almighty.

A minister comes into the pulpit. He has a magnificent sermon, all the sentences rounded according to the laws of rhetoric and fine sermonizing, and the truth makes no impression on the hearts of men. People go away and say: "Very beautiful, wasn't it?" A plain man comes into the pulpit. He has been on his knees before God, asking for an especial message that day, and the hearts of men open to the plain truth, the broken sentences strike into their consciences, and, though the people may disperse at the close of the services seemingly without having received any impression, that night voices will be lifted in some household: "Men and Brethren what shall we do to be saved?" Oh, this power of prayer! Pray! Pray!

V. Another word of counsel I have to give. Be faithful in BIBLE RESEARCH.

A great many good books are now coming out. We cannot read half of them. At every revolution of the printing press they are coming. They cover our parlor tables, and are in our sitting-rooms and libraries. Glorious books they are. We thank God every day for the work of the Christian printing press. But I have thought that perhaps the followers of Christ sometimes allow this religious literature to take their attention from God's word, and that there may not be as much Bible reading as there ought to be.

How is that with your own experience? Just calculate in your minds how much religious literature you have read during the year, and then how large a portion of the Word of God you have read, and then contrast the two and answer within your own soul whether you are giving more attention to the books that were written by the hand of man or that written by the hand of God. Now, you go to the drug store and you get the mineral waters; but you have noticed that the waters are not so fresh or sparkling or healthful as when you get these very waters at Saratoga and Sharon—getting them right where they bubble from the rock. And I have noticed the same thing in regard to the truth of the Gospel; while there is a good deal of refreshment and health of the Gospel of God as it comes through good books, I find it is better when I come to the eternal rock of God's Word and drink from that fountain that bubbles up fresh and pure to the life and the refreshment and the health of the soul.

Read the Bible and it brings you into the association of the best people that ever lived. You stand beside Moses, and learn his meekness, beside Job and learn his patience, beside Paul and catch something of his enthusiasm, beside Christ and you feel His love. And yet how strange it is that a great many men have given their whole lives to the assaulting of that book. I cannot understand it. Tom Paine worked against that book as though he received large wages and was inspired by the very powers of darkness, confessing that all the time he was writing he did not have the Bible anywhere near him.

How many powerful intellects have endeavored to destroy it. Hume, Bolingbroke, Voltaire have been after it. Ten thousand men now are warring against the truth of God's word. What do you think of them? I think it is mean, and will prove it. I will prove it is that has ever been done

IN ALL THE CENTURIES.

There is a ship at sea and in trouble. The captain and the crew are at their wits' end. You are on board. You are an old seaman. You come up and give some good counsel, which is kindly taken. That is all right. But suppose, instead of doing that, in the midst of all the trouble you pick up the only compass that is on board and pitch it over the taffrail? Oh, you say, that is mean--dastardly. Is it as mean as this? Here is the vessel of the world going on with fourteen hundred millions of passengers, tossed and driven in the tempest, and at the time we want help the infidel comes and he takes hold of the only compass and he tries to pitch it overboard. It is contemptible beyond everything that is contemptible. Have you any better light? Bring it on if you have. Have you any better comfort to give us? Bring it on if you have. Have you any better hope? Bring it on if you have, and then you may have this Bible and I shall never want it again.

But I can think of a meaner thing than that, and that is an old man going along on the mountains with a staff in one hand and a lantern in the other. Darkness has come on suddenly. He is very old, just able to pick his way out amid the rocks and precipices, leaning on his staff with the one hand and guiding himself with the light in the other. You come up and say, "Father, you seem to be lost. You are a long way from home." "Yes," he replies. And then you take him by the hand and lead him home. That is very kind of you. But suppose instead of that you should snatch the staff from his hand and hurl it over the rocks, and snatch the lantern and blow it out? That would be dastardly, contemptible until there is no depth of contempt beneath it. If you have a better staff, give it to him. If you have a better light give it to him.

When God has put the staff of the Gospel in our hands and the lamp of God's word to light our feet, are you going to take from us our only support and our only illumination? I love the sting of the wasp and the rattlesnake better than I do the man who wants to clutch the Word of God from my grasp. There are people here who have been reading it a good while. It is a precious book to their souls. It has been so in times of darkness and trouble. There was a soldier who fell in battle, and after he had fallen he said in a feeble voice to his comrade, "Give me a drop." His comrade replied, "There is not a particle of water in my canteen." "Oh," he said, "I didn't mean that. Look in my knapsack and you will find a Bible there. Get out that old Bible and just give me a drop out of that." And his comrade found the Bible and read a few passages. The dying soldier said, "Oh, George, there is nothing like that, is there, for a dying soldier?"

Cling to your Bible! If this Bible should be destroyed, if all the Bibles that have ever been printed should be destroyed, we could make up a Bible right out of this audience. From that Christian man's experience I take one cluster of promises, and from that old Christian man's experience another, I put them all together, and I think I would have a Bible.

You see, my friends, I have not tried to hide the fact that I have large expectation of you who have entered the Christian life. Do not be discouraged. Press on toward the prize; God beside you and heaven before you. Keep your courage up.

upon this church. Another man in the pulpit. Other faces in the pews. Another man leading the singing. Others carrying around the alms-boxes of the church. All changed. Thirty years have gone and I look into the faces of the people, and I say, "Why, it seems to me I have seen these people somewhere, but I cannot exactly say where. Oh, yes, now I begin to think. These were the converts in 1881 and 1880. Why, how you have changed!" "Oh, yes," they say, "of course we have changed. Thirty years make a great change." I say, "How many wrinkles there are in your faces!" "Oh, yes," they say, "thirty years make a great many wrinkles." "Have you kept the faith?" "Yes, we have kept the faith." "Where are those people who used to sit in the pew with you." "All gone."

"Then," I say, "well, I feel lonely; come, let us sing one of the old hymns we used to sing thirty years ago in 1881 on communion day. Any of you know the old tune? Some one hum it. Yes, that's it, that's it. Now, altogether, let us sing, just as we did in 1881,

"There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins;
And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains.

"The dying thief rejoiced to see,
That fountain in his day;
And there may I, though vile as he,
Wash all my sins away."

JAMES GRAHAM'S BUSH LIFE IN AUSTRALIA.

James Ash, Nephew of Graham's Employer, Arrives in Australia, from England—Lock's Contrivances to Effect a Dissolution of Partnership—His Disagreements with a Blacksmith and a Highland Sheep-Docter—Graham and James Ash Visit Old Eagle-Hawk, a Native Chief—Physique and Skill of the Aborigines.

IN continuing the account of his Bush experiences which James Graham gave to his friends, he said: Lock was as meek as a mouse till he got the deed of partnership executed; but Ash and Alder quickly found his keen edge was double. He soon rode as good a horse, and held as high a head, as either of themselves. Indeed, as they were seldom there, he was chief man. They kept the station to make money, and not as a residence. When I came, I was so simple as to get no written agreement from Lock; but, at his advice, left it to my employers to judge what I was worth, and bent all my attention to acquire colonial experience in the management of sheep and cattle. Lock was storekeeper, and I took a turn at all work, rough and smooth.

Many a bitter pill I had to swallow, and many a disagreeable duty to perform, but though at first I kicked and chafed against it, until sometimes not only my body but my heart also felt sick and sore, I was afterwards led by a generous and all-wise Providence to accept it all as part of a beneficial discipline, and as coming from His hands "Who doeth all things well."

In little less than a year after my arrival young James Ash, nephew of my employer, arrived at the station fresh from Liverpool. He had heard much from his relative, and had read much in books of the colony. He came to take his uncle's place at the station, but he soon found his master in Jerrold Lock. I saw him storm in anger one day when he went into the store to Lock to ask for the cheque book, to draw a cheque for a small sum. Lock refused point-blank, and told him he must keep his place.

I wondered at Lock's studiedly offensive bearing to him, as I knew it would reach his uncle; but I subsequently learned that Lock had "a plan" to work. That plan was to irritate them into dissolution of partnership as soon as possible, that he might draw his fifth of all, and set up for himself. This plan ripened in about two years after I came to the station, and it laid the basis of Lock's rapid fortune. Let me not, however, anticipate "the ends."

In proportion as young Ash disliked Lock, he appeared to take to me. He hated "a lock" that, he said, no one could open except he borrowed Mammon's key. I told you how Lock got me into the affair with the convict that took to the bush. Before young Ash came to the station he got me into another affair that brought me into a court of justice for the first time in my life. He got on very bad terms with a great grisly blacksmith, who lived some three miles off on the neighboring station of Baroo Cobon (Cobon meaning great, as Narang means little). Lock wanted some coulters sharpened, and sent them by a third party to him to have them done. He did them; but, when he knew they belonged to Lock, he pitched them into a water-hole before his door. This was a splendid nut of law for Lock to crack. He got the smith fined in some pounds for damages and costs.

One day, as Lock and I were out on the sheep-run near the creek, up came the blacksmith, violently abusing Lock and challenging him to fight. Lock shut his lips and walked on in sublime—but as I thought cowardly—indifference, he not forgetting, I suppose, what material I was made of. At last I bade the blacksmith shut up. He squared his fist at Lock's face, and finally at mine. I drew back and dealt him a full-swing left-hander that gave him a refreshing cold bath in the creek. He summoned me for assault, but Lock handled the book so well as witness that the smith was again fined damages and costs.

Lock often, when in good humor, laughed at the affair; but, though my vanity was flattered my pride was mortified, and I sent a message of regret to the smith for what had occurred. He said, "He bore me no ill-will whatever; but he had it in reserve for that black-mouthed coward, whose teeth were rotten with telling and swearing lies."

Jerrold Lock is only a type of a true disciple of Mammon, who, in order to amass a certain amount of perishable wealth is prepared to do repeated violence to his conscience, sacrifice manly self-respect, immolate the claims of the tenderest friendships, and make all men but as so many steps by which he may climb to the gilded pinnacle of his ambition. The success of these unprincipled men has often been an occasion of stumbling to some of God's people. It was so with Asaph, the psalmist (Psalm 72); for he was envious at the foolish, when he saw the prosperity of the wicked. But it was afterward revealed to him by the light of the sanctuary that they are set in slippery places, and presently cast into destruction, brought into desolation, as in a moment, and utterly consumed with terrors.

Shortly after James Ash came to the station I nearly fell into another similar scrape. The overseer of Major Birchfield, the proprietor of Baroo Cobon, was a famous sheep-scabber and footrot curer. He was a great Scotch Highlander, and had a temper as fiery as his head was red. He had been punished, I think, for deer-shooting on improper occasions. He had communicated to Lock his secret of sheep-doctoring, for a sum which was to be paid if the cure was effectual. Lock affirmed it was not, and he that it was.

One morning when I came in from the stock-yard, I found quite a disturbance at the store. There stood M'Gregor rating Lock for a smooth-faced liar, because he would not pay. Young Ash stood looking on, hoping, I think, that the great knuckles of the Highlander would come down like flails on Lock, and dust his jacket. Lock was cowering back; and I think would have used some awkward weapon, if he had been driven to bay.

He brightened up when he saw me; and, with his hands in his pockets, coolly advanced and said, "Do you think I'll pay three pounds, for three half-pence worth of sulphur and grease?" M'Gregor stamped and raved, and threw off coat and waistcoat. He challenged Lock to fight. Lock looked half-perplexed, half-contemptuous. M'Gregor was a coward at heart, I guess, as he boasted so much; and when Lock would not fight, he challenged any man at the station, and looked hard at young Ash. I saw what it must come to. I kept my temper, but threw off my waistcoat.

"Now," I said, "M'Gregor, you have no second, and I'll have none. We'll settle it between us." He looked in my face with apparent amazement and curiosity; and went and—and—put on his clothes as calmly as any other morning that week! He left the station; but the language of Burns could not afford him epithets hard enough for Jerrold Lock. Indeed his rage and mortified pride appeared to half choke his utterance. From that hour, however, I evidently rose in the estimation of James Ash. But it really did not raise me in my own estimation. I saw myself deficient in self-control; though I did not envy Lock the selfish coolness that could irritate others, and then the selfish caution that could save his own skin.

But I'm reeling it off too heavy about myself. Let me "end" the day with a practical joke of Dick Nimagauley, the black. Ash, as I said, took greatly to me after the M'Gregor episode. He came to me on the evening of that day, and asked me to take him to the nearest camp of blacks to get material for an opossum-rug of real native manufacture. He also wanted to get, if he could, a water-mole, a flying squirrel, and some native birds for stuffing, as well as a case of Australian insects to send to England. Off we started for the camp on the creek.

King Bogan was away at a distance on the grounds of the tribe; and old Eagle Hawk Nimagauley was head of the little clan, whose sit-down was next us. Old Eagle Hawk was a splendid specimen of a black. He had been a foremost warrior and a terrible enemy to the early colonists, and had taken many lives. He had eaten his share of more than one white man, it was said; and had many a narrow escape from the white man's hemp, lead, and steel. He was esteemed a warrior-patriarch among his people. He stood in height some six feet—just two inches below the king.

It was the spiritual destitution and lack of civilisation among such tribes as these in Australia, New Zealand, India, Africa, etc., which prompted Christian missionaries to go and live among them, that they might lift them out of the darkness, mire, and death into which sin had plunged them. And it is a cause for profound and ever-deepening gratitude unto God, that so many thousands have been turned from idols to love and serve the Saviour who died to redeem them, and have washed their foul stains away in His blood which "cleanseth from all sin."

As we approached the camp Nimagauley's dogs poured out in a growling stream, and his gins with their pickaninnies scampered in; for he had five gins and at least eighteen dogs; the number of gins and dogs being the badge of wealth and rank among blacks. He advanced and saluted me in English style. He was not a begging black, and really looked like a natural patriarch or prince, though black as ebony and shining with grease. Young Ash was struck and looked on him with evident admiration. No wonder, for there was something grand in the "Old Eagle."

His head was quite bushy with hair, and his beard swept down his breast, and both were quite hoary. His chest was remarkably prominent as he stood erect. Thick wales or cords of callous flesh marked his bust, where it had been cut and gummed till he appeared corded from the breast-bone all along the ribs. This is one of the most distinguishing marks of manhood among his tribe. His fillet-bound forehead, though receding, was broad, his brows heavy, his eyes deep-set, restless, and expressive of great sharpness and fire. His mouth was large, with powerful underjaw; but his lips not very thick for a black. His whole frame was muscular and symmetrical, though somewhat corpulent, and had lost much of the vigor of youth.

I told him who Mr. Ash was, and what were his wishes. When he heard we wanted opossum and kangaroo, he looked a little fierce, as if old hostilities were awakened. "Yes, yes, you white men gallop horses over my father's graves—you white men come on my hunting grounds, and eat my opossums; but if I eat the white man's sheep or heifer, he'll hang me or shoot me. You're full, full, but come over the sea and want more, more. But, ha! ha! it's all right, I suppose. My Dick will talk to you about opossums."

It was a long time before even many professing Christian people could comprehend the truth of inspiration, that "God had made of one blood all men that dwell upon the face of the earth," and in His own image, too. But, thanks be to the Divine mercy, even the black man of the most debased tribes of the darkest places of the earth may become a "partaker of the Divine nature," a fellow-heir with us of the grace of life, and a brother in Christ Jesus! Many such trophies have already been secured through the preaching of the Gospel and the sanctifying power of the Holy Spirit, and the Lord is adding of their number daily to His spiritual church, such as are in the way of salvation.

Dick was in the young men's camp at some distance; for, until they get a wife, they dare not enter the camp of the married people; and if they meet a gin on the way, they must turn aside, otherwise club or spear would teach them bachelor-like propriety. A little pickaninny soon brought Dick, and another young man.

Dick was above twenty years old, the son of old Eagle Hawk, by his favorite wife. Dick was the worthy son of his sire in form and temperament, but a little less prejudiced against the whites than his father. He was one of the most athletic, one of the best-made young men, I ever saw, giving you, perhaps, more idea of agility than strength. No drill-sergeant could have made him walk with more erect, soldier-like bearing, and no dancing-master could have taught him a lighter or more graceful step. He resembled his father, whom he treated with reverence; but when he looked at us, and heard our wishes, there was a twinkle of roguish delight and drollery in his dark, almond-shaped eyes.

His cousin, Joey Colwah, who was with him, was heavier-limbed, and heavier-headed, and heavier-eyed—a dozy-looking black. I think they called him Colwah from the drowsy lizard of that name. Dick talked a bit to him, and he trotted off to the camp; he soon returned, however, with some of Dick's hunting weapons. Then Dick headed off toward a distant knoll of gum-trees. As we proceeded a lot of little woolly-headed urchins—who saw Dick starting for the chase, and wished to bespeak game—started with us, chattering and running, till we came to a long pool in the creek. We turned the end of it; but they took to the water like ducklings—Dick and all. Ash stood to see the sport, not knowing whether to laugh or not; for suddenly the pickaninnies disappeared, as if they had sunk to the bottom; but it was only to reappear in a minute, shouting, and cutting all sorts of aquatic capers.

As they saw us amused, they continued the sport, ducking and diving, and reappearing where you least expected them; and then, making the woods ring with shouts and laughter. Ash laughed as heartily as they, and pronounced them a generation of otters and seals. Dick beckoned them home, and home they went, as merry as the young of any of human kind. We came to a great old blue gum, ragged and decayed. Its leaden-colored foliage was miserably out of proportion to its size. Dick examined it critically, and said, "Weeli, I believe, sit down up there."

He drew his tomahawk from his belt and cut a notch in the bark, some three feet from the ground. Into this he inserted his great toe; and truly a black has a great toe. It is great by hereditary transmission and personal acquisition. He can stand on that toe in the notch, as erect as a dragoon in both stirrups. He cut another notch some four feet higher, and thus notch over notch for hand and toe, he turned the tree into a ladder, while Ash wondered and looked on.

THE COMING GREAT EARTHQUAKE.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

A Great Earthquake Predicted in Scripture—The Probable Consequences of an Earthquake in England—The Lisbon Earthquake—The Present Disturbed State of Our Planet.

THE Book of Revelation distinctly states that when the seventh and last vial of God's wrath is poured out, there shall be "a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great: and the cities of the nations shall fall" as a necessary consequence of it. This is an unmistakable prediction of the destruction by an earthquake of the great cities of the nations of the earth.

We are now living at the end of the sixth vial, which dries up the mystic Euphrates or Turkish Empire, and are, therefore, on the margin of the seventh vial, which is expected to be poured out between 1885 and 1890. Therefore, within about ten years at the furthest, we may expect the great earthquake referred to. And it is remarkable that even now premonitory vibrations and terrestrial perturbations are being exceptionally felt throughout the globe.

A London newspaper says: "The consequences of an earthquake in England would be terrible. What would it be if nearly every house from Whitechapel to Kensington, a distance of six miles, and from Sydenham to Highgate (suburbs of London on the east, west, south and north of the city), were suddenly to be shaken to its foundations, to be cracked, rent, and riven while all the inhabitants were flying terror-stricken from a wreck of falling timbers and crashing walls? We will not picture the awful possibility for ourselves, how the parks would be crowded with trembling refugees, and every ship on the Thames would be assailed by fugitives anxious to escape from the fated city which was once the secure capital of England; how commerce would be at a standstill, the funds go down, and starvation stare the people in the face. It would be equally bad were Paris, or Berlin, or St. Petersburg to be the scene of such a devastating calamity; and inasmuch as the continent has more volcanoes than England ever contained, and is far more subject to subterranean convulsions, there is less improbability in this hypothesis than in any such unlikely disaster befalling one of the great English cities.

THE EARTHQUAKE AT LISBON.

"It was about the beginning of a bright November day in the year 1755 that the flourishing capital city of Portugal was laid low in the space of about ten minutes, and fifty thousand persons were overtaken by an awful death. The first shock at Lisbon is described as having been very slight, hardly more than the vibration caused by a passing wagon. Then, after an interval of two or three minutes, came another movement which caused the houses to split and crack, and this was followed in a minute more by the most awful convulsion that ever occurred in any European town. Lisbon had been subject to earthquakes before that time, but they had been, for the most part, 'horizontal' wave-like motions of the earth, which had only brought down one or two houses.

"This historical Lisbon earthquake is described as if two subterranean waves had met in collision just beneath the beautiful city on the Tagus, and thrown the buildings overhead into the air. In a moment the city was a heap of ruins, and, amid a profound darkness the screams of the living and the groans of the dying were all that could be heard. Then a fire broke out, and, driven by a fierce wind, completed the destruction of the Portuguese capital. Some unfortunate people had fled in terror to take refuge on the river banks; but the tide suddenly rose and overwhelmed them, while the marble quay of the Terreiro do Paço sank with all the persons on it, and not one of the bodies ever rose to the surface again. All this, it should be remembered, happened in a part of Europe, little liable, as a rule, to such earthquake shocks as are common in tropical countries. It was an awful revelation of the insecure tenures on which even the most solid towns and cities hold their existence.

"A natural feeling of anxiety must now prevail among those fair 'isles of Greece.' Which of them will be they must be thinking; or has the laboring earth exhausted its restlessness for the present? The fact that loud reports as of distant cannon or thunder have accompanied the shocks felt at Chios seems to lend color to the idea that earthquakes may be caused by some sort of subterranean explosion, either of gases or of steam. At the best many years must elapse before the fair isle of Chios can lift its head again, and in the meanwhile all Europe should unite to aid its unhappy people in their dire distress."

The Daily Telegraph justly observes, "Agram, Casamicciola, and Chios all bear witness to the disturbed condition of the interior of our planet at the present time, and the earthquake at the last mentioned place has been by far the worst. This will set people thinking rather uncomfortably as to whether we in England are quite safe from such awful visitations. We have enjoyed immunity from serious earthquakes so long that we have been led to believe that the earth in our quarter of the globe is solid enough to resist all possible pressure from beneath. Neither London, Liverpool, nor Birmingham, neither Edinburgh nor Dublin has ever—so far as history records—been subjected to anything more than slight terrestrial tremors. Certainly the houses have never come toppling down on the heads of the unfortunate inhabitants. Slight shocks have been experienced once or twice in a century, in various parts of Great Britain or Ireland, which have made plates and glasses jingle for a few moments, and caused people to wonder whether an explosion had taken place, or an unusually heavy cart passed, but nothing worse.

"Yet reasonable as our confidence may be in the stability of Mother Earth, as she exhibits herself in these islands, there have been times when England has been the scene of volcanic phenomena similar to those that have lately appeared at Agram, at Ischia, and at Chio. Traces of eruptive energy exist in every quarry, in almost every mountain and hill in the British Isles. Not only the igneous rocks, the product of bygone fires, but 'faults' and irregularities of strata are eloquent proofs of the terrible disturbances to which the crust of English soil has long ago been subjected. Why else should the solid granite or limestone strata in many places stand tilted up towards the sky, or lie curved in fantastic shapes?"

RECENT EUROPEAN EARTHQUAKES.

The Geneva correspondent of the Times writes:—"Professor Morel, of Morges, the eminent seismologist, has communicated to the local papers a complete list of the major and minor earthquakes recorded in Europe between February 26th and March 12th, 1881, or within the space of fifteen days. The enumeration begins with the earthquakes at Agram, in Hungary, the first on February 26th, at 3.55 A.M., the second on the 27th, at 5.30 A.M. On the 28th occurred the third at Kirchberg, Austria, at 2.20 A.M., and on the same day there was also a shock in Auvergne, France. On March 3rd, at 3.35 A.M., shocks were felt in Switzerland at the following places, the centre of the disturbance being in High Vallais: Valley of the Aar, Valley of Aosta, Great St. Bernard, Geneva, and the region of Lake Leman, Vaud, Neuchatel, Berne, Basel, Zurich, Schaffhausen, Tessen, and throughout Central Switzerland. The shock extended also to Mulhausen, in Elsass, and was felt in the Black Forest. March 4th, at 1.30 P.M., the town of Casamicciola, in the island of Ischia, was destroyed by an earthquake. On March 7th, at 3 A.M., a smart shock was felt in Fischenthal, canton Zurich, and on the following day at 3 A.M., one equally strong was observed at Lausanne. To these have to be added the fifteen slight shocks which took place on March 12th at Fuligno and Perugia (Italy), though they are not included in Professor Morel's list. If these be reckoned as one earthquake, there occurred in Europe composed of twenty-three separate shocks. The increasing frequency of earthquakes in Switzerland is marked and significant. In 1876, the known number of shocks was six; in 1877, five; in 1878, eight; in 1879, seven; in 1880, seventeen; in 1881, since January 1st, that is, in two and a half months, eight. The Swiss Seismological Society, for the scientific study of earthquake phenomena, is already in the third year of its existence. It is considered probable that we may shortly hear of further earthquakes, both in Switzerland and elsewhere."

IN THESE FIFTEEN DAYS, NINE DISTINCT EARTHQUAKES,

A Birthday Present, Consisting of a Bible and book-mark, was presented not long ago by a young lady to a gentleman of her acquaintance who was going abroad. The inscription on the book-mark was, "God bless you!" In handing over the gift she earnestly exacted a promise from the gentleman that the mark should be placed anew in the Bible every morning, and never to remain more than a single day opposite the same chapter. For a time the promise was faithfully kept, but the influence of dissipated companions led the gentleman far away from God, and to the utter forgetfulness of his word. Indeed, he went so far as to say in heart, "There is no God." Five years rolled away, and the gentleman had become increasingly ungodly and miserable. He now returned to his native land, and in a few days again saw the lady who had given him his birthday present five years before. With a sense of shame he confessed himself guilty of having broken the solemn promise he had made, and upon his return home commenced to read his Bible. He had not read long before its truths revealed to him that he was a sinner and must repent if he would be saved. He fell upon his knees, sought mercy, and found it through Christ. He at once told others of what God had done for his soul, and the result was that a revival began in the town, and many were brought into the Church of God. "The law (doctrine) of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul" (Psalm 19:7).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Deadlock in the Senate was Broken on Wednesday, May 4th, after lasting six weeks, when Mr. Dawes announced as the result of the caucus of Republican Senators that the contest on the question of organization would be deferred out of regard to the enormous accumulation of arrears of public business. He said the Republicans yielded nothing; that they went into executive session simply to confirm some essential nominations, after which they would take up the old fight with renewed vigor. In the executive session the first matter disposed of was the Chinese immigration treaty, which was ratified without amendment by a practically unanimous vote, there being only two Senators recorded in the negative. The Chinese commercial treaty was then taken up, and a very brief discussion resulted in its ratification also.

Proceeding with the calender of treaties, the Senate next ratified in succession the extradition treaty with the United States of Colombia; the consular convention with Italy modifying and defining the judicial powers of certain consulates; the convention with Morocco respecting the taxation prerogatives of the Moorish government, and the treaty with Japan prescribing reciprocal duties for the Japanese and United States governments in cases of shipwrecks upon their respective coasts.

The subject of the nominations was then taken up and they were referred to committees, without objection, except a few officers who received the compliment of a confirmation without a reference, and by an unanimous vote. On the following day eighty-eight nominations were confirmed.

The Success of Secretary Windom's Financial plans is attested by the fact that six per cent bonds to the amount of over seventy millions have already been presented for exchange to the three and a half per cent rate. Another encouraging feature of the financial situation is that the four per cent United States bonds were being sold last week at 116¼, thus indicating growing confidence in our national stability. During the month of April the public debt was reduced by the sum of $9,690,000, making a total reduction for the fiscal year of $78,099,001, a record unequalled by any country in the whole world.

A Bombshell on the Floor of the Senate could scarcely have produced more intense excitement than the message President Garfield sent to that chamber on Thursday. It was an intimation that the fighting is no longer to be all on one side, and that the President is prepared to wage war on certain Senators with their own weapons. The Senate has postponed consideration of the nomination of Mr. Robertson, with the obvious intention of rejecting it at some propitious moment, or of delaying it so long that the President might be induced to withdraw it of his own motion. But the President is apparently resolved on forcing the confirmation, or of punishing those who are responsible for rejecting it. Accordingly he withdrew all the New York nominations he had made in the interest of the Conkling wing of the party which, with the Robertson nomination, were awaiting consideration. He is thus able, if Mr. Robertson is rejected, to make a new slate of a very different cast.

As the Civil Service is Regarded by Politicians from points of view differing so widely from each other, the President's act naturally causes a direct conflict of opinion. It is obvious that if civil service appointments are the perquisites of the President and his friends, he is entitled to adopt any expedient constitutionally in his power, to secure them for those he wishes to reward. The whole question then becomes one of tact and endurance. On the other hand, if nominations are made with the sole view of committing the conduct of national business to men of integrity and capacity, then the President is entitled to have his nominations considered on their merits. He might raise a distinct and honorable standard, and if the Senate thwarted his will, might safely leave the issue to the judgment of the people. The opinion is generally held, rightly or wrongly, and based chiefly on the character of the Robertson, Matthews, and other nominations, that in the struggle between the President and Mr. Conkling, the policy of neither party is dictated solely by a desire for efficiency in the service, but is rather one of a personal character. The question, so narrowed, does not appeal strongly to the sympathies of the people. They look on with indifference, or at most with curiosity as to which combatant will be victorious in the struggle, while on all hands there is regret that President and Senator should so forget the dignity of their respective positions as to engage in so humiliating a contest.

The Investigation as to the Star Postal Routes, that is the routes of which the conveyance was by wagon, on horseback, or by special steamer, is proceeding and further remarkable developments are expected. Among the routes discontinued is Postal Route No. 29,053. It was a steamboat route from Memphis to the metropolis of Wittsburg, Arkansas, both of which places were it is asserted much better served by railroad already. The route existed ostensibly for the sake of six intermediate offices, whose total receipts are about $90 a year; the route cost the government $12,133 a year. Thus the suppression of this one route alone saves the service over $12,000 a year.

General Grant's Excursion to Mexico, which was supposed by many people to have been undertaken with a sinister design, has been explained by the general himself in a recent speech. As to the idea of annexation, he said emphatically that the United States had no desire for it. "We want no more land," he said. "We do want to improve what we have, and we want to see our neighbors improve and grow so strong that the designs of any other country could not endanger them." The alarmists who have encouraged the notion that an attempt to annex not only Mexico but Canada also would involve us in future wars may profitably consider General Grant's statement.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey was Present at the Gospel meeting in Cooper Union on Sunday, May 1st. In speaking of the work in the West, from which he and Mr. Moody have just returned, he said: "From the time we left this city till our return it is just seven months, and the Lord has seemed to be with us in all our journeys and labors. We held services three times every day except Saturday. We retained health and strength all the way, and are greatly satisfied with our work on the Pacific Coast. We stopped at Omaha over Sunday, and held meetings, as we always do, on a Sabbath. Although it was a crisp, cold day, two of the largest churches were filled at 8 o'clock in the morning. We reached Salt Lake City on Saturday, and stayed over Sunday in order to hold meetings. We found many people of the fold of Jesus Christ, Congregational, Methodist, Baptist, and other churches, with a fair membership. We began our meetings in the largest Protestant church, expecting to leave town the next day, but we stayed three weeks. The blessing of God seemed to descend on the simple preaching of the Gospel. I afterward met a pastor of one of the Salt Lake churches who said his church had gathered in ninety-two persons as the result of our little meetings. From Salt Lake City we went to the Pacific, where we were warmly received, and I thank God that He has many of His own people there."

Miss Frances E. Willard Writes Enthusiastically from Alabama of the success of her temperance work in the South. She was warned before entering upon it that failure was inevitable. That it must fail because laboring under a triple disadvantage. First that it was undertaken by a woman; second, by a temperance woman; and third, by a Northern temperance woman. In spite of these disadvantages she has been received in every city with demonstrations of hearty kindness and good-will, and everywhere Southern citizens have rendered cordial co-operation in the work. The trip will extend over two months, and forty towns or more in fourteen States, leaving in every place a W. C. T. U. where none has yet been organized. It may be hoped that Miss Willard's testimony will in some measure remove from the minds of Northerners the unfavorable impression produced by "The Fool's Errand," and similar works.

A Benevolent Employer has Recently Performed a munificent act. A daily newspaper says Mr. Andrew Carnegie has shown a practical interest in the welfare of the employés in his steel works at Braddock, Pa., by erecting for them a large building, at a cost of $20,000, for a library, reading-room, and public hall. They were proposing to secure a library, when he generously anticipated their wishes.

The Novel Expedient Discussed in Massacnusetts for the diminution of liquor drinking has assumed practical shape. A bill compelling the removal of all screens in front of bars in liquor saloons, thus making the purchase of liquor open to the eyes of passers by, has passed both houses of the Massachusetts Legislature, receiving the support not only of prohibitionists but of those also who merely wish to reduce the practice of bar drinking to more moderate limits.

The Case of two Brothers is Earnestly Commended by their sister to the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Some time ago a copy of this journal providentially fell into the hands of one of them and was the means in God's hand of bringing him into a hopeful spiritual state, but the temptations by which he is surrounded and the associations of his business, like thorns, choke the good seed, and with respect to both the young men there is grave cause for anxiety. Their sister, who expresses her firm faith in the efficacy of prayer, pathetically asks that our readers would remember both young men in their petitions to the throne of grace.

Two Dollars Received from J. N. have been handed to Mr. Jerry McAuley, who is doing a valuable work among a very depraved class of citizens in New York.

The Issue of the Revised New Testament is postponed until May 20th, and it is expected that the demand for copies will be so enormous that some delay must ensue before all applicants can be supplied. The same size in cloth binding twenty cents, or twenty-three cents by post; and in more expensive bindings at various prices up to four dollars. A Valuable Gift to Poor Children has been made by Mr. A. B. Stone, one of the trustees of the Children's Aid Society, who has bought Bath Park, with four and a half acres, several pavilions and ninety bathing houses, for $20,000, and presented it to the Society for a Summer Home for Poor Children, which, it is expected, will be in readiness by June. This home has been for seven years at Bath, L. I., where summer enjoyment has been furnished to more than 10,000 poor children.

An Abandoned Statue Remains at Philadelphia as a legacy from the Centennial Exhibition. It is a colossal granite statue of a soldier, and stands in front of Memorial Hall. The Philadelphia Press says in reference to it, "It has always been a matter of amazement why it was not removed at the close of the celebration or a formal gift of it made to the city. Perhaps we can enlighten the public on this point. Although the granite is a splendid specimen of stone the figure has a serious defect. It represents the soldier at Parade Rest. Yet the artist has put the right foot forward instead of the left. This destroys the value of the statue as a work of art, and it has therefore been abandoned by the owners. Only a soldier, however, will notice the defect, and it is a source of regret that it is so marred. The abandonment of the statue on account of a defect which would not be noticed by ordinary spectators is typical of the condition in which many will stand at the final judgment. Upright, honorable, philanthropic in their worldly dealings, yet ruined by a fatal defect, their attitude toward God is not that He requires—a repentant sinner justified by the blood of Jesus (Acts 4 : 12).

An Invitation Eight Years Belated was Received on May 7th by a gentleman at Middletown, Conn. It was mailed to him eight years ago by his brother, and contained an invitation to his wedding. He did not respond in person, somewhat to the bridegroom's surprise, but later he learned that the invitation had never been received. On Saturday last the invitation was returned from the Dead Letter Office, when he inclosed it in an envelope and dropped it in the Middletown office, addressed to his brother. This time it was received, but eight years too late for acceptance. The delay is unexplained, but was probably caused by a defective letter box or some strange receptacle in which it was dropped and lay unseen so long. The omission of the invited guest to be present at the ceremony was thus satisfactorily explained; but those who do not avail themselves of the invitation to the marriage supper of the Lamb (Matt. 22 : 4) will not be able to plead any such excuse.

A Young Lady's Death Resulted from the use of cosmetics in New York last week. The young lady is said to have been the daughter of a wealthy citizen of Buffalo. She suffered from a serious sickness and symptoms of lead poisoning were discovered. She was put under medical treatment, but without improvement in her condition. Three weeks ago she came to this city with her mother and was placed under the care of a New York physician, who ascertained that she had been in the habit of using in a lavish way cosmetics, which, on being analyzed revealed the presence of lead in large proportions. The efforts of the doctor were without beneficial results, and on Monday she succumbed to a severe attack of pericarditis. It appears that these artificial aids to beauty involve physical risks; we were already warned that their use implied that the users are in serious spiritual danger (1 Peter 3 : 3).

A Wandering Son was Reclaimed in San Francisco by the blessing of God on Mr. Sankey's efforts. At a meeting on May 1st, Mr. Sankey told the story of an aged mother in New England, living in affluence, who had given him a letter and asked him if he met her son out there to try and reform him. He had been a rich merchant in the East, but had lost all through drink; and abandoning his home, mother, wife, and children, had drifted out to the gold fields. In San Francisco Mr. Sankey found the man. He had no home, was a trembling, besotted wreck, and had gathered a few rags in a deserted building where he made his bed. His food and drink he obtained as chance gave them. Mr. Sankey implored him to come to the meetings, but he demurred on the ground that the only opportunity he had to earn money was at night. He was somewhat of an artist and decorated the windows of liquor stores with scrolls and fancy designs in soap. That very evening he had what he called "a three dollar job," and he was afraid of losing it. However, he attended and was converted. He is now on his way home to rejoin his family and take an interest in his brother's business. "I could tell you of many other such instances, but let that suffice," Mr. Sankey said in conclusion.

A Minister Preached a Sermon Recently with the knowledge that his house was burning while he preached. A contemporary says, "The residence of Rev. Conrad Vreeland, at Echo Lake, N. J., was destroyed by fire on Sunday of last week. Mr. Vreeland was about entering the pulpit of his church when word came that his dwelling was on fire. As it was three or four miles distant he judged at once that it would be impossible to get there in time to save anything, so went on with the services, and at the close spoke pathetically of the attractions of home, and then informed his congregation that he was without a roof to shelter him, his home having just been destroyed by fire." This conduct is denominated "stoicism," but the word is misapplied. The Christian can afford to rise above perturbation from worldly loss. He knows that if all he has is destroyed he has reserved for him a house eternal in the heavens (2 Cor. 5 : 1).

A Dollar Bill Wrapped Around a Medicine bottle furnished unexpected help recently to a sick widow. She was afflicted with an incurable disease, and the only medicine which gave her relief was very costly. A friend who heard of her trial purchased a bottle of the medicine and left it for her at her house. She did not immediately use it, having some on hand. By and by the little was exhausted, and so were her means. She needed immediate help and prayed for it. Afterward, opening the package containing the medicine she found a dollar bill wrapped around the bottle, put there by the friend who had left the package for her. The amount, small as it was, was enough to meet her wants until more came. It had been there while she prayed, thus fulfilling the promise (Isa. 65 : 24).

Dying for Want of a Surgeon was the Sad experience of a ship captain last week. The Hamburg-American steamship Lessing, which arrived at New York May 5th, brought to quarantine Captain Temple, formerly of the British bark Mary Graham. The Lessing sighted the bark with signals flying asking for medical assistance. The doctor was sent on board, who found that Captain Temple had broken his leg eleven days previously, and having no surgeon on board he had lain in torture waiting help from some passing vessel. He was transferred to the Lessing, when his leg was amputated, and, being very weak, the nursing which he received afterward did not revive him. When he landed he was scarcely able to speak, and died as soon as he reached the shore. It was a pitiable fate, that of help coming just too late Well is it for us that the Physician of souls is waiting always to hear the sin-sick penitent's cry for help.

A Singular Aural Infirmity Affects a Journalist at Cleveland, O. He says it partakes somewhat of the nature of color-blindness as that affects the eyes, he being unable to hear certain sounds at all. For example, he has never heard the sound of a bird's song in his life. A whole room full of canaries might be in full song and yet he could not hear a note, but the rustling of their wings would be distinctly heard by him. He can hear a man whisper but could not hear him whistle. The upper notes of a piano, violin, or other musical instrument he never hears, but the lower notes he hears without difficulty. This appears to be a purely physical defect for which he is not responsible; but similar effects are observed in the spiritual world which are the product of sinful perversity. There are men to whom an appeal from suffering humanity was never made in vain, but who are deaf to every effort to awaken within them a sense of their duty toward God (Matt. 13 : 15).

REJECTERS OF THE GOSPEL ADMONISHED.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Delivered on Sunday Morning, April 17th, 1881.

"To whom he said, This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing: yet they would not hear."—ISAIAH 28 : 12.

An Eloquent Preacher Rejected—Two Intoxicants—Wine and Pride—Equally Destructive—Encouragement from Isaiah's Failure—I. The Excellence of the Gospel—A Revelation of Rest—The Cause of Rest—Specially Meant for the Weary—A Refreshing—A Definite Direction—Not a Selfish Rest—Excellence of Manner—It Comes with Authority—In Simplicity—Suitable to our Capacity—II. Objections Taken to the Gospel—They are Wanton—A Widow's Door Shut Against her Benefactor—They are Wilful—Wicked—The Outgrowth of Pride—III. The Objectors Divinely Requited—Restlessness—Hardening of the Heart—Darkening of the Understanding—Failure of Self-chosen Refuges.

ASSUREDLY Isaiah was one of the most eloquent of preachers, and yet he could not win the ears and hearts of those to whom he spoke, for it is written, "they would not hear." Beyond all question he was thoroughly evangelical; for, as Dr. Watts truly says, he spoke more of Jesus Christ than all the rest of the prophets, and yet the message of love was treated as though it were an idle tale. His doctrine was clear as the daylight, and yet men would not see it, so that He had to ask with sorrow, "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?"

It was not the fault of the preacher that Israel rejected his warnings: all the fault lay with that disobedient and gainsaying nation. The people to whom He spoke so earnestly were

DRUNKEN IN A DOUBLE SENSE.

They were overcome with wine, and so general was this vice that Isaiah says, "But they also have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way; the priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment. For all tables are full of vomit and filthiness, so that there is no place clean."

What can be conceived of more potent to blunt the point of gospel truth than intoxication or excess? When a man is given to wine, how can the Spirit of God dwell in him? How is it likely that the truth shall enter an ear which has been rendered deaf by this degrading vice? How is the word of God likely to operate upon a conscience that has been drenched and drowned by strong drink? I charge you, if any of you are given to drunkenness, flee from this destroyer before your bands are made strong and you are hopelessly fettered by the habit. It is small wonder that the preacher is defeated if his ardent zeal has to compete with ardent spirits. When Bacchus rolls the wine-cask against the door it is hard to force an entrance, even though we demand it in the name of King Jesus. Men are in an ill state for hearing when the barrel and the bottle are their idols. It is not at all marvellous that the gospel should be neglected by men who have "put an enemy into their mouths to steal away their brains."

The people to whom Isaiah spoke were also drunken in another sense—namely, intoxicated with pride. Their country was fruitful, and its chief city, Samaria, stood on the hill-top, like a diadem of beauty crowning the land, and they delighted in the glorious beauty which is on the head of the fat valley. They themselves were brave, and among them were many champions whose strength sufficed to turn the battle to the gate, therefore they hoped to resist every invader, and so their hearts were lifted up.

Moreover, they said, "We are an intelligent people; we want no teaching, or if indeed we endure instruction it must be of a high class; we are men of cultured intellect, instructed scribes, and we do not need persons like Isaiah to weary us with their ding-dong of 'precept upon precept, line upon line,' as if we were mere children at school. Besides, we are good enough. Do we not worship our God under the form of the golden calves of Belial? Do we not respect the sacrifices and the holy days?" So spoke the more religious of them, while the rest gloried in their shame. Being intoxicated with pride it was not likely that they would hear the message of the prophet who bade them turn from their evil ways.

The two forms of drunkenness are equally destructive, and I beg to call your attention to this fact. Whether body or soul be intoxicated, mischief will surely come of it. Many are pleased if I speak against drunkenness of the body, and I feel bound to speak as earnestly as I possibly can, for it is a monster evil; but I beseech you who are sober, and perhaps total abstainers, to dread the other intoxication; for if any one of us should be intoxicated with pride on account of our own sobriety it will be ruinous to our souls.

I confess I feel encouraged this morning by Isaiah's want of success. When He says, "They would not hear," I comfort myself concerning those who pay no heed to my exhortations; perhaps it is no more my fault than it was Isaiah's. At any rate, if Isaiah still went on speaking even when he cried, "Who hath believed our report?" much more may I, who am so much inferior to him, be willing to persevere in telling out my Master's message as long as my tongue will move. Peradventure God may grant repentance to the obstinate, and ears may yet be unstopped, and hearts may yet be softened; therefore, let us try again, and once more publish the glad tidings of peace. If the blessed Spirit be with us we shall not give the gospel call in vain, but men will fly to Jesus as doves to their windows.

First, I wish to speak this morning upon the excellence of the gospel; secondly, upon the objections taken to it; and thirdly, upon the Divine requital of these objections.

I. Let us consider

THE EXCELLENCE OF THE GOSPEL

as it is set forth in the passage before us. This Scripture does not allude to the gospel primarily, but to the message which Isaiah had to deliver, which was in part the command of the law and in part the promise of grace; but the same rule holds good of all the words of the Lord; and indeed any excellence which was found in the prophet's message is found yet more abundantly in the fuller testimony of the gospel in Christ Jesus.

Using the passage for ourselves, and referring it to the gospel ministry in this day, the excellence of that gospel lies, first, in its object; it is excellent in its design, for it is

A REVELATION OF REST.

We, as Christ's ambassadors, are sent to proclaim to you that which shall give you ease, peace, quiet, rest. It is true we have to begin with certain truths that disturb and distress; but our object is to dig out the foundation into which may be laid the stones of restfulness. The message of the gospel which fell from the mouth of its own author is this: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Over Bethlehem the angels sang "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

The object of the gospel is not to make men anxious, but to calm their anxieties; not to fill them with endless controversy, but to lead them into all truth. The gospel gives rest of conscience by the complete forgiveness of sin through the atoning blood of Christ; rest of heart by supplying an object for the affections worthy of their love; and rest of intellect by teaching it certainties which can be accepted without question. Our message does not consist of things guessed at by wit, nor evolved out of man's inner consciousness by study, nor developed by argument through human reason; but it treats of revealed certainties, absolutely and infallibly true, upon which the understanding may rest itself as thoroughly as a building rests upon a foundation of rock.

More than that, it is the cause of rest—"This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest." The gospel of our salvation is not only a command to rest, but it brings the gift of rest within itself. Our Lord saith, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Let the gospel be admitted into the heart and it will create a profound calm, hushing all the tumult and strife of conscience, removing all apprehensions of divine wrath, stilling all rebellion against the supreme will, and so working in the spirit by the energy of the Holy Ghost a deep and blessed peace. Oh that we may know and possess this peace of God.

This rest is especially

MEANT FOR THE WEARY.

"This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest." If you have been trying to find peace for years and cannot meet with it, here is the goodly pearl you have been seeking after; if you have been laboring and toiling to keep the law and have failed, here is more than the righteousness that your conscience has been craving. In Jesus crucified you will find all things, for "He is made of God unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption!"

O ye that are weary with the round of worldly pleasure, satiated, nauseated with the vanities and delusions of the carnal mind, come hither and find true joy. O ye that are worn with ambition, fretted with disappointment, embittered by the faithlessness of those you trusted in, come and confide in Jesus and be at rest. Weary, weary, weary ones, here is the rest, here is the refreshing. Jesus expressly puts it, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." If your backs are breaking, if your hearts are breaking, if your eyes are failing through weary watching and waiting, come to the Saviour just as you are, for He will be your rest. Despondent and despairing, condemned, and in your own conscience cast out to the gates of hell, yet look to Jesus and rest shall be yours. This is the rest wherewith He maketh the weary to rest. Oh, it is a blessed, blessed message that God has sent to the sons of men. How is it that they refuse it?

In addition to bringing us rest, the message of mercy points us to a refreshing: "This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing." If the rested one should grow weary again, the good Shepherd will give him refreshing; if He wanders, the Lord will restore Him; if He grows faint, He will revive Him; yea, He has begun His gracious work of renewing, and He will continue it by renewing the heart from day to day, blending the will with His own, and making the whole man more and more to rejoice in Him. I know there are some of God's people here who are faint and thirsty. You are specially invited, as well as those who never came before, for if this is the rest for the weary this also is the refreshing for the fainting; and if the sinner may come and find peace in Christ, much more may you, who though you have wandered from Him like lost sheep, have not forgotten His commandments. Come, ye desponding ones, come back to Jesus, for this is the rest and this is the refreshing.

Now note with peculiar joy that Isaiah did not come to these people to talk about rest in dubious terms, and say, "There is no doubt a rest to be found somewhere in that goodness of God of which it is reasonable to conjecture." No; He puts His finger right down on the truth, and He says, "This is the rest, and this is the refreshing." Even so we at this day, when we come to you with a message from God, come with laying our hand upon the slaughtered Lamb of God we cry, "This is the rest, and this is the refreshing."

It was said of a certain preacher of the modern school that he taught that our Lord Jesus Christ did something or other which in some way or other was connected with the pardon of sin: this is the preaching of a great number of our intellectual divines; but we have not so learned Christ, neither is this the doctrine by which we have obtained rest to our souls. God has revealed fixed and positive truth, and it is ours to state it clearly and without hesitation. Our cry is, "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners:" this is the rest, and this is the refreshing.

Nor did he preach a rest of a selfish character. They say we teach men to get peace and rest for themselves, and make themselves comfortable, whatever becomes of others. How these men lie in their throats: they know better, and they forge these falsehoods because their heart is false. Are we not always bidding men look out from themselves, and love others even as Christ has loved them? Our words and acts for the good of others prove that we do not delight in selfishness. We abhor the idea that personal safety is the consummation of a religious man's desires.

This is one of the glories of the gospel, that "this is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest." Get rest yourself, and you will soon cause other weary minds to rest." As soon as you have learned the divine secret it will become in your hands a blessed charm with which you, too, by God's grace may become givers of rest. With this lamp you may enlighten all that are in the dark as God shall help you. That secret something which your own heart possesses shall enable you to communicate good cheer to many a weary heart, and hope to many a desponding mind.

The other excellency of the gospel, of which I shall speak at this time, lies in its manner.

First, I count it a great excellency of the gospel that it comes with authority. Read the ninth verse. Even the cavillers acknowledged its authority, for they called the prophet's message "knowledge" and "doctrine." The gospel does not pretend to be a speculative scheme or a theory of philosophy which will suit the nineteenth century but will be exploded in the twentieth. No; we speak what we do know, not what we dream nor imagine, but what we know. If, my brethren, the gospel of Jesus Christ be not a fact I dare not ask you to believe it, but if it be a fact it is not my "opinion," not "my views," as men are always saying; it is of time and of eternity.

Another excellence of the gospel as to its manner was that it was delivered with great simplicity. Isaiah came with it, "Precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little." It is the glory of the gospel that it is so plain. If it were so mysterious that nobody could understand it but doctors of divinity, what a sorry case the rest of us would be in. If it was so profound that we must take a degree at a university before we could comprehend it, what a miserable gospel it would be for mocking the world with; but is divinely sublime in its simplicity, and hence the common people hear it gladly. As the verse seems to imply, it is fitted for those who are weaned from the breast, those who are little more than babes may yet drink in this unadulterated milk of the word. I bless God for a simple gospel, for it suits me, and thousands of others whose minds cannot boast of greatness or genius.

It equally suits men of intellect, and it is only quarrelled with by pretenders. The man who lacks breadth of mind and depth of thought is the man to cavil at the wisdom of God. An affected creature who is little above an idiot will brush his hair backward, put on his spectacles, wrinkle his brows, and amend the infallible Word; but a man who really has a capacious mind is usually childlike, and, like Sir Isaac Newton, is glad to sit at Jesus' feet. Great minds love the simple gospel of God, for they find rest in it from all the worry and the weariness of questions and of doubts.

It is brought down to us and brought home to us in ways suitable to our capacity. It is told to us, as it were, with stammering lips (see verse 11), just as mothers teach their little children in a language all their own. I should not like to speak from the pulpit as mothers talk to their babes; yet they use the best language for the baby, the very words for a little child to understand. Even so in much of the Bible, especially in the Old Testament, we see how God condescends to lay aside His own speech and talk the language of men.

In the gospel of John, what child language, what depth! what love! If you, my hearer, do not understand the Word of God, it is not because He does not put the word plainly, but because of the blindness of your hearts and the besotted condition of your spirit. Take heed that you are not drunken with the wine of pride, but be willing to learn, for God Himself hath not darkened counsel by mysterious words, but He has put His mind before you as plainly as the sun in the heavens. "Precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little."

II. Alas my time is nearly gone, and I need much more space in which to do justice to my subject. I have now, in the second place, to notice the

First, let me say that they are most wanton. For men to object to the gospel is a piece of wanton foolishness, because they object to that which promises them rest. Above all the things in the world this is what our troubled spirits need: rest is our heart's craving; and the gospel comes and says, "I will give you rest." And do men reject that blessing? This is lamentable indeed! What, were you ill and did you insult the only physician that could cure you? Why were you so foolish? What, were you in debt, and did you actually refuse help from a generous friend who would have given you all you wanted? "No," say you, "we are not so foolish."

Now if God came demanding something of you I could understand your refusing. I have heard of a poor woman who locked her door, and when she heard a rap did not answer it, behaving as though she was not at home. Her minister saw her a day or two after he had called, and he said, "I called to see you the other day; I wanted to give you help, for I knew that you were very poor; but no one answered to my knocking." "Oh," she said, 'I am very sorry, but I thought it was the landlord calling for the rent." She shut out her benefactor through mistaking him for her creditor.

The Lord is not calling in the gospel for that which is due to Him, nor asking anything of you, but He approaches you with perfect rest in his hand, the very thing you want, and yet you shut the door of your heart against Him. Oh, do not so. Be wise, and play not the fool any longer. May God help you to be wise for your own eternal good. Admit your God with all His heavenly gifts.

Next, objections against the gospel are wilful, even as it is here said, "This is the refreshing, yet they would not hear." When men say that they cannot believe the gospel, ask them whether they will patiently hear it in all its simplicity. No, they say, they do not want to hear it. The gospel is so difficult to believe, so they say. Will they come and hear it preached in its fulness? Will they read the gospels for themselves carefully? Oh, no, they cannot take the trouble. Just so. But a man who does not want to be convinced must not blame anybody if he remains in error.

Such objections are wicked, because they are rebellion against God, and an insult to His truth and mercy. If this gospel be of God, I am bound to receive it: I have no right to cavil at it, nor raise questions, philosophical or otherwise. It is mine just to say, "Does God say this and that? Then it is true, and I yield to it." Does the Lord thus set before me a way of salvation? I will run in it with delight.

But these people raised objections that were the outgrowth of their pride. They objected to the simplicity of Isaiah's preaching. They said, "Who is He? You should not go to hear Him: He talks to us as if we were children. Go to hear the learned Rabbi over the way, who is so refined and cultured. As for this man, he is not fit to teach any but those who are weaned from the milk and drawn from the breasts; for with him it is 'precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little.'"

Have you not heard folks say in these days concerning a true gospel preacher that he is always preaching about sovereign grace or the blood of Christ, or crying out, "Believe, believe and you shall be saved?" They sneer and say, "It is the old ditty over and over again." I am not a Hebrew scholar, but those who are so tell us that the passage translated "precept upon precept, line upon line," was uttered in ridicule, and sounded like a ding-dong rhyme with which they mocked Isaiah. You would smile if I read you the Hebrew according to the sound with which, in all probability, it was pronounced, They said, "This is the way Isaiah preaches: 'Tzav latzav, tzav latzav; kav lakav, kav lakav; zeeir sham, zeeir sham.'" The words were intended to caricature the preacher, though they do not suggest the idea when translated, "precept upon precept, precept upon precept, line upon line, line upon line," they do suggest it readily enough in the Hebrew.

There are people now living who, when the gospel is plainly and simply preached, exclaim, "We want progressive thought, we want"—they do not quite know what they do want. They are something like the congregation who, when a certain Bishop of London was preaching to them, were utterly inattentive, whereupon the good man took up his Hebrew Bible and read them five or six verses in the Hebrew tongue, and at once they were all awake. Then he rebuked them by saying, "Verily, I perceive that when I preach you good doctrine you do not care about it, but when I read to you in a tongue which you do not comprehend, straightway you open your ears."

An affectation of special refinement is supported by listening to talk which is incomprehensible. Too many wish for a map to heaven so mysteriously drawn that they may be excused from following it. Multitudes delight in prayers in the Latin tongue, and others prefer them in no tongue at all, but intoned through the nose. Music and millinery, processions and pomposities are preferred by thousands because they prefer sensuous enjoyment to spiritual instruction. We know those who prefer the gospel shrouded in a mist; they love to see the wisdom of man shut out the wisdom of God. This was the style of objection current in Isaiah's day, and it is fashionable still. Did I hear any one remark, "Why, you yourself preach nothing but faith, atonement, free grace, and so on. We want novelties, and will go elsewhere for them." So you may if you like; I shall not change my note while God preserves me.

III. The third point will be a warning to those who have no relish for the truth of God: let us consider of these objectors. The Lord threatens them, first, with the loss of that which they despised. He has sent them a message of rest, and they will not have it, and therefore, in the twentieth verse, He warns them that they shall have no rest henceforth: "For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it: and the covering narrower than that He can wrap himself in it." All those who wilfully reject the gospel, and take up with philosophies and speculations, will be rewarded with inward discontent. Ask them, "Have you found rest?" "Oh, no," say they, "we are farther off than ever." "But you hoped that if you listened to this philosophical doctrine you would then be happy." They reply, "Oh, no, we are seeking still."

Ask the preachers of that kind of doctrine whether they themselves have found an anchorage, and as a rule they will answer, "No, no, we are in pursuit of truth; we are hunting after it, but we have not reached it yet." They are never likely to reach it, for they are on the wrong track. The gospel was made to rest conscience, soul, heart, will, memory, hope, fear—yea, the entire man; but when men laugh at all fixity of belief how can they be rested? Dear friend, if you have not found rest you have not yet grasped the entire gospel, and you have need to go back to the fundamental principle of faith in Jesus, for this is the rest, and this is the refreshing.

Furthermore the Lord threatens them that they shall be punished by a gradual hardening of heart. Read the thirteenth verse. They said that Isaiah's message was "precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little," and justice answers them, "Even so it shall be to you, a thing despised and ridiculed, so that you will go further away from it; you will fall backward and be broken, and snared and taken." See verse thirteen. A fall backward is the worst kind of fall. If a man falls forward he may somewhat save himself and rise again, but if he falls backward he falls with all his weight, and is helpless. Those who stumble at Christ, the sure foundation stone, shall be broken.

This is a terrible thing; and what is still worse, if worse can be, this is to be followed by a growing inability to understand: "For with stammering lips and another tongue will He speak to this people." Since they would not hear plain speech, God will make simplicity itself to seem like stammering to them. Men that cannot endure simple language shall at last become unable to understand it.

You know, my brethren, how large a body of mankind are at this day unable to understand the Saviour. The Saviour said, "This is my body:" and straightway they conclude that a piece of bread is transformed into the flesh of Christ. The Saviour commands believers to be baptized into his death, and straightway they proclaim that the water of baptism regenerates children. They will not understand it, what is clear as the sun. They take our Lord's illustrations literally, and when He speaks literally they dream that He is using metaphor.

If men will not understand they shall not understand. A man may shut his eyes so long that he cannot open them. In India many devotees have held up their arms so long that they can never take them down again. Beware lest an utter come upon those of you who refuse the gospel. If you charge God's word with being childish you shall grow childish yourselves, as many great philosophers of our day have done; if you say that it is simple, and refuse it because of its plainness, you will become simpletons yourselves; if you say it is beneath you, it will turn out that you will be beneath it, and it will grind you to powder.

Lastly, this warning is given to those who object to the gospel, that whatever refuge they choose for themselves shall utterly fail them. Thus saith the Lord, "Judgment will I also lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet; and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters shall overflow the hiding place." Down come the great hailstones, dashing everything to shivers—the threatenings of God's word breaking to pieces all the false and flattering hopes of the ungodly. Then comes the active wrath of God like an overwhelming flood to sweep away everything on which the sinner stood, and he, in his obstinate unbelief, is carried away as with a flood, into that utter destruction, that everlasting misery, which God has declared shall be the lot of all those who refuse the living Jesus Christ. Beware, ye despisers! Beware in time!

I have earnestly tried at this time, in simple language, to set before you the wickedness of refusing the gospel of rest. May the Spirit of God grant that any here who have hitherto neglected it may at once accept it. Try it, weary heart; try it, despondent spirit; try what faith in Jesus can do. Come and trust in Jesus, and see if does not bring peace to your soul. If Jesus fails you let me know it, for I will never extol again if He breaks His promises. He can never cast off or cast away a believing heart. Oh, if there be sweet peace, and calm, and joyful hope, and gladness, and strength, and life, to be had by childlike faith in God's testimony, concerning His dear Son, I pray God that you may obtain it at once.

If you feel an objection to the preacher who now addresses you, pray God that He may preach better; and if you have done so, and He is still distasteful to you, go and hear somebody who will not be personally objectionable, for it would be a grief of heart to me to stand in the way of even one anxious heart. I fear that you yourself stand in your own light. O man, act like a man and hear the gospel candidly. O self! wilt thou destroy thyself? O pride! lower thy crest. O drunkenness! quit thy cups. O hardened sinner! God help thee to leave thy sin. Come and trust Jesus this day. May God enable you so to do by His Holy Spirit, for Christ's sake. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Isaiah 28.]

THE OLD NEWGATE MARKET BUTCHER.

By a London City Missionary.

ONE afternoon on a sultry day in the summer of 1864, wearied with domiciliary visitation, the atmosphere of the thickly-populated houses at H—— being so oppressive, I turned into a quiet little street, and, opening my Bible, read aloud the story of the cleansing of "Naaman the leper."

Attracted by such an unusual proceeding, several persons gathered around me, and others stood at the doors or at uplifted windows, and listened to the wonderful story.

I next told of sin, of its leprous character, of the blood of cleansing, and in conclusion urged each hearer to—

"Prove the value of the blood Of Jesus crucified."

I was about to leave the street, when a woman of prepossessing appearance, and neatly dressed, came out of a house opposite to where I had been standing, and approached me, saying:

"Pardon me, sir, but will you come and speak to my brother?"

"Gladly, madam," I replied, and followed my conductress into the house.

"None of your preaching here—a lot of canting hypocrites! None of it here, that's what I say." Such were the words which greeted my ear as I followed my conductress into the room from which the sounds proceeded. There on a mangle sat a man about forty years of age, clad in a butcher's blouse. There also were his wife and three children, one a little cripple girl about six years of age.

My entrance put a stop to the loud talk of the man, and, sitting down on the mangle beside him, I took from my pocket some books, and gave one with pictures to the little cripple. Then selecting a "British Workman," I read from that paper one of those interesting stories so well suited to benefit working men.

"How pretty!" said the little cripple.

"It's beautiful," exclaimed the wife.

"Not much the matter with that," added the man.

Folding up the paper, I replied, "You are welcome to this, my friend," offering it to him, "and I will soon come and read to you again."

For many weeks I regularly called, and each time read other interesting stories. The man was very civil and the little cripple was delighted to see me. Very soon the wife was induced to attend the mission services, and after a year had passed away, in answer to earnest and persevering prayer, one night the husband came to the meeting, and heard the tale of redeeming love.

About this time the wife perceived that he was making great efforts and forming strong resolutions to leave off his wicked habits, and to free himself from his dissolute associates.

In 1865 their eldest daughter (a fine young woman, aged nineteen years) came home from service very ill; she rapidly grew worse, lingered a few weeks, and died.

I was present at her death. The mother supported the dying girl in her arms, the brother and sisters stood around weeping, the father placed himself at the foot of the bed, and tears streamed down his face as he looked upon the heaving chest and heard the quick, heavy breathing of his departing child.

Addressing her brother and sisters, the dying girl said, "Be good children to father and mother, and think of Jesus, and love Him, and you will meet me in Heaven." Turning to her mother, she continued, "Mother, dear, you do love Jesus, and Jesus loves us all, and you will meet me in Heaven."

"Then, my child, you are not afraid to die?" asked her mother.

"No, mother, why should I be afraid?" answered the girl. "Jesus has suffered for our sins, and God has said He will spare all who trust in the blood of Christ, the same as He did the people in Egypt. I am going to Heaven, and you will meet me there."

And the mother kissed her child, and the child kissed her mother.

For a few moments nothing was heard but the labored breathing of the girl, the smothered sobs of the children, and occasionally a half-suppressed groan wrung from the almost broken-hearted father.

"Father?"

"Yes, my child."

"Come to me, let me kiss you."

And they kissed each other.

"Father, will you meet me in Heaven?"

He weeps but answers not.

Again, in voice calm and firm, comes the inquiry, "Father dear, will you meet me in Heaven?"

And the father falls on his knees and buries his face in the bed-clothes, and bitter sobs and groans convulse his frame.

Again with increased emphasis the daughter asks, "Father, will you meet me in Heaven?"

"Oh! my child," replies the man, "God helping me, I will meet you in Heaven."

"Then, father, you must give up the drink," and having said those words her head dropped back on her mother's arm, and her spirit entered into Paradise.

A few months after the death of his daughter a circumstance occurred which showed that the Holy Ghost was working mightily in the heart of the man. I missed him from his usual place at the meeting of the Lord's Day evening; on the following Tuesday he was again absent from the Bible class. The next day I called at his house to inquire after him, fearing he was ill. With downcast looks and stammering tongue he said, "Mr. Farley, I am a bad man." I shall never forget his look of horror and penitence as he continued, "On Saturday last I cursed my children; I am a wretch to do such a thing;" and as the tears started in his eyes again he said, "I cursed my children, I did."

He had returned from the market the worse for drink; then went into the little back yard and laid down on a bench and fell asleep. The children were sent to awake him. When, sleepy, muddled, and annoyed at being aroused, the old man showed himself in oaths and curses, but the Holy Spirit was there also, and His convicting power was felt. Horror-stricken at what he had done, the man felt himself to be "vile."

Thus brought to feel his state, to see his condition as guilty and perishing, the infinite and boundless love of God in saving the lost by Jesus Christ met his desperate case, and by faith he saw the Lord of glory take his place and suffer in his stead.

Thus brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, he realized peace and joy in believing.

One evening an elder of a Presbyterian church visited him, to converse with him, and to see the change which grace had wrought.

With faltering lips the butcher told of the mercy that had reached him, adding, "I am like one of them things took out of the fire," referring to that Scripture—"Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" (Zech. 3:2).

He left off swearing and discontinued his drams. A gentleness of manner and a kindliness of speech were put on; love filled his breast, and peace and concord dwelt at home. His wife and family felt the change, and praised the name of the Lord. He became a "living epistle read of all men;" he was "a wonder unto many." With him "old things had passed away." Till now he had been unable to read, but he set himself to the task. The cripple girl by this time had learned to read, and she became his instructress. A very touching and pleasing sight was it to see the big, strong man, with the little cripple on his knee, learning of her the A B C. "A little child shall lead them."

About this time he received from his sister, a worthy, pious woman, who for years had not ceased to pray for his conversion, a large print-book containing a selection of "The Sayings of Jesus."

I well remember on one occasion with what pride and joy he spelled out very slowly to me, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."

In the spring of 1867 disease of the heart and lungs showed itself, and very soon it became evident to us all that his days on earth were numbered. For nearly a year longer he continued to go to the market at three o'clock in the morning, and did a little work; but refusing to go to the same excess of riot as formerly his old companions spake all manner of evil against him, and the clerks at the "firm" joined in tormenting him. On one occasion they hid his clothes, got him down, tied his hands and feet, put him into a sack, locked him up in a cellar, and then wrote to his wife, saying, "Your husband Jack is locked up. Tell the parson to come and bail him out."

The poor wife came to me in a state of excitement, bringing the letter. I immediately started for the City, but I had not proceeded very far before I met poor Jack coming quietly along. On my telling him what we had heard, he smiled and said, "It was hard to bear, but I thought how much the blessed Jesus had to bear, and I asked Him to help me and to forgive them."

His health now rapidly failed, and he was unable to work. One day, about a week before he died, he went into the City. Arriving at the market, he called his mates around him, and several of the clerks attracted by his proceedings, also drew near.

"Gentm'n and mates," he said, "you know what Jack was, but the blessed Saviour has saved me; the blessed Jesus died on the cross for me, and He has pardoned my sins."

A few days later, after having been at our Bible class, he went home, and, calling his wife and children and friends around him, he blessed them in the name of the Lord, and told them he was going to see the blessed Jesus and Susy. Then growing weaker he whispered, "Jesus, precious Jesus!" and fell asleep.

"And as a tired bird folds its wings,
Sure of the morning light,
He laid him down in trusting faith,
And did not dread the night."

EGYPT, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

By Rev. E. J. Hytche.

Increasing Interest in Bible Lands—The Five Eastern Toes—The Present State of Egypt—Its Future Restoration—An Alteration of Soil—Effects of the Suez Canal—Egypt to be Given to Antichrist—Reinstated in God's Favor—Sin During the Millennium.

OF all the signs of our times which tell that the last hour of this dispensation is about to strike, we think that one of the most notable is the way in which the Bible lands are coming to the front. Fifty years ago those countries which have for boundaries the Mediterranean on the west and the Caspian Sea on the north-east were scarcely a factor in the politics of Europe. But now questions connected with the future of those countries come increasingly under the notice of European diplomatists, and with the stealthy but tightening grasp of Russia on Asia, Western Europe is brought face to face with problems which moral force tries in vain to solve. Can we wonder, then, that those true Christians who ignore the prophetic page are bewildered by what is passing around, and thus are constrained to echo the words of Jeremiah, at a similar crisis in Jewish history (Jeremiah 6:4), "Woe unto us! for the day goeth away, for the shadows of the evening are stretched out"?

Of the five eastern toes of Daniel's image (Daniel 2:33-42) GREECE was only a geographical expression till fifty years ago. Persia, indeed, existed as a power, but in such a state of decrepitude as fully to illustrate Daniel's prediction (Daniel 7:12), "The rest of the beasts had their dominion taken away, but their lives were prolonged for a season." Babylon, the last as it was the first great universal empire, still forms part of the Turkish Empire; but when the projected Euphratean railway is constructed, it will doubtless be placed under a European protectorate, like the Suez Canal, and ultimately, as the central station or depot of the commerce of Europe and India, will attain the dignity of a capital of a distinct kingdom, as indicated by Zechariah.

Among the most prominent of the five eastern toes of Daniel's image is EGYPT, which, though nominally a dependency of the Turkish Empire, is virtually a distinct nationality, having achieved its quasi-independence this century. The valley of the Nile was colonized by Mizraim, the second son of Ham; and though 4000 years have passed away since it was first peopled by the grandson of Noah, it is still known to the Arabs as "Mizr," or red mud, while the Kopts call it by the name of its founder, "Chemi," or the land of Cham or Ham.

Of the early civilization of Egypt, its monuments and the curios in the British and continental museums are ample proofs. The wisdom, too, of Egypt was proverbial in all eastern lands. But its philosophy did not prevent its falling into the most degrading idolatry—crocodiles, the ibis, beetles, and even apes, forming objects of worship—and that with a fervor which puts the bulk of modern Christendom to shame. Need we say that such mental debasement confirms the apostolic statement (1 Corinthians 1 : 21) that "the world by wisdom knew not God"? And as there can never be doctrinal debasement without moral degradation, so we have every reason to believe, from modern research, that the worship of Apis, the sacred bull, led to orgies of the most disgusting character.

The ancient population of Egypt exceeded 8,000,000, but now it is only about 5,300,000. Of these the Kopts—the lineal descendants of Pharaonic times—number 600,000. They are nominally Christians, but they not only know little of Gospel truth, but their morals, unhappily, are such that the followers of Mahomet who dominate would scarcely be improved in life and conversation were they to copy the example of those professed believers of our Lord.

After holding a foremost position among eastern nations for many centuries, Egypt gradually sank from its high estate, suffering as it did from conquests ranging from Nebuchadnezzar to the Ottoman Empire. And now, as a tributary state of the Turkish Empire, it literally fulfils the prediction of Ezekiel (Ezekiel 29 : 15): "Egypt shall be the basest of the kingdoms, neither shall it exalt itself any more over the nations."

But Egypt, unlike many Bible countries, has not yet fulfilled its destinies, for rather it will be an important factor in the fearful events which are predicted to wind up this dispensation. Already we can trace the initial steps which foreshadow the fact that, just as it was punished for its gross idolatry and bitter persecution of the Jews, so shall it form a conspicuous member of the eastern kingdoms when the reign of Messiah shall no longer be a prophecy but a glorious fact. Had not Isaiah and Daniel predicted this in unmistakable language, we might almost infer it from passing events. Already it is only nominally a province of the Turkish Empire, for it has an hereditary ruler, styled the Khedive; it has a large standing army, and is empowered to make commercial treaties with other nations on equal terms. And had it not been for the jealousy of France and England, Mehemet Ali would doubtless, in 1840, have achieved complete independence. But such separation of Egypt from Turkey, and its recognition as a distinct kingdom, is only a question of time; for the "king of the south," or Egypt, shall yet contend with Antichrist for universal supremacy in the last days, as indicated by Daniel (Daniel 11 : 25).

Another important feature in Egypt as it is, and which gives no faint forecast of its future greatness, is the alteration in the soil which borders the Suez Canal, as well as in the climate around that dreary desert. For it is reported on indisputable authority that a belt of land between Port Said and Suez, about ninety miles long and thirty broad, has already changed its aspect, through the climatic influence of the canal. Prior to its construction the bordering region was so barren that to see the simplest shrub was a marvel; but now grasses and plants spring up almost spontaneously. For though the water of the canal, as the product of two seas, is necessarily brackish, yet it loses much of its saline qualities as it permeates the gravelly soil, and so is fitted to promote the growth of vegetation. In addition to this, the evaporation of the water of the canal has gradually cooled the adjacent region, as well as benefited the vegetable kingdom, by the dew it generates. All these striking facts so fully confirm the prediction of Isaiah that we can see his prophecy in the first stage of its fulfilment (Isaiah 35 : 1): "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose."

Need we, then, say that the present condition of Egypt casts a great ray of light over the prophetic pages dedicated to its future? And even more than this, it remarkably confirms the words of the angel to Daniel, when, in referring to the Saturday night of this dispensation, he said (Daniel 12 : 9): "Go thy way, Daniel, for the words are closed up and sealed till (but no longer) the time of the end."

From the many passages of Holy Writ which foretold, 2500 years ago, the revival of Egypt in the last days, we would briefly refer to these, as they epitomize the whole future of a country which was so much bound up with Jewish history, and which had the high honor to give a refuge to our Lord to escape the merciless hands of Herod, mis-called "the great."

1st. Isaiah gives such an outline of its future in the last days that it reads more like history than a prophecy. From Isaiah 19 : 4 we learn that Egypt will "be given over into the hand of a cruel lord; and a fierce king will rule over them"—even the "king of fierce countenance," of Daniel 8 : 23. That this "fierce king" will be the last Antichrist we shall gather from Daniel, who says (Daniel 11 : 42, 43): "He shall stretch forth his hand upon the countries (eastern nations); and the land of

EGYPT SHALL NOT ESCAPE.

But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt."

After the first conflict of Antichrist with the ruler of Egypt he will enter into a treaty of peace with him on equal terms. But both monarchs being treacherous in heart will only make the compact in deceit, and hence, in trying to overreach each other, they will (Daniel 11 : 27) "speak lies at one table." But it will not be long before Antichrist will again invade Egypt, and this time he will be completely successful (Daniel 11 : 42, 43), and Egypt will form one of the revived Roman Empire's ten kingdoms, with their ten vassal kings, under the headship of Antichrist—just as since 1870 the minor sovereigns of Germany find their head in the King of Prussia as German Emperor.

2d. But, happily, after passing through the terrible tribulation of the last days, Egypt will be reinstated in God's favor, and recover more than its ancient prestige among the eastern nations. For it will become one of those three central kingdoms from which will radiate the knowledge of Messiah's glorious reign, as from a common centre of light. For Isaiah says (Isaiah 19 : 22–24), "Jehovah shall smite Egypt; He shall smite and heal it; and the Egyptians shall return to Jehovah, and He shall be entreated of them, and shall heal them." And even more glorious than this shall it be during the millennium, for "in that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land (or earth); whom Jehovah of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance."

3d. But, though sin will no longer dominate the nations, yet it will not be extinct among at least the Gentile nations during the millennium, and Egypt will apparently not be an exception to this rule. For, as regards the Gentiles, we learn from Zechariah 5 : 1–4, that as the result of a "flying roll," or parchment, 12 yards long and 6 broad, passing over the earth, the thief will be "cut off," or die, as well as the perjurer. But another kind of punishment will be inflicted on any Egyptians who refuse to keep the feast of tabernacles, for we read (Zechariah 14 : 18, 19), "If the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, that have no rain, there shall be the plague, wherewith Jehovah will smite the Gentiles that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles. This shall be the punishment of Egypt, and of all nations that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles." For God will not during the millennium defer the penalty of personal or national sin to the Great Assize; but Christ (Revelation 15 : 3) as "King of nations" (literal, as in margin) will at once punish those who thus defy His visible rule.

The fact is that if sin is so hateful as to call for Divine vengeance now, when we can only walk by faith, how much greater will be its turpitude when men rebel in the very presence of Christ and His vice-kings, the risen saints, and thus contest His regal authority as the world's Pantocrat! And hence our Lord will judge personal or national sin at once during His personal reign, and thus (Matthew 13 : 41) will "gather out of His kingdom all the scandal (literal), and all those which do iniquity."

Unfulfilled prophecy was not given to gratify idle curiosity as respects the future of this world, but rather to stimulate believers to greater vigilance and active service for our Divine Master. And as we see, among other startling signs of these times, the revival of Egypt and the other eastern toes of Daniel's image, we know that they are foreshadows of these last days upon which we have entered, and thus watchfulness becomes an every-day duty.

Making an Old Bonnet Do.—The Rev. J. H. Wilson, of Edinburgh, recently narrated the following incident: "One day at the Edinburgh noon prayer-meeting, I was asked to make a short appeal for the Sunday morning free breakfast, which I did. At the close of the meeting a woman came up to me and gave me a piece of money, wrapped in paper, for the breakfast. I thanked her, and put it into my pocket without looking at it, thinking it was probably a sixpence or a shilling, but I afterward found it was a half sovereign ($2.50). Subsequently I learned the history of that half sovereign. A servant went out that day with a friend, intending to buy herself a new bonnet. When they reached the head of the Mound, they thought, as they had time, they would go into the noon meeting, and buy the bonnet when they came out again. When they came away from the meeting the servant's friend said to her, 'Now, let us go and get the bonnet.' The reply, hesitatingly given, was, 'Oh, I can't get the bonnet now, for I have given away my money for the free breakfast; but never mind, the old one will do quite well for another season."

Two Betting Men Appeared Disposed to Interrupt an open-air preacher's efforts at a boat-race, by laughing and mocking at what was being said. A man who was near them, and listening with marked attention, turned round and severely rebuked the untimely jesters, and said, "I am a betting man, and live by it. I attend most races and regattas, both in England and on the Continent. I have frequently listened to these men preaching God's Word, but never have insulted them, and hope I never shall; and if you are not for these things, you had better pass on; there is no compulsion for any of us to stand and listen. One thing I believe: when you and I come to die we shall be glad to send for such men, though we may jest at them now;" and he added, "I have known some betting men, who, like myself, did not attend to these things, but when death came they left the world in great fear." The scoffers were effectully silenced, and their rebuker was spoken to afterward about his soul.

An Engine-driver, Who Had Gained, Even among his ungodly associates, an unenviable notoriety for his profanity, was recently ridiculing a young man employed on the same railway, who, a few days previously, had been converted to Christ. The young Christian bore the persecution silently for some time, but at length said quietly, but firmly, to his derider, "If you were to laugh me into hell, you would not laugh me out again, neither will you ridicule me when we both stand before the judgment bar of God." The tenderness with which these words were spoken touched the engine-driver's heart, and the Holy Spirit convinced him of sin. He went home in the evening, but his aroused conscience would not let him sleep. In the greatest agony of soul he cried out in the darkness of the night for pardon, and God heard him, and gave him the peace for which he was seeking.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Lady Isabel and Etta Meet—A Visit Arranged—An Accident at the Rectory—Aleth's Suffering—Efforts to Brighten a Sick-Chamber—Old Mike's Solicitude.

TRACES of Arthur's talent in committing to canvas many of his favorite gleams and nooks and peeps, with again the more expansive characteristics of the whole, as it lay in full view from the various windows, hung on the drawing-room wall at Mr. Fennecker's, in rich, clear coloring; outline and tint alike proving that he had an artist's eye and hand combined.

Mrs. Fennecker came into the room to receive Lady Isabel very cordially. She had heard of her kindness to her son, when he paid his pleasant visit to Lionel Court; and in being kind to her sons, you gratified a tender point in Mrs. Fennecker's heart. She was fond of them, and proud too! if the truth were told; and very good sons they were, so her love and pride were very natural. To Mrs. Clemence she was perhaps a little cool in her manner, though, as Lady Isabel's friend, she strove to be all that was polite, and even kind.

"I almost know your daughter!" said Lady Isabel; "may I see her?"

"That is Etta," responded Mrs. Fennecker. "Oh yes! She is in, I think."

While the servant was being despatched to fetch her, Lady Isabel was told that "poor Arthur's death had been a great blow to them all, and especially to Etta, who had never since been quite like her former self." They had all felt it very much, and had gone through a very quiet winter in consequence, but Etta seemed different from the others. She seemed quite to have "taken a dislike to all gaieties, which was rather a pity," her mother said. But perhaps she would come round again after a time.

At this moment Etta, quite unconscious of having been the subject of conversation, entered the room. Her pale face, tinged with the slightest blush of shell-pink; her dark, hazel eyes, beneath a clever earnest brow, and picturesque, wavy, brown hair, all—combined with the sombre surroundings of her black dress, and subdued manner—conspired to interest Lady Isabel and her companion. They were greatly attracted by her appearance, and while they could not but be struck with her chastened, bereaved look, they also noticed the sweet smile that told of a rare, bright intelligence, that might be sparkling were it not sad. Could they have probed Etta's heart, they would have seen in its inner depths a truer grasp of peace, and even something more like satisfaction than aught she had felt in her more thoughtless days. She was beginning to find the light; groping her way into it slowly, but surely.

At parting, Lady Isabel felt disappointed that in her mother's presence Etta had opened out so little, not a word, in fact, of any real importance having passed between them. But Mrs. Clemence secured a quiet half-promise of a visit, and she felt sure that visit would come about. As they drove away, Lady Isabel said, "She has a mind! I do covet intellects and energies whenever I see them! I long to have them ranged on the Lord's side and used in His work."

"Yes!" answered her friend. "Spiritualized intellects are treasures worth winning. Consecrated energies too! How it grieves one to think of noble human powers, divinely given, frittered away in the ball-room, and wasted in the glare and dazzle of what is called 'society.'"

"The dancing and the excitement of the life generally, just form an outlet for so much that would be absolutely invaluable if only turned into another channel. A higher and more lasting pursuit of pleasure they would indeed find it! If we could but persuade many of the girls who are throwing away both their physical and mental ability, to think about these subjects, to look into them, to consider them, how much after-weariness, ennui, unhappiness, disappointment, we might save them!

* * * * * *

"Will you be quiet! Hold your tongue! Can't you speak? Run down to the post-office. No! make haste, oh, do! Go to the grocer's shop, at once, I tell you. O dear! O dear!"

The frantic expressions, and still more frantic voice, alike emanated from the usually unbending Miss Habershon. Mummy-like, hard and cold as she might be in her normal condition, yet that she too, like her weaker neighbors, was capable of an almost hysterical effervescence, was to-day only too evident; and no wonder!

"Can't you find your master anywhere? Bumble, do move about a little quicker. Who's gone for the doctor?" Thus Miss Habershon moved from room to room and from passage to passage, gazing out of the windows, putting up her eye-glasses (she never deigned to wear spectacles); while high and low, and in the garden, and down the street, and at the school, and in the church, the few domestics searched for the Rector.

While this commotion was going on, there was a nursery bedroom near the top of the house, with its door slightly ajar, where, stretched on a little dimity-covered bed lay the motionless form of Aleth. A half-conscious, uneasy sleep was it? or a patient effort to stifle almost unceasing moans of pain? Sobbing beside the bed sat the faithful "nursie" watching, heart-broken at the distress of her little pet.

Aleth had taken her luncheon that day in perfect health, "brighter than any sunbeam," Mr. Habershon had remarked this as admiringly he watched his child dance away to the "nursery regions," as he always called these special apartments. He had gone out to attend to some necessary parish work, intending to wind up his visits with a business call at Ferncroft. At her usual walking hour Aleth had been running down the stairs with her own fleet step, in full pursuit of her favorite white poodle, when her foot slipped. There was only one cry, and a general rush from the various room-doors, and soon poor Aleth was lifted in many arms, her head hanging back, her pretty hair dishevelled, her hands hanging helplessly down, and her eyes so radiant now dull and heavy.

She was carried to the little bed; and there, with only a call now and then for father or nursie, she had lain in this unnatural stupor ever since. Only an hour! but to the anxious watchers it seemed a day, before the doctor's carriage was at the door, and the doctor himself in the room beside her.

In the mean time Mr. Habershon was conversing in his usual comfortable, easy-going style, on generalities, always warding off any opinion that might possibly be contradicted or even differed from. His mental thermometer, from long practice, had acquired an acute power of test. So accurate was this faculty with him, that he could congratulate himself he had the rare faculty of keeping on the best of terms with all his richer parishioners.

Thus he sat, in amicable converse with Mr. and Mrs. Clemence. Perhaps to their taste the intercourse might have seemed slightly frigid, glowing as they were with loving earnestness, and frequently refreshed as they had been with that cheering heart-to-heart interchange of thought on the things of the Kingdom, when meeting with other Christians. Nothing vital was ever allowed to come to the surface when Mr. Habershon held the reins of conversation at all in his own hands. Whether it always lay hidden underneath the pile of innocent nothings of ordinary conversation, it would not be possible for us to tell.

At four o'clock the door-bell rang violently; once, twice, thrice it sounded through the lower corridor before the servant had time to open it. Panting with excitement and fear, the rectory messenger conveyed the dreadful news to the Ferncroft butler, and he again communicated it to the Rector. Opening wide the drawing-room door, he stepped across the carpet, as if he had been going to announce, "Your carriage, sir!" and said in a low voice,

"It's been a haccident, sir. The young lady's been and hurt 'erself."

It took only a moment for the Rector to disappear utterly from the room and from the house, making his rapid way to the darkened room, where he saw—the heart-breaking sight. His child so altered! It was strange! it was unlikely! it wasn't possible! But it might please Providence—each ejaculation, each thought, was drenched into a flood-tide of grief by the doctor's brief, distinct verdict—

"The back—yes! the back injured. The spine, I fear. That's where the mischief is. Keep her perfectly quiet. Don't speak to her. Hold her hand if she starts or seems frightened. Cool her forehead. I will return in an hour."

And away he went, leaving the poor father alone—oh, how much alone!—in his sudden, new sorrow. There he sat, that night, two days and two nights more, and then they forced him to go and lie down in his own room, and strive to get some sleep. Haggard and worn he looked, as he almost tottered across the passage, leaving behind him the little wreck of all his home delight.

Days passed, and as time wore on it was plain enough that Aleth had lost her former powers. Recovery to some extent she might enjoy; but more than this, even Time's healing hand refused to promise. Anxiety and suspense amounted often to absolute torture in the poor father's heart, and was shared in with a tender sympathy more or less by all the other inmates of the house.

The only one who was exempt from this was the little sufferer herself. As she lay there on her little bed, and then on her reclining couch, she had gradually resumed her bright color, her pretty, playful ways, her fancy for every living creature, her delight in manifold dolls of all descriptions that had ever inhabited her nursery; and, above all, she took pleasure in repeating her little hymns and verses, and asking strange, thoughtful questions beyond her years.

"Nursie! do you think that little gold star that peeps through the sky in at my window is God's eye looking down here to see how I am getting on?" she asked one day; and after a storm of wind and rain, when the ruffled banks of white cloud rolled away together in masses lighted up the clear moon, she said,

"Father! I saw God's sheep going home just now to their fold. Such a large flock they were! and their Shepherd was holding the lamp. They will soon be safe in."

"Do your flowers miss me?" she would ask Hutton when, as the greatest of favors, he was allowed to appear by her couch or bedside.

Aleth's room became the sunny spot of the quiet old house. Her father would open her door many times a day, to get a smile from her sweet face. On his way to the dining-room, the study, the parish, he would regale himself with a five-minutes' glance at his darling, or at more leisure times with the half-hour's chat that she so greatly loved.

It was no longer the nursery in which she dwelt, but a room on the drawing-room floor, with a broad low window, through which she could see a large extent of the garden, and even the foot-passengers, as they skirted the outside of the long creeper-covered wall on their various errands backward and forward to and from the town. This view-point was Aleth's great delight. Indeed she delighted in everything. Each fresh event, every loving little attention, the kindness of any visitor, rich or poor, all brought fresh joy and gratitude into her life. The gayest flowers, the prettiest birds, the softest cushions, the loveliest pictures, the most life-like of dolls, all found their way to Aleth's room. It certainly looked a reservoir of simple luxuries, and it was a chamber of happiness.

The first pining for out-door exercise that the child so naturally felt gradually left her, and her day was so divided into hours of varied occupations and leisure that the time did not hang heavily. Some days would not be so bright as others, when she was more inclined to sleep than to read or play. Miss Habershon's wisdom had arranged into a gently controlled order what would otherwise perhaps have proved the very monotonous hours of many a long day. But by the constant variety of reading, painting, knitting, looking at pictures, or playing with her dolls, or seeing her friends, Aleth's winter and spring months passed quietly enough, the irksome confinement being greatly alleviated.

Even old Mike contributed to the child's happiness. Again and again, at breakfast-time, the servant would lay upon the breakfast-table a rich, glowing bunch of dewy roses, freshly gathered, as an offering for "Miss Aleth," or a bunch of colored grasses, some little painted cupor mug, or a tiny basket of his own making. These expressions of kindness, which were all faithfully transferred by Miss Habershon with her own hands to the Oriel Room, as Aleth's abode was named, at last drew her to the back-door for a conference with the giver, and there she beheld the old man.

Rather coldly she was thanking him, as she stood with head there erect, when suddenly she was interrupted by "old Mike's" remarking,

"Pretty lamb! I thinks of her a deal; and I prays for her, night and mornin', I do; and whenever I'se passing jest this way, an' underneath that 'ere window where she do lie. Lor bless ye, miss! I'd like to see her, I would. She's that on my mind. I'd like to see her."

PARABLES ON PRAYER.

S. S. Lesson for May 22d, Luke 18 : 1-14. Golden Text, 11 : 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day runs thus: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Our Lord adds moreover, "For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." It is absolutely necessary that when we pray we should recognize that we are doing a real thing, making a real claim on the living God; not simply going through an accustomed form, or even stating accustomed wishes to Him. Every one that asketh receiveth, therefore every one who does not receive does not really ask, does not make a real, substantial claim on God.

The widow of our subject illustrates perseverance. Jesus taught "that men ought always to pray, and not to faint." The widow would not relax her plea. Although the wicked judge, before whom she brought her cause, said, "I fear not God, nor regard man," yet she thought it was worth while to continue her appeal. Notwithstanding all discouragements, and without having the least apparent shadow of success, she still urged her plea. Jesus would teach us that if perseverance in such a case is worth the while, then certainly it is worth while to persevere and not faint in our appeals to a just and merciful God. "Shall not God avenge (take up the cause of) His own elect, which cry day and night unto Him, though He bear long with them?"

Now let us ask ourselves, Are our prayers real appeals made to God, or are they simply the expression of what we wish? God's proof is the measure in which they are answered. If in very deed we believe when we pray, that we receive whatsoever things we desire, God says we shall have them. And yet how many Christians have more to tell of unanswered than of answered prayers; of not receiving than of receiving. Is there not in many a heart a certain reserve and holding back from asking that which does not seem likely to come to pass, a praying with the eye on circumstances or on former experience, more than on the present power of the living God? If we are sure that we have good ground for our request, that it is according to the will of God, and if we are sure we come to God in the authority of the name of Jesus, we ought not to let anything discourage us. The Syrophœnician woman would not take the apparent repulse of the Lord Jesus, when He placed her among the dogs, but knowing that He had never yet cast out one who came to Him for help, she persevered, and her daughter was made whole.

Our Lord draws a contrast between the two men who went up into the Temple to pray—the one a Pharisee, known everywhere as externally a praying man, one who sought for, and got, the credit of being so; the other a publican, a man sharp after business, who would never be mistaken for a pious man. Had any one wanted to learn something about prayer, and had asked in Jerusalem which of these two men he should follow that he might be profited by the overhearing of their prayers, most men would have said, "The Pharisee, of course," and yet God, who seeth the heart, turned the Pharisee's heart inside out, and we see his little soliloquy in all its naked, barefaced self-righteousness. The man had no sense of the presence of God, and no sense of his having any need of His assistance. He "prayed with himself," not with God; he was perfectly capable, so he thought, of managing his own affairs. He asked for nothing, for he felt he needed nothing. There was no cry for mercy: how could a man who laid God under such obligations as he did, need mercy? God was his debtor according to his prayer.

And this is but a sample of that which is going on every day and everywhere, among Protestants and Catholics, among all denominations of Christians, so called—nominal worship from such as think, because they are outwardly better than others, that they lay God under obligation, and therefore make no real heartfelt claim on Him; they think they do all they can, and that God can require no more. And all this time they have not so much as made acquaintance with God, not so much as once really met with Him or had to do with Him. They have prayed, like the Pharisee, with themselves, and God's presence has been neither sought after nor missed. The whole performance has been unreal, and God does not call it prayer: "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him" (Heb. 11 : 6).

The publican had no righteousness to boast of like the Pharisee, but he had that which the other lacked—the consciousness of God's presence, for "he stood afar off" in his sense of real shame, and "he would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner." Whose presence did he shrink from that he stood afar off? God's. Whose eye did he shun, that his own were downcast? God's. From whom did he ask mercy, when he blamed himself, and smote upon his own guilty heart? God. "Every one that asketh receiveth." This man went down to his house with the matter settled, his prayer answered, his soul justified. This is prayer.

But there are conditions, and important ones, annexed to God's promise that He will answer prayer. First, it must be in the name of Jesus (John 14 : 13, 14; 15 : 16; 16 : 23, 24, 26). In our own name we have no claim upon God, for we are in ourselves only condemned sinners; in Christ, however, the beloved of God, we are already accepted (Eph. 1 : 6), and in Him God is well pleased (Matt. 3 : 17). God has "given Him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth" (Phil. 2 : 9, 10); and it is in this all-powerful name that we make our petitions. Thus the question is not, "Can God grant or refuse to such as we are the requests we are making?" The question is, "Can He turn away the face of His Anointed" (Ps. 132 : 10)? There is power in Jesus' name to cast out devils, to speak with new tongues, to tread on serpents, and to heal the sick (Mark 16 : 17, 18; Acts 3 : 16). Let our eye be steadily fixed on the might of that name; let us forget ourselves and our circumstances, and according to our faith it will be unto us.

Forgiveness of injuries is also a condition of answered prayer. The Saviour says: "And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any; that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses" (Mark 11 : 25, also Matt. 5 : 23, 24). When our affairs with man are not settled, we cannot expect to be heard of God, for God is no party to sin, and He is merciful to us, that we may learn to be merciful to our fellow-men (Matt. 18 : 23, 35). Another condition of answered prayer is, that we should abide in Christ, for He says, "If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you" (John 15 : 7). Abiding in Christ we are not abiding in ourselves. We are living His life and not ours, His thoughts and His desires replace ours, and thus we ask according to His will. Then the glorious truth comes into full play: "And this is the confidence that we have in Him, that, if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us; and if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of Him" (1 John 5 : 14, 15). "We know;" it is not said that we feel or we experience. We know, because He has said so, and we can trust Him to justify His own Word.

INCIDENTS OF THE FIVE POINTS MISSION.

A Dying Man in the Den of Thieves.

ONE Tuesday evening in the winter of 1851, the usual weekly prayer-meeting was in session at the Mission Room, which was directly opposite the Old Brewery. Two men, under the influence of liquor, abruptly entered and inquired for the missionary. Mr. Luckey asked them their business. They replied that a sick man in one of the upper rooms of the Old Brewery desired his immediate attendance.

The appearance of the men, the hour of the night, the locality specified, besides the fact that the prayer-meeting required his presence, caused Mr. Luckey to hesitate, and he dismissed the men with the promise that he would come the next day. In a little time one returned, urging that the man was dying and must see him immediately. The call was thus decisive, and, laying aside every personal consideration, Mr. Luckey resigned the charge of the meeting to his wife, and taking one of the mission converts with him, followed his rough, half-drunken guide. They crossed the street, and entered the dark, narrow passage known as "Murderer's Alley," groped their way back to the "Den of Thieves," and then commenced ascending a creaking stairs.

The guide reached back his hand to Mr. Luckey, and, thus escorted, he proceeded. Standing on the first platform, a glimmering light through the cracked walls and the sound of noisy mirth proclaimed a drunken revel. The guide unceremoniously placed his foot against the door, which yielded to the heavy pressure, entered the room, and, snatching a burning brand from the hearth, again appeared, and they continued their upward path until they reached a long low room near, if not in, the attic.

On entering, Mr. Luckey found the sick man on a miserable bed, evidently near the grave, agonized with fear and remorse, and a pale-looking wife and daughter almost fainting with fright. The man besought Mr. Luckey to remove him from that dreadful place; and when he attempted to direct his mind to the Saviour, the imploring response was, "Oh, take me first from here; take me where Jesus can come." Mr. Luckey proposed prayer. "Oh, they will murder us if you pray," was the trembling response, as the sound of oaths and curses from the next room fell upon the ear. The missionary, strong in faith, knelt down; the first words of prayer brought a number of fierce, half-drunken men and women into the room, who, as soon as they recognized him, fell back, whispering, "It's the minister; it's Mr. Luckey." And as his voice rose in pleading prayer to God for the sick and the wretched around, every sound was hushed, and they retreated to their own dens in perfect stillness.

When Mr. Luckey was about leaving the room, the family clung around him, beseeching him not to leave them, but to take them hence; and their fear and importunity were so excessive that Mr. Luckey dispatched a messenger to a neighboring house to know if they could be accommodated for the night. Receiving an affirmative answer, the two took the sick man in their arms, and, followed by the wife and daughter, descended.

The man lay with clasped hands and eyes upraised, praying incessantly, and when laid in a quiet place, exclaimed, "Now Christ can save me."

In a few days he was removed to the City Hospital, where Mr. Luckey visited him, and although he sank and died within a week, yet apparently he learned to trust in Christ and rest on Him as his Saviour. The wife (who became such by Mr. Luckey's performing the ceremony of marriage in the hospital) survived but a short time, and the daughter obtained a residence with a respectable family on Staten Island.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

English Radicals Threaten Opposition to the proposal to erect a monument to Lord Beaconsfield in Westminster Abbey. Their organ, the London Daily News, hints that Mr. Gladstone is himself averse to the scheme, and has only proposed it in deference to the known wishes of Queen Victoria. The motion of which notice is given is to vote "an address praying the Crown to provide a monument in Westminster Abbey to the memory of Lord Beaconsfield, with an inscription expressing the high sense of the House of his rare and splendid gifts, devoted labors in Parliament and great offices of State, assuring the Queen that the House of Commons would make good the expenses attending thereon." It is expected that sixty members will vote against it, and that twenty will abstain from voting. The Conservatives are preparing to establish a memorial of some utility—probably a college—in addition to the proposed stained glass window in Hughenden Church. The opposition of the Radicals to Mr. Gladstone's motion is another evidence how very slender are the ties which hold his party together. Dissensions on the Land Bill and on the bill to admit Mr. Bradlaugh and other infidels to Parliament, are other indications of the same fact.

Accounts from the West of Ireland Represent that the state of affairs there is becoming very serious. A number of outrages of various degrees of atrocity are reported. Bands of armed men promenade the country and terrorize the inhabitants unchecked. The Times, in a leading article, says: "It has been our painful duty to record during the past two or three weeks repeated acts of outrage in the west and south of Ireland scarcely inferior in atrocity to those which awakened the national conscience four months ago. To-day the record of agrarian crime is more serious than at any time since Parliament met in January."

Mr. Dillon, Member of Parliament for an Irish constituency, was arrested under the Coercion Act on May 2d. The Lord-Lieutenant's warrant for his arrest charges Mr. Dillon "with inciting persons forcibly to riot and to oppose and resist the execution of processes of law for giving possession of land." Mr. Dillon has been the most violent agitator in the Land League, and even his colleagues deplored his imprudence. In the last speech he delivered, he advised the people to "keep within the law, not because he respected it or thought that they respected it, but for the sake of preserving their organization they must exercise their ingenuity to sail as close to the line as possible." Mr. Dillon's incarceration will be a severe blow to the Land League, in which he was one of the most intelligent and energetic workers. After Mr. Davitt he was the most efficient organizer at the disposition of Mr. Parnell, who will not find it easy to replace him.

A strong feeling of discontent has been evoked in the Land League by the arrest, and Mr. Parnell has announced that in consequence of it, he and his followers will either oppose the Irish Land Bill or leave the House without voting on it.

The Operations of France in Tunis are Being anxiously watched by European statesmen. Sir Charles Dilke, who represents the Foreign Office in the British House of Commons, delivered a speech on April 28th which was considered reassuring, as it indicates concert of action between England and Italy—the only two Powers interested—in restraining France to punitive measures. It is feared that the French successes will create an outbreak at Tunis, and anxiety is felt for the safety of Europeans there. The British fleet is assembling at Malta to prepare for contingencies.

The Empress of Russia, who is a Sister of the Princess of Wales, is threatened by the Nihilists with a terrible death in revenge for the execution of Sophie Pieoffsky. It is known that the Empress pleaded that the Nihilist girl should be saved, and assurance was given her that her request would be granted. When she heard that she had been deceived she fell into an agony of grief and fear, and her health is seriously affected. In a letter recently received, from St. Petersburg, the writer says, "Chaos reigns in the public offices and at the Anitchkoff Palace. I do not believe that the Czar will restore order by genuine reform. There is no doubt of the uprightness of the Czar or the excellence of his heart, but his capacity is open to question. The Czarina is terrorized into madness. Her reason appears shaken by the dread in which she lives. The noise made by the sappers who are digging a ditch round the Anitchkoff Palace has a dreadful effect on her nerves. This ditch undermines the prestige of the sovereign in the eyes of the population, who find in it a sign that the autocracy no longer rests on the tacit sanction of the people. It expresses to them the moral isolation of the Imperial family."

A dispatch to the London Times says: "While the Czar remains in retirement at Gatschina the implacable enemies of his government are as dangerously busy as ever. Rumors and reports of daring operations by the Nihilists in disseminating manifestoes conveying warnings to the Czar continue. The social and political atmosphere of St. Petersburg is growing thicker and thicker and is fraught with omens of another approaching storm. The city is like a gloomy prison house where little is heard of the outside world, and everybody lives in a constant state of painful suspense." The despatch of convicts through Moscow for Siberia has begun. The number to be deported is about twelve thousand two hundred.

Lord Beaconsfield's Successor will Probably be the Marquis of Salisbury, in spite of the previous arrangement. As he would, in any case, be the real leader of the bulk of the Conservative party, it is thought that defections would ensue even if a nominal leader like the Duke of Richmond were chosen, and that those defections may as well be made now as at a later period. British journals say that "Lord Salisbury, with his lack of tact, narrow views, obstinacy, rashness, and lack of candor, will never win popular confidence." It is nevertheless true that excepting Lord Cairns the marquis is by far the most capable leader among the Conservatives; and there is a prejudice against Lord Cairns because he is an Irish lawyer and an evangelical churchman. There are indications of divisions in both parties of British politicians, and it seems probable that a re-arrangement of them must come at no distant date.

An Important Discovery has been made in Egypt. A telegram from Cairo says, "M. Maspero has just opened some more pyramids at Sakkara, inclosing the tombs of kings of the fifth dynasty. The mortuary chapel of each contains about eighty square metres of the smallest and most closely written texts, giving precise details of the religious belief of that age. Except the finding of the Rosetta stone in 1799 no discovery in Egypt equals this in scientific value. The entrance passage is difficult and dangerous on account of the loose blocks that encumber it. All the Sakkara pyramids, about sixty in number, will be opened as soon as possible.

A Visitation of the Plague is Apprehended in Europe. It is raging on the banks of the Euphrates, and manifests a strong intention to invade Europe. Two years ago Russia stamped out the disease by measures of inexorable rigor, but the Turks are too apathetic and fatalistic to oppose it effectually, and its progress in Asia seems to justify the demands made upon European governments to take means for its immediate repression when it appears, as is threatened, upon the shores of the Bosphorus and the Black Sea.

A British Consul is Held for Ransom by Greek brigands. A telegram from Constantinople states that Mr. Suter, a British consul residing near Salonica in Turkey, and his wife, have been carried off to the mountains on the new boundary line between Greece and Turkey. They were attacked in their house in the middle of the night and were required to give up all the money they possessed. The brigands were disappointed at the small amount in the house, and therefore ordered them to accompany them to the mountains, hoping to extort a ransom for their release. "With much difficulty they put on their clothes, and, after an arduous march, reached the top of the mountain. There they found a grassy platform of considerable size surrounded by bushes and trees. The servants were then ordered to spread rugs on the grass and the prisoners were told to sit down, while the brigands formed a large circle round them, some sitting and some standing, while others seemed posted all over the mountain, signalling and whistling to each other. Having entered into negotiations for the ransom, and forced Mr. Suter to write a letter to the consul general, they let his wife go, and after a sad parting from her husband she made the best of her way to Salonica." The consul-general is negotiating for Mr. Suter's release, but fears are entertained that he was accidentally killed in an action between the brigands and Turks.

Whispering Across the Sea. The Electrophone, an improved form of the telephone, was tested on May 7th by a submarine cable between Calais in France and Dover in England. The Paris correspondent of the London Telegraph describes the experiment as a complete success. He says, "Not only were the words whispered into the apparatus at Calais distinctly heard at Dover, but the listener at one end was perfectly well able to distinguish by the mere tones of the voice the person who was speaking at the other end. The inventor maintains that it is just as easy to talk across the Atlantic as from one room to another, and he has succeeded so well in the first practical illustration of his apparatus that one is scarcely justified in doubting his assertion that he has found out a system by which words spoken from the other side of the ocean can be fixed on their arrival here and treasured up for further use."

A Naval Disaster Involving a Serious Loss of life occurred April 26th. The Doterel, a British war sloop, was accidentally blown up in the Straits of Magellan. The explosion occurred in the magazine at ten o'clock in the morning. It is supposed that the boiler burst and exploded the magazine. The victims of the explosion number eight officers and 135 men killed. Three officers and fourteen others were saved.

Deadly Contagion in a Railroad Car.—Miss Edith Dove, a young lady twenty-six years of age, has just died in the Infirmary at Reigate, England, of smallpox. She was visiting some friends at the adjoining village of Merstham, and while coming by train into the town, noticed that a man in the compartment was wrapped in blankets and accompanied by a disagreeable odor. On her return to her friend's house the same disagreeable smell emanated from her, and she soon showed symptoms of smallpox. She was removed to the nearest infirmary, and died two days after her admission. The recklessness which characterized those who had arranged the removal of the smallpox patient in a public conveyance cannot be too severely condemned. Such cases are too common in Europe, and they are often recorded by the press, but the spiritual deaths which are continually resulting from contagion with people full of the corruption of sin we hear little of now, though they will be known hereafter.

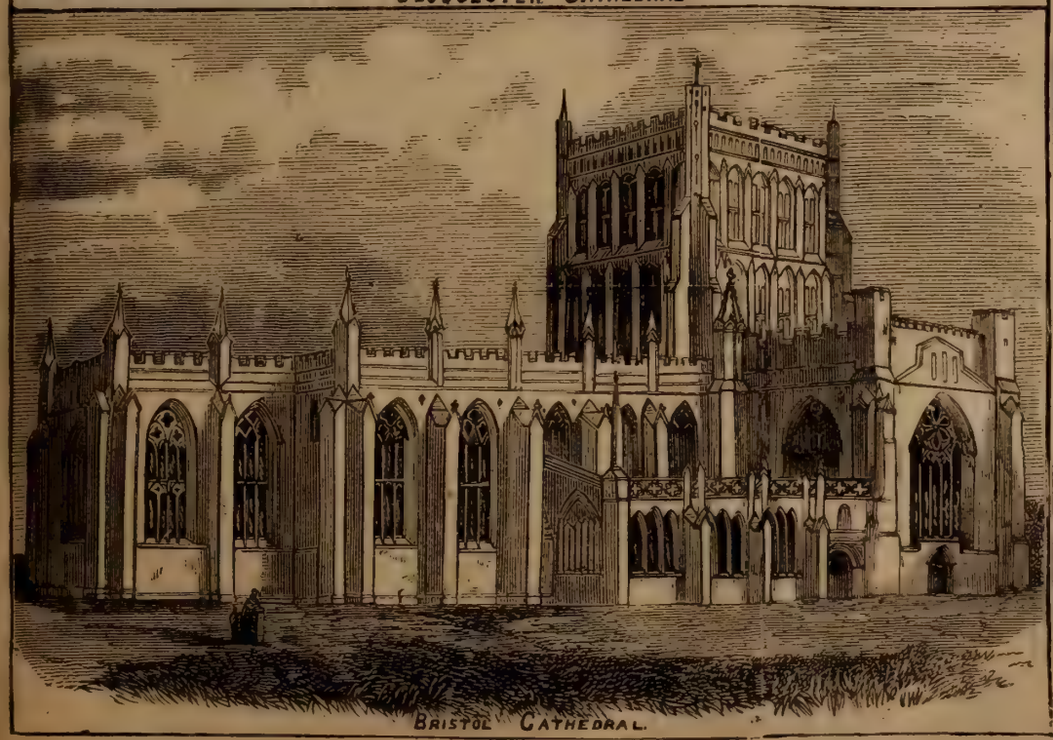
GLOUCESTER CATHEDRAL.



BRISTOL CATHEDRAL.

ABBEY GATEWAY, BRISTOL.

The BISHOP of GLOUCESTER and BRISTOL, England, and the Cathedrals of the Diocese.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

Career at Cambridge University—Enters Holy Orders—Settles at Pilton—Marriage in 1848—Professor of Divinity at King's College, London, 1858—Hulsean Lecturer at Cambridge, 1860—Dean of Exeter, 1861—Meets with a Railway Accident—Appointment as Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol in 1863—Annual Pastoral Letters.

THE Right Rev. Charles John Ellicott, D.D., who on account of his brilliant scholarship was chosen chairman of the committee appointed to revise the New Testament, was born April 25th, 1819, and was the only son of the Rev. Charles Spencer Ellicott, Rector of Whitewell, Rutlandshire, England. He received his early education at Oakham and Stamford schools, from whence he proceeded to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. with honors in 1841, and was elected a Fellow. In the following year he carried off the First Member's prize, and in the next year he gained the Hulsean prize by an essay on the "History and Obligation of the Sabbath." He took his M.A. degree in 1844.

He entered the church in deacon's orders in 1846, and on entering priest's orders in 1847 was collated to the vicarage of Pilton, a small living in his native county. Here he married, on August 31st, 1848, Constantia Anne, daughter of Admiral Beecher, the Arctic explorer, and who was descended from an ancient Devonshire family of that name, a considerable portion of which emigrated to America in the seventeenth century, and have attained eminence in religious circles. There have been born of this marriage one son, Arthur Beecher Ellicott, barrister-at-law, and two daughters.

From Pilton he proceeded in 1858 to London, having been chosen to succeed Archbishop Trench, of Dublin, as Professor of Divinity at King's College, London. In the following year he was appointed Hulsean Lecturer. This office was established in 1791 by the Rev. John Hulse, who, fearing the progress of atheism, or at least the neglect of religion among the students of Cambridge University, left his property in trust at his death for the maintenance of a course of lectures, the support of two scholars at St. John's College, and to found and support the office of Christian Advocate and Hulsean Lecturer or Christian preacher.

To this latter office Dr. Ellicott was called, he having won one of the scholarships while a student in St. John's College, and in 1860 he was appointed Hulsean Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. In this capacity his lectures on the "Life of our Lord Jesus Christ" displayed profound theological learning and critical but above all a sincere reverence for the subject of his study, arising from heartfelt love to Him as his own Saviour.

KNOWLEDGE OF THE GREEK LANGUAGE,

These lectures attracted considerable attention outside of the University of Cambridge, and marked him out for high church preferment. This honor was not long delayed, for in 1861 he was appointed Dean of Exeter. Just at this time he met with a very severe railway accident, in which one of his legs was badly crushed and his system very much shaken. This event called forth the sympathies of the people of Cambridge, to whom, during his residence in the University, he had very much endeared himself. His progress was watched, and every changing symptom made known by public announcements, which were looked for with interest.

In 1863 the late Bishop Baring was translated from the see of Gloucester and Bristol to that of Durham. To fill the vacancy in this western diocese Dr. Ellicott was selected. Of this promotion he was worthy, and although it occasioned many regrets among the students and townspeople of Cambridge, his elevation was hailed with delight by the clergy of the new diocese, and approved by churchmen generally. He is the thirty-first and a worthy successor of the sainted martyr Hooper, and the forty-seventh Bishop of Bristol.

These Bishoprics are two of the six created by Henry VIII. They were united in 1836. In his episcopal office Dr. Ellicott is much respected, and the clergyman must be of a very extreme school indeed who cannot depend on the Bishop's cordial interest in himself and his work. He has done more to unite the clergy throughout his diocese in aggressive work upon the ranks of sin than any previous holder of the office of spiritual overseer in it. Notwithstanding the vast amount of official episcopal work, attendance at the House of Lords, and literary undertakings to be kept in motion, Dr. Ellicott may often be found in an obscure village church in his diocese, assisting a hard-worked clergyman at a mission service.

He has established in Bristol a Church Aid Society and a Church Defence Society, the one, aggressive, to push forward the work of evangelizing the masses, the other defensive, to meet the onslaught of infidels, of which Bristol has more than the usual proportion. To these societies the bishop is something more than an ornamental patron, or figure-head of the craft, for his motto seems to be the wholesome one of

"COME ON."

One of the local comic prints, in an issue in the early days of his episcopal history, well illustrated his energy in this direction by representing him with a rope around the necks of half a dozen of his clergy, and himself running at a terrible pace, compelling his captives to follow at the risk of falling.

From his first entrance on his diocesan work Dr. Ellicott has made it a rule to issue to his clergy an annual pastoral letter, in which he deals with passing events, such as are touched upon by other bishops in their triennial charges. These are full of warm sympathy, and have formed no small portion of his useful episcopal machinery.

Besides his Hulsean Lectures and several volumes of sermons, his "Critical and Grammatical Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles" will worthily perpetuate his name in the annals of learned and industrious authors. He is also editor of "A New Testament Commentary for English Readers," by various writers, and last, not least, the chairman of the New Testament company of Revisers charged with the important mission of improving the translation of the English Scriptures.

GLOUCESTER CATHEDRAL.

Erected as a Thank-offering—A Newly-converted Saxon Prince—The First Edifice Burned—A Monk's Prophecy—The Burial of the Murdered Edward II.—Gift of a Golden Ship—Monuments to Edward Jenner and Robert Raikes—The Whispering Gallery.

THIS building, like its companion of Bristol, was the church of a monastic house. The first one built on the site was partly erected by a Saxon king named Wulfhere, brother of Peda or Peada, King of Mercia, both of whom had been converted and reclaimed from barbarous habits through the instrumentality of itinerant monks who were sent out from Augustine's Mission at Canterbury. Peda built Litchfield Cathedral, and had nearly finished that of Peterborough when he died. King Wulfere took up the work, and when he had finished Peterborough he built the monastery at Gloucester, about the year 700.

It may serve to illustrate the spirit of these Saxon princes, and show how impossible they thought it was to render too much to God in return for all He had given to them, to state that the lands which Wulfhere then conferred extended nearly twenty miles east and west, and that in the erection of the buildings the foundation stones were of such dimensions, that eight yoke of oxen could with difficulty draw one of them.

Several monks, more or less distinguished, had to do with the rebuilding of the edifice after it was twice burned by fire, in A.D. 1102 and 1122. The first we hear of was named Serle, of whom Godfery the chronicler writes :—

"He pleased the very princes he reproved.
A hasty judgment or disordered state
Of life or morals were his utter hate,

Another abbot, Thokey, concerned in these rebuildings is noteworthy. Edward II. paid a visit to the abbey and was received with great honor. As he sat in the hall he noticed on the walls the portraits of his kingly predecessors, and jocosely asked if his own were among them. The abbot, desiring to pay some great compliment, answered that he hoped to have him in some more honorable place.

The words at that time were devoid of meaning, but proved to be prophetic. Edward was murdered at Berkeley Castle, and three monasteries refused to receive the corpse, dreading the anger of the ruling powers. Abbot Thokey, however, stepped forward, and brought it in honorable procession to his monastery, and there interred it near the great altar. This event gave the monastery an incalculable increase of wealth, popularity, and influence, for King Edward III. speedily overthrew his father's murderers, and every one was glad for the son's sake to come and pay their respects at his dead father's shrine.

Offerings flowed in a continual glittering stream. The monks, we are told, were obliged to sell some hundreds of pieces of silk interwoven with gold, their treasury being so overcrowded. The young King Edward III., being on one occasion in danger of shipwreck, vowed a golden ship to the shrine if he escaped, and he performed the vow, but subsequently redeemed the ship for one hundred pounds.

Among the monuments are an alabaster tomb of Edward II., a statue of Edward Jenner, the discoverer of vaccination, and a mural tablet bearing the names of the Rev. J. Stock and Robert Raikes, who are stated on it to have been conjointly concerned in establishing the Sunday School system.

In the cathedral is a whispering gallery mentioned by Lord Bacon, bearing the following rhyming inscription on its walls :—

"Doubt not but God, who sits on high,
Thy secret prayers can hear,
When a dead wall thus cunningly
Conveys soft whispers to the ear."

BRISTOL CATHEDRAL.

Its Monastic Origin—Spared by Henry VIII. and Made a Cathedral—The Remains of the Original Abbey Church—The Fine Norman Gateway

THIS building was originally a monastery dedicated to St. Augustine. It was built in 1148 by Robert Fitzharding, the founder of the present Berkeley family, and a feudal lord of some importance during the stormy times of King Stephen. He was what was then called a prepositor of Bristol, an office which was a combination of overseer and chief magistrate, very like to the present official position of the Lord Mayor of London.

Stephen was here met in 1141 by the barons who were fighting on the side of Maud or Matilda, Daughter of Henry I., whose right to the crown Stephen disputed. Fitzharding being a powerful lord was able to make his own terms with Stephen; in return for certain favors he threw his influence on Stephen's side, and in consequence Stephen was enabled to treat with Maud's friends at Wallingford and close the civil war.

The Augustine monastery afterwards attained to such a degree of wealth and splendor that when Henry VIII. was laying his hands upon the religious houses, he was induced in some measure to spare this one. Part of the church, however, was already destroyed when the king's attention was called to it; but as he found the abbey lands were so extensive and fruitful, he erected it into a bishopric and gave the abbey the rank of a cathedral.

The transept, the eastern part of the nave, and the choir are the only parts of the original church which are saved, and their stately grandeur gives some idea of the vast proportion and beauty of the building when in its entirety. The painted windows are very ancient, as are also some of the monuments. The architectural style of the cathedral is the early Norman. The See of Bristol was united by an order in Council with that of Gloucester in 1836.

THE ABBEY GATEWAY, BRISTOL.

This beautiful architectural monument, of which we present a view on our front page, is universally esteemed one of the finest Norman gateways in England. It is conjectured that it was built even read? Not at all; their history was much more romantic than that.

A gentleman-squatter had taken a native from the Wellington police-cells not very far from us—an Italian and thence to England. There the black was bleached, clothed, and made a gentleman, with a wardrobe at his back. He knew the tenets of civilization while among the civilized; but sometime after his return to quarters all encumbrances, broke the case of his watch, and cutting the works into his remaining two-four parts, a portion came no better into the hands of the heir-apparent of the Eagle-Hawk.

But now we are approaching that part of the creek where game most abounds; and if Dick cannot understand a museum or a watch, he has arts and sciences of his own, transmitted by generations of ancestors, who have inhabited this continent for—how long? Ask says for countless millenniums before Adam. But Ash has no ideas of chronology and other more important ologies, I am afraid.

THE BUDDING FIG-TREE—A POST-SCRIPT.

By Rev. William Maude.

A Scheme for Jewish Colonization—Emigrants for Palestine—Oppression an Element of Pressure—Mr Oliphant's Object—The Fig-Tree already Budding

SINCE the article bearing the above title which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 20th and 27th, was written, an important and interesting book having a distinct though indirect bearing on the subject has issued from the press. I allude to the work of Mr. Laurence Oliphant, entitled "The Land of Gilead."

Mr. Oliphant's name has for some time past been associated with a scheme for the establishment of a Jewish colony in Palestine, under either Turkish or English auspices. Regarding this project and its practicability Mr Oliphant says: "As the area of land which I should propose in the first instance for colonization would not exceed a million, or at most a million and a half, of acres, it would be hard if out of nearly 7,000,000 of the Jewish people attached to it by the tradition of former possession, enough could not be found to subscribe a capital of £1,000,000, or even more, for its purchase and settlement, and if out of that number a selection of emigrants could not be made possessing sufficient capital of their own to make them desirable colonists. I should not expect such men to come from England or France, but from European and Asiatic Turkey itself, as well as from Russia, Galicia, Roumania, Servia, and the Slav countries where they are more especially oppressed, and where there are many among the richer classes who would gladly exchange the persecution under which they live for the freer air which they would breathe (even) under Turkish rule in the land of their forefathers."

It is true that about 25,000 are there already, but they are for the most part, of a mendicant class, and are deprived of that protection which they would enjoy under the auspices of a company and a charter securing them a certain amount of self-government. As to its condition in in Palestine contrasts favorably with that of the Jews in Russia or Roumania, while in other parts of Asiatic Turkey they form in many instances the richest section of the community, and contribute largely by their capital to the prosperity of the country. Mr. Geary, in an interesting account of a journey recently undertaken from India to Europe through Asiatic Turkey, thus describes a community of Jews which he visited near Bagdad:

"The Jews of the town of Hillah," he says, "form a large body, and the capitalists among them advance money to the cultivators of the soil to make irrigation cuttings and plant crops. It is said that agriculture, such as it is, of half Mesopotamia would come to an end if it were not for the Jews of Bagdad and Hillah, who are in that country what the Sowcars are in India. They carefully abstain from buying land, and as a rule from building houses, so that when the moment comes that summons them to Jerusalem they may not be delayed by the necessity of turning immovable property into ready money. For the most part they are the descendants of the Jews of the Captivity, a Jewish community has lived in this struggle land by the waters of Babylon since Israel was led captive, but it has never ceased to yearn for a return, more or less triumphant and numerous, to the heritage of the seed of Abraham."

The journey of which this book is the narrative was undertaken by Mr Oliphant for the purpose of judging by personal observation what part of Palestine would be the most suitable position for his proposed colony. Before deciding definitely, he says, whether the scheme was a practicable one or not, I found that it would be necessary to visit the country, with the view of selecting the district and examining the local conditions. . . . Prior to starting, however, it seemed to be my first duty to lay the matter before the Government, with the view of obtaining their support and approval, and I therefore communicated to the then Prime Minister and Lord Salisbury the outline of the project.

From both ministers I received the kindest encouragement and assurances of support, so far as it was possible to afford it without officially committing the government. And I was instructed to obtain, if possible, the unofficial approval of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs of the scheme. I therefore proceeded to Paris, and submitted it to M. Waddington, who was sufficiently favorably impressed with the idea to give me a private letter to the French ambassador at Constantinople and other diplomatic and consular representatives in Turkey. I was also similarly provided with letters of recommendation from our own Foreign Office.

The result of Mr. Oliphant's searching out of the land is thus given: "The region which I should propose for settlement, in the first instance, would be the entire district of the Belka from the Arnon on the south to the Jabbok on the north, extending eastward as far as the Hadj road, or, at all events, to the limit of the good land, and, if necessary, including such portions of the peninsula of Ajlun to the north of the Jabbok as might be deemed the most desirable, making a tract of at least a million, or possibly a million and a half acres. The western boundary would be the Jordan and the western shore of the Dead Sea, thus including that singular sheet of water within its limit.

"As I was prevented from extending my trip as far south as the Arnon, I will refer to the testimony of Canon Tristram as a proof that, in recommending the plains of Moab as well as the land of Gilead for settlement I have good authority for dwelling upon their advantages. Indeed, the universal opinion of those familiar with them is that it would have been sufficient evidence were none other forthcoming that the pastoral and agricultural purposes the tribe of Reuben occupied the most favorable region in Palestine."

The special object, however, in these remarks is not to discuss particulars with Mr. Oliphant's scheme and its particular merits or demerits, but rather to draw attention to the confirmation which he indirectly affords of our expressed conviction that has even now dawned, and consequently that the millennial summer is nigh at hand. Mr. Oliphant, it must be understood, is not himself a believer in Jewish restoration as the fulfilment of inspired prophecy. "The restoration of the Jews to Palestine," he remarks, "was been so often urged upon sentimental or scriptural grounds, that now, when it may possibly become the practical and commonsense solution of a great future difficulty, a prejudice against it exists in the minds of those who have always regarded it as a theological chimera, which it is not easy to remove."

The mere accident of a measure involving most important international consequences having been advocated by a large section of the Christian community from a purely Scriptural point of view, does not necessarily impair its political value. On the contrary, its political value must be estimated on its own merits and admitted, the fact that it will carry with it the sympathy and support of those who are not usually particularly well versed in foreign politics is decidedly in its favor.

The fact that Mr. Oliphant thus views the subject in one sense gives a special value to his testimony as confirmatory of the opinion expressed in my former paper that the Jewish question had now become one of practical politics. On this point Mr. Oliphant writes as follows:

"If, unwillingly after the treaty of Berlin, the Porte had finally acted upon the advice of England, and relied upon the honesty of her desire to preserve Asia Minor to the Sultan, instead of fostering the suspicion that she wished to conquer it for herself, I believe that a reform, which should have begun at the centre and extended to the extremities of the empire, might have been successfully carried out. Unfortunately it is now too late; the patience of England is exhausted, new political combinations have been formed, and it behoves us to anticipate the complications which may arise out of the altered relations of England and Turkey.

"Political events in the East have so shaped themselves that Palestine, and especially the provinces to the east of the Jordan, owing to their geographical position, have now become the pivot upon which of necessity they must ultimately turn. Situated between the holy places at Jerusalem and the Asiatic frontier of Russia, between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, between Syria and Egypt, their strategic value and political importance must be apparent at a glance; and the day is probably not far distant when it may be found that the most important interests of the British Empire may be imperilled by the neglect to provide in time for the contingencies which are now looming in the immediate future.

"Nor can we, in connection with this project and the possible future of Palestine, ignore the great change which has taken place during the last fifty years in the relations which the Jewish race occupy toward the governments of Europe. As a consequence of the more enlightened policy which has been pursued toward them of later years, they have been enabled to increase in wealth and numbers, while their social and political status has been so improved as to have made it possible for them to acquire an almost paramount influence in the finance and press of many civilized countries. It is evident, therefore, that a colony founded by their enterprise would enjoy a protection of a very special character, and that the influence of the race upon the several governments under which they possess civil rights would be exercised in its favor.

(To be concluded.)

* The opinion here expressed by Mr. Oliphant is in exact accord with my remarks as to the purpose of God in retaining so large a proportion of His ancient people in those Eastern lands where they are still so much exposed to persecution. And this is the opinion of Jews themselves for we find the Jewish Chronicle quoted by Mr. Oliphant writing thus: "It is the old story of the Israelites returning from exile to their native land, longing for the hanging gardens and the soft sensuous delights of Babylon. When Jeshurun waxed fat he kicked, and he wanted to remain in his well-stored manger. But there are many of the children of Jeshurun who have not waxed fat, and are lean and hungry even as Cassius himself. The prosperous Jews form but a small portion of our brethren. Those who are comfortable and content are comparatively few. These perhaps, would be loth to leave their assured and luxurious homes to find a new country and a new civilization. But those who are oppressed and unhappy long for the advantages which a reconsolidated nationality would give them. Oppressive and persecuting have kept our people, as a rule, alone and homogeneous. The more the Jew is downtrodden the more he clings to the faith of his fathers and its observances. Liberated and anxious to compete, socially, with his fellow-countrymen, he throws over the restrictions which are deeply respected by those whom he would conciliate by their abandonment, with the simple result of making himself appear contemptible and sycophantic. It is oppression, and not prosperity, which will lead us back to our proper place in the Holy Land."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Public Interest During the Past Week Continued unabated in the contest between the President and the stalwart wing of the Republican party, which, now for more than six weeks, has blocked the progress of national business. But there is little sympathy manifested for either side of the opposing forces, in spite of the persistent efforts of partisan journals to arouse it. This result was inevitable from the nature of the conflict. The people fail to see that either party is fighting their battle, or contending for any high moral principle. If the efficiency of the Civil Service were involved, then there would be an abundance of popular enthusiasm, but it is not. The Custom House is well managed by Colonel Merritt, and it is not pretended that Judge Robertson, able as he is, would improve it. Nor is the emancipation of the Republican party from Boss rule an issue in the contest; that too would be a most desirable result. But the President's victory would probably merely issue in the substitution of the Blaine for the Conkling machine in New York, a change not worth struggling for.

The contest is generally considered to be merely one of political and personal reward, and even in that aspect has not been well managed. Judge Robertson was the initiator in the movement which killed the third term at Chicago. That step earned for him the gratitude of President Garfield and the enmity of Senator Conkling. It is natural that the President should wish to reward Mr. Robertson, but there was a lack of prudence in selecting this particular reward which would be certain to provoke the Senator's antagonism. If the President was indebted to Mr. Robertson for his nomination, he was indebted for his election to a considerable extent to Mr. Conkling and his allies, whose exertions turned the tide of battle and carried New York for him.

The struggle, calmly and dispassionately considered, is deplorably sordid. It will probably result in injury to both parties; it is regretted by all who desire the prosperity of the Republican party, and by patriots of all classes, who are grieved that Republican institutions are through this contest brought into contempt throughout the civilized world.

The Nomination of Mr. Stanley Matthews to be an Associate Justice of the Sureme Court was confirmed in the Senate on Thursday by a majority of one. The yeas were 22 and the noes were 21. This nomination was originally made by Mr. Hayes, who is the brother-in-law of Mr. Matthews, but as the Senate did not act upon it before March 4th, it lapsed until renewed by President Garfield. The narrow majority cannot be satisfactory either to Mr. Matthews or the public. Mr. Matthews will feel, on taking his seat, that the honor he enjoys was accorded to him with a reluctance by no means complimentary to his judicial ability, and the people regret that so marked a difference of opinion as the vote indicates, should exist as to the capacity of an important public functionary. There are cases in which a narrow majority only indicates that between rival candidates of almost equal excellence, there has been a doubt as to which is the best, but in this case the nomination was made and decided on its intrinsic merits. The Judicial Committee, by a vote of seven to two, pronounced against it, and nearly one half the Senate indorsed that opinion. Mr. Matthews may make an impartial and able judge, but it is unfortunate that he should enter on his judicial career with the prejudices of the public against him. These prejudices do not arise from any special knowledge of the man, but from the fact that so many Senators of his own political party should disapprove of his appointment, and also from the nature of the reasons assigned for their opposition. These were that his conduct in relation to the Louisiana Returning Board in 1876, and his affiliations with monopolies indicated his unfitness to exercise judicial functions in the Supreme Court, where questions of grave moment await adjudication, and where it is, beyond all other considerations, important that the judges be men in whose impartiality suitors and the public generally have unbounded confidence.

Another Step in Refunding was Made on Thursday by the Secretary of the Treasury. The signal success which has attended his scheme for dealing with the six per cents suggested its application to the five per cents. On May 12th Mr. Windom issued a call for $128,000,000 coupon five per cents for redemption or continuance at three and a half per cent, and he also announces that until July 1st he will, in addition, receive for continuance in like manner $250,000,000 of the outstanding registered fives, the remaining $77,000,000 being reserved for redemption from the surplus revenue. "This, as was stated in explanation by a prominent Treasury official, "is a call for all of the $456,000,000 five per cents." The same official also expressed the opinion that they will be rushed in for continuance at three and a half per cent, so as to avoid redemption. Especially is this likely to be so in regard to the $250,000,000 registered fives, because about $77,000,000 are to be redeemed outright, and holders of the registered class will make haste to get in first, in order to be sure of securing transfer into three and a half per cents. A novel feature of this call is in the fact that the Secretary offers to prepay three months' interest on such of these bonds as shall be sent in for continuance.

The Resignation by Senator Conkling of his United States Senatorship is announced in a telegram from Washington, just as we go to press. The reasons for this unlooked-for step are not given, but it seems probable that the Senator, finding that he cannot act harmoniously with the Administration, considers that the more dignified and patriotic course is to resign rather than antagonize it.

One of the Most Interesting Anniversary meetings of the past week was that of the Women's National Christian Temperance Union, on May 9th. The report of the Secretary stated that the Union, which was formed in 1873, now comprises more than 500,000 ladies among its members. Beginning with the visitation of saloons in the West, the society had developed into an extensive organization. It meets its expenses in the main by five cent monthly contributions from its members.

In a speech by Miss Fannie J. Barnes, of Brooklyn, an appeal was made to young women touching their influence over men. She told what young women are doing in this direction, not merely with young men but also with their own sex in the cities of Brooklyn, Trenton, Newark, Philadelphia, and elsewhere, and she urged the young women of New York to rise up in their social and intellectual might also and rescue their male friends from the intoxicating cup. Mrs. Barnes drew a sad picture of a talented and wealthy young lady of Brooklyn of her acquaintance, who, from tippling at balls and social parties, has become a confirmed drunkard, so that she will sell even her wearing apparel to procure liquors. Her mother is almost broken-hearted over the daughter's condition.

Rev. George E. Reed, who addressed the meeting, predicted the certain success of the Union and generally of the temperance movement, for three reasons, to wit—Women are engaged in it, and it affects women in their social life more than anywhere else. Then it is sure of success, because the women have given up their desultory crusading and are now organized. He was surprised when he began to look into this matter to find how thoroughly organized they are. And the third reason that Mr. Reed gave for success is the women's dependence upon God in this entire movement.

The Five Points Mission Day School held its thirty-first annual reception on May 3d, in the mission building, New York. Over 400 children in holiday dress sat behind the desks in the school-room and contributed to the success of the meeting by singing, recitations, and calisthenic exercises. The school-room was made bright with flags and bunting, besides several large bouquets of flowers, The report of the managers showed that last year the total receipts were $19,925.09, and the disbursements, $16,452.22. The food distributed amounted to 475,628 rations, 7000 more than in the previous year. There were 15,100 garments distributed, 5000 more than in the previous year.

The Serious Illness of Mrs. Garfield has evoked general sympathy with the Presidential household during the past week. Her complaint is intermittent fever, brought on by fatigue and by the malarial influences which pervade the White House. An excellent constitution will, it is hoped, bring her through safely. The President is greatly distressed at her suffering, and spends much of his time at her bedside. One night he remained with her until daybreak. She has never, it is said, been so seriously ill before; and the assurances of the physicians are not sufficient to relieve the President of his great anxiety. The White House faces on the west toward the marshy flats that border the Potomac, and the malarial atmosphere from the river has unobstructed access to the rooms occupied by the family. Besides, the building itself is old and decaying, much of the wood work being rotten. If in the Providence of God Mrs. Garfield's life should be spared, the family will remove for the summer to the Soldiers' Home, in the hope that a more wholesome and invigorating atmosphere may contribute to her complete restoration. The President in his painful anxiety receives the sincere sympathy of the whole people irrespective of party.

The Remains of William Penn, it has Long been felt ought to find a resting place in this country. The State Senate of Pennsylvania, on May 10th, unanimously passed a resolution and sent it to the House for concurrence, looking to the transfer of the remains from Jordan meeting-house graveyard, Buckinghamshire, England, to Philadelphia. The resolution also provides that copies be sent to Peter Penn Gaskell, of Ireland, and William Stewart of England, representatives at law of William Penn, asking their co-operation in the matter, and requests the co-operation of the President of the United States, if necessary, in securing this object. William Penn was the renowned member of the Society of Friends, to whom in 1681 King Charles II. of England granted the tract of land which is now the State of Pennsylvania, so named after its founder.

A Most Successful Year is the Report given of the National Temperance Society's work for 1880. At the anniversary meeting on May 10th, Mr. Secretary Stearns in his report declared that the past year had been one of the most successful in the history of the temperance reform. The treasurer reported the permanent working capital as $22,605.25; total receipts, $71,787.58; total expenses $64,690.82; cash on hand, $7,159.68. President Dodge had offered to be responsible for twenty thousand dollars if $50,000 could be raised for the society, and the raising of $60,000 was the result.

The Atlanta Cotton Exhibition Promises to be successful beyond all expectation. Governor Hardiman, of Georgia, who has visited the principal Southern cities as a special Commissioner on behalf of the exhibition, reports a hearty reception and an enthusiastic co-operation everywhere. Applications for exhibition space are pouring in, and $200,000 has been raised thus far toward paying the expenses. The exhibition will be held in Oglethorpe Park, Atlanta, a locality admirably suited to the purpose. The main building, on which three hundred men are now at work, will be devoted to exhibits of textile fabrics and the machinery for producing them. Another building, 250 feet long by 100 feet wide, will be filled with machinery for preparing sugar, rice, and similar products. A still larger one will contain exhibits of all varieties of tobacco, its products, machinery, and everything connected with it. A building on the plan of that which contained the Kansas and Colorado exhibits at the Centennial Exposition will be given up to a comprehensive display of the agriculture, the minerals, and the woods of the South.

An exhibit which will probably attract the attention of more visitors than any other will be a cotton-field, showing the plant in all stages of growth.

An Important Drawback in the Gratification we have in the increase of our revenue must be made. The internal revenue receipts for the year ending June 30th will, it is announced, exceed those of the previous year by nearly $10,000,000. But it is an ominous fact that a large part of the increase is due to the collection on cigarettes, and this increase marks the spread of an injurious habit among growing boys. No one who keeps his eyes open as he walks about the streets can have failed to observe that many of the small boys he meets are smoking cigarettes. Furthermore there is unhappily no doubt that women and girls make every year a larger contribution to the revenue derived from cigarettes.

An Antique Brooch Worth Fifteen Hundred dollars was found in an old trunk last week by a poor man who had purchased it for fifty cents. The trunk was bought from an ashman who had carted it away with other rubbish from a house in Fifth Avenue. It lacked a hinge, and the purchaser on his way home opened it to see if the hinge were inside. He did not find the hinge, but saw a small parcel which, being opened, revealed a brooch with eighty-one diamonds in it. It had in some way slipped between the trunk and the lining, and the rough handling it had in the ashman's hands had dislodged it. The name of Mrs. Vanderbilt was on the trunk, and the finder honestly carried the brooch to her son, who munificently rewarded him. Such treasure trove is very rare, but it is by no means rare for men to find in a Bible, that would not sell for fifty cents, a treasure compared with which Mrs. Vanderbilt's brooch is a worthless bauble (Matt. 13 : 46).

The Statistics of the American Tract Society embodied in the report presented at the annual meeting on May 11th, indicate how useful a work that Society performs. The Society issued 106 new publications during the year. It also reprinted over 199,000 volumes, and nearly 5,000,000 tracts. Nearly 60,000,000 12mo. pages of tracts, valued at $39,748.83, were distributed gratuitously through colporteurs, agents, and members of the Society. About one tenth of the whole has gone to the army and navy, the freedmen and immigrants. During the year, 192 colporteurs were employed, of whom 13 were students. They labored in 32 States and Territories of the United States and in Ontario.

An Act of Heroism was Performed by the engineer of the eastward bound train on the New York & Greenwood Lake Railway, on Saturday, May 7th. The train was approaching Belleville Avenue station, and while descending the grade the engineer, Albert Riker, saw a little child upon the track a short distance ahead. The air brakes were at once applied and a warning whistle was sounded. The engineer saw, however, that the train could not be stopped in time to save the child, and he hurried out upon his engine and down on the cow-catcher. Taking a firm grip with one hand to steady himself, he leaned over, grasped the child before the engine touched it, and lifted it out of danger, frightened but only slightly bruised. The child was only two years old ; he had made his way through a loose paling in the fence surrounding the grounds belonging to the house, and had climbed a high embankment of the railroad. It was the only child of wealthy parents, who overflowed with gratitude to the brave man who had risked his life to save that of the child. Such gratitude any parent would feel in the circumstances, but children encounter worse dangers than even that child was threatened with, yet parents are not careful to point them to Him who saves even to the uttermost (Heb. 7 : 25).

A Dying Child's Letter to her Friend was recently sent to Pittsburg, Pa. The writer was Mattie Hunter, aged eleven, who lived at Beitner, Mich. She died on Tuesday evening, April 19th, of spinal meningitis. Mattie was a little girl of uncommon goodness and sweetness of disposition. When dying she called her brothers and sisters to her to kiss them and bade them good-bye, and charged them to meet her in Heaven. She then told her father to get a paper and pencil, as she wished him to write a letter for her to a little friend in Pittsburg, Pa., and with difficulty she dictated to him the following lines : DEAR VINNIE : I am just dying. It is vacation and I am dying. You are to come to Heaven to see me. My Aunt Betsy is here. Dr. Ashton sent me some oranges. Good-bye, all of you, and little Tommy too. From your loving and dying friend, Mattie May Hunter. The simple message is very pathetic, and one can only hope that the appointments the child made may all be kept. Those who have tried to comfort bereaved unbelievers can appreciate the cheering hope that springs from faith in Jesus (2 Samuel 12 : 23).

A Magnificent Gift has been Made by Mr. Vanderbilt to a Southern University. A Nashville, Tenn., journal announces that Theological Hall, of Vanderbilt Institute, was formally dedicated on May 8th. One of the lecture-rooms was thronged with people. Bishop Paine, the senior bishop of the Southern Methodist Church, presided. It being the sixtieth birthday of W. H. Vanderbilt, the donor, a full length portrait of that gentleman was placed in the hall. In his name Bishop McIntyre, President of the Board of Trustees, presented the building to the senior bishop for formal acceptance and dedication, and the ceremonies were impressively performed. A rising vote of thanks was tendered to Mr. Vanderbilt by the faculty, students, and citizens. The building cost over $100,000.

A Diamond Ring in a Horse's Hoof.—A blacksmith's wife in Tennessee recently handed to a physician of the village where she lived a diamond ring, worth fifteen hundred dollars, which her husband had found in the hoof of the doctor's horse. In paring down the hoof to prepare it for a new shoe his knife touched something hard, which on being dislodged proved to be a ring, and the honest man sent his wife with it to the owner of the horse. It appeared that the doctor's daughter had dropped the ring while out riding, and it had lodged between the horse's hoof and the shoe and had remained there. She had ridden to and fro many times over the road searching for the lost gem, yet it had been near her all the time. The search reminds us of men who go hither and thither consulting priests and who read theological treatises to find the way to heaven yet omit the great Source of Knowledge (Deut. 30 : 11–14).

A Remarkable Towns Meeting at Clayton, near Camden, N. J., is described in the New York Tribune. It seems the prosperous and happy little town has just settled the liquor question in an original and effective way. The proprietor of the only public house in the place had a considerable stock of wine and spirits which he was unwilling to throw away and was licensed to sell. Upon this presentation of facts the people formed a Temperance Hotel Company with a capital of $8000 divided into $10 shares, bought the public house and all its belongings, including liquor license. The people gathered in a vacant lot behind the town hall, the doxology was sung, and the liquor was poured upon a blazing bonfire.

THE CANDLE.

A New Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Delivered on Sunday Morning, April 24th, 1881.

" Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick ; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."—MATT. 5 : 15, 16.

Christian Influence—Secret and Manifest—The Diffusive Light—A Homely Metaphor—I. The Lighting—The Work Divine—Separating—Personal—Peculiar and Distinct—Needs Sustaining—Consecrates to Service—II. The Placing—Removal Sometimes Necessary—Placed where it will do most Good—Self-Placed Christians—A Prohibition—A Parsonificated Gospel—A Command—Religion in Politics—In Business—III. The Shining—Involuntary—Yet Needing Care—The World Growing Darker—Your Orders.

OUR Saviour was speaking of the influence of His disciples upon their fellows, and He first of all mentioned that secret but powerful influence which He describes under the figure of salt : " Ye are the salt of the earth." No sooner is a man born unto God than he begins to affect his fellow-men with an influence which is rather felt than seen. The very existence of a believer operates upon unbelievers. He is like a handful of salt cast upon flesh ; he has a savor in himself, and this begins to penetrate those who are in contact with him. The unobserved, and almost unconscious influence of a holy life is most effectual to the conserving of society and the prevention of moral putrefaction. May there be salt in every one of us, for " salt is good." Have salt in yourselves, and then you will become a blessing to all around you.

But there is about every true Christian a manifest and visible influence which he is bound to exercise, and this our Lord sets forth under the figure of light : " Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid." In any case the genuine Christian will exercise the silent and unseen salting influence upon those who come into immediate contact with him ; but let him also labor to possess the second, or which covers a far larger area, and deals more with real life ; for salt is for dead flesh, and light for living men. " Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in Heaven."

Saltness and light are the power of a Christian. I do not believe that any man will give forth light if he has not first received salt ; and yet some have a measure of salt who are none too liberal with their light. May God grant us grace to balance the inward and the outward. May we have the conserving salt and the diffusive light. Our thoughts will now run toward light-giving, and I pray that I may be helped to move the more retiring and less active among us to exert their influence upon others to a greater extent ; to crown the silent testimonies of their humble faith by an outspoken witness-bearing for their Saviour. All who have salt will now be urged to show their light.

The figure which our Saviour uses is a homely one, borrowed from the eastern tent and house. He speaks of a candle, or, more accurately, of a lamp. We should read the passage—" Neither do men light a lamp and put it under the bushel, but on the lampstand, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house." I shall use the figure both in its eastern and in its western dress, and sometimes we will make a lamp of it and sometimes a candle. Perhaps we shall see all the better with both a lamp and a candle ; and, though we may confuse the metaphor, we shall not confuse anybody's mind upon the important truth which it sets forth.

Three things are in the text. The first is the lighting, the second is the placing, and the third is the shining. The first two are both intended to produce the third. May He who alone can create light illuminate our minds while dwelling on His word.

I. First let us consider

THE LIGHTING.

" Neither do men light a candle." What is this lighting up of the souls of men ? They are without light by nature, "having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in them." What, then, is this lighting?

It is, first of all, a divine work. God began His creating work of old by saying, "Let there be light," and there was light. And as in the old creation so in the new, the first thing that God worketh in the heart of man is light: "the entrance of thy word giveth light." Well said David, "The Lord is my light and my salvation." The Holy Spirit enlightens the understanding, so that the man perceives the desperateness of his own condition, and his inability to win salvation by his own works. The Lord pours light into the soul, so that Christ is seen by faith and at the sight of Him the heart catches fire and light takes hold upon the inner man, so that he not only sees light but has light. The light not only shines upon the heart but from the heart.

This lighting is

A SEPARATING WORK.

This light always separates a man from those around him who are as the darkness. It does not take him away from his surroundings, it does not shut him up in a monastery, but the separation is complete; for to set a division between a candle and the darkness all that is wanted is to light it. The tiniest spark will by its very existence be distinguished from the darkness. There is no need to label light to prevent its being confounded with the darkness, and there is no need for it to sound a trumpet before itself, saying, "Here am I."

What fellowship hath light with darkness? No sooner cometh the light into a man's heart than he is separate from those who are round about him, called by the grace of God by a vocation which at once sets a difference between the called ones and the rest of the sons of men. The darkness could not have created the light, for it does not even comprehend it, "the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not." Those that are round about the Christian man cannot make him out, for his life is hid with Christ in God. At his conversion they perceive that a strange alteration had come over him. At first they set the change down to melancholy, until the man's experience flashes into delight, and then they call it fanaticism or a kind of madness, a sort of twist of the mind. Oh, blessed twist! Would God that those who know it not could be twisted after the same fashion! It is the kindling of the candle, so that where all was darkness before there may now be the heavenly light.

Furthermore, this light giving is a personal work to every man who is the subject of it. The text says, "Let your light so shine before men." When a man lights a candle the light does not belong to the candle originally; but when once the candle has accepted the flame the light becomes the candle's own light, and the candle begins to shine by its own light. So, beloved, the grace of God, the light from Heaven, must come to each one of us individually from the divine hand, and we must personally receive it. Light is not inherent in any one of us, and therefore it must be bestowed. Its bestowal necessitates a personal acceptance. It is not bestowed upon us as part of a nation or family. In its enlightening operations grace does not deal with men in the gross, but with each man by himself. Sin is personal, and so must grace be. We are individually in the darkness, and must be individually kindled into light.

In each man the light is peculiar and distinct. There is a difference in the lights of various oils and gases, and so there is in your light, my brother, and my light. It is very possible that you would like to put my candle in order; you may do so if you can, but

DO NOT SNUFF ME OUT.

Your own light is, however, your main concern, and you had better ask for special grace that it may not fail. Your light is distinct from mine, as distinct as your life is from mine, though in another sense it is true that your spiritual light is one with all the light that ever shone in this world. There is in the lighting a personal appropriation of the divine flame, and afterward a personal and distinct sending forth of the sacred light in the individual's own way. Look ye well to this, lest ye be mistaken, and suppose yourselves to be lighted from Heaven when you are the mere will-o'-the-wisps of delusion.

In this world there are many lights, but none too many. We could not spare the sun, and it would be a calamity if the smallest star were quenched. We cannot spare those modern inventions which so cheer us by turning our city's night into day; but I wot we should miss even the glow-worm from its dewy haunt in the quiet lane. We cannot afford to lose a ray of light in this misty, foggy, all-beclouded sky of ours. The Church and the world need all the light that has been vouchsafed, and much more. I, therefore, would press upon all my brethren and sisters here who may happen to have but one talent the necessity of their putting it out to interest. Your light, my friend, may be but a farthing rushlight, but you must not hide it, for all lights are of God, and are sent with a kind and gracious purpose by the great Father of lights.

Note further, that lighting is a work which needs sustaining. While lighting is a process performed in a moment, it is also, as a matter of fact, prolonged; for the lamp needs to be trimmed, and it would be ill to light a lamp and leave it to itself. The lamp must have fresh oil from time to time, since by shining it consumes its fuel. Do not any of you, therefore, think if you can fix upon a certain time and say, "I was converted then," that you may live as you like afterward. God forbid! The saints prove their conversion by their perseverance, and that perseverance comes from a continual supply of divine grace to their souls.

Judge ye, then, yourselves by this, not so much whether on a certain special occasion you were turned from darkness to light, but are you still "light in the Lord?" Have you oil in your vessels with your lamps? Are you looking unto Jesus? It was well that you looked; but are you looking? for that is the great thing. Remember, it is a present business—looking. It is well that you came to Jesus, but that is merely the beginning: it is "to whom coming," coming continually, as unto a living stone.

Once again, let me say that this work of lighting is a work which, when it is done upon a man, consecrates him entirely to the service of light giving. A candle once lit, if it continues alight will be all consumed in giving light. It is what it was made for, not to be laid by in a glass case and looked at, but to be burned away. Blessed is the man who can say, "My zeal hath consumed me." You will say that in the case of the lamp the lamp itself is not consumed. No, but it is consecrated to the one purpose of lighting the house, and it contains the supply of oil by which the flame is fed.

You may use a candle for many purposes; I saw a man grease a saw with one the other day, and another made his boots fit for walking in the snow in like manner; but still these are not the objects for which a candle is designed; it has missed the object of its existence if it does not give light. I suppose on occasions you might use a lamp for a weight, or for some other purposes; but it would not be the fit instrument for any purpose except that of giving light.

Everything is best when fulfilling its proper purpose. Have you ever seen a swan out of water? How ungainly is his walk! What an unwieldy bird he seems! But see him on the water. What a fine model for a ship! What grace! What beauty! So is it with the Christian, his beauty is best seen in his proper element; give him any other aim and he is awkward and uncomely.

II. We will now, in the second place, consider

THE PLACING.

"No man lighteth a candle and putteth it under a bushel." It is a great point, this placing of a man—it may hide his light or send it further afield. The chief matter is the lighting him, and getting him to have light to give; but the next most important thing is where to put him when he is alight. For some men when they first find Christ are in the wrong place altogether. How can a lamp shine if it be dropped into a river?

After the conversion of certain persons their removal becomes necessary. It is significant that when God called Abraham He did not let him stop in Ur of the Chaldees; the place for Abraham to shine was not even in Haran; but he must get into the chosen country and wander as a shepherd prince, for only there and in that character could Abraham shine to the glory of God. Most men will be wise to stay where they are and shine; but others must undergo before they will be able to scatter their light to the extent which the Lord intends for them.

That may account, my friend, for your having more trouble since you were converted than you ever had before. You have been left to lie till now, but you are wanted, and so you are fetched out from your hiding. It did not matter where you were when you gave no light, you were just as well behind a box or in a closet as anywhere else; but now that you are lighted, you must be put on a lamp-stand, and hence you are undergoing processes of providence that are somewhat painful to you. Our placing, whether it has necessitated removal or not, is largely done by the providence of God; one man is placed here and another there, and it is well for us to look at our position from this point of view.

God puts us where we can best serve His cause and bless our age. If you had your choice, perhaps, if you had to be a street lamp, you would like to be a lamp in Hyde Park, to shine upon the nobles who pass that way. But the poor souls want lights far more down that blind alley, down that den of a court, where wild Irish are quarrelling, or drunkards murdering their wives. He that loves God, if he had his choice, might sooner choose to shine in the worst place than in the better. "Oh, that I lived in the midst of a warm-hearted church!" says one. If you are an earnest, thorough-going man, I am glad that you are placed in that dreary village where the people are pretty nearly starved for spiritual life. "What," cries one, "glad that I have to suffer so much?" No, not for that, but because if you are a strong man, you will not suffer, but you will make other people suffer; that is to say, make it hard for the minister, and the deacons, and the church to remain in their wretched condition of lukewarmness. I hope you will be the means of arousing them, and bringing them nearer to Christ.

But though I have thus spoken of Providence, a good deal of our placing is in our own hands. There are ways of placing yourselves—for instance, that mentioned in the text, which may be as ruinous to our influence as if a candle were placed under a bushel; or you can put yourself in a place of advantage, as when a lamp is set upon a lamp-stand.

First, note the word in the negative—"Neither do men place it under a bushel." A bushel is a good and useful article. In almost every eastern house there was a corn measure, here called a bushel, though it did not generally measure much more than a peck; this measure was commonly in every house, because they ground their own corn, and so were generally dealing with the neighbors. That useful corn measure to me represents the pursuits of ordinary life—the proper and natural avocations of the household. Many men and women hide the candle that God has lit under and domestic cares. But you ask, Is not a housewife to be a housewife? Certainly; but not so a housewife as to conceal her godliness. Is not the laboring man to work with his hands? Certainly, but not so to work for the bread that perisheth as to miss life eternal. Is not the man of business to give his best attention thereto? Of course he is, but he must see to it that he do not lose his own soul, or injure the souls of others. Keep your bushel; nobody asks you to burn it; but do keep it in its place. Subordinate all worldly things to the glory of God.

Suffer not your possessions or your desires, your pleasures or your cares to act as a bushel hiding His light. This happens with a great many. I must ask conscience to be so kind as to preach for me for a minute or two. Will you look at home, dear friends, and see where you place your business and your religion? Which is uppermost?

Which is foremost? Is religion your business, or is business your religion? Does you candle shine upon the bushel, or does the bushel hide the candle? I will not dwell upon the question, because it will be well for you to answer it in quiet, each man for himself.

I know how a minister can put his light under a bushel—he can be a mere official and perform service, being nothing more than a performer. The worst thing to do with the gospel is to parsonificate it. As soon as we preach as mere officials we have lost all power: we must speak as men to men. A brother minister one day said to me, "The moment I shut the pulpit door I shut out my natural self." This will never do: a man must be all there when he is serving God, and if ever he is himself it must be in preaching. We can also cover the candle by using hard words, words which are not hard to educated people, but to the bulk of our hearers. We can also use technical creed words, such as we might use in the class-room or in the discussion hall, and these may conceal our meaning from the people.

I know some Christians who put their light under a bushel by being excessively bashful, and shamefaced. They are not so dreadfully retiring when five-pound notes are to be made; but if anything is to be said for Christ then they blush and stammer. Oh that they could overcome this hindrance. Others put their light under a bushel by inconsistency; they do not act as Christians should act, and when people see their bad works they do not glorify God. God forbid that in the house our darkness should be more conspicuous than our light. Some, I fear, cover their light under they do not seem to care how things go with the kingdom of Christ. They look well to the state of their flocks and herds, but for the house of the Lord they have small concern. I pray you, dear friends, do not hide your light in any way. Let not your lawful callings, your relationships, your sicknesses, your literary pursuits, or your personal sorrows become so exaggerated as to conceal the divine light within your soul.

The text is, however, positive. Put yourself on a candlestick or on a lamp-stand. What must that be? A candlestick is an appropriate exhibitor of the light; and each man should make an appropriate confession of his faith. The best way is prescribed in God's word. It is written, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Take care that when you have faith you declare it in the ordained manner; for he that with his heart believeth and with his mouth maketh confession of Him shall be saved. O lamp, do not say, "I will shine, but I will lie upon the floor and do it." No, your place is on the stand which is provided. Dear Christian friend, join the church, that you may be placed where you will be in order with the arrangements of the divine household.

A lamp-stand should also be something which makes the lamp sufficiently visible. If you do not come out and diffuse your light willingly and cheerfully it is very likely the master of the house will fetch you out. Providence will arrange that the light shall not be hidden. See what the Lord did for His church years ago; He allowed her to be persecuted into publicity. What a lamp-stand was found for Christianity in the martyrdoms of the Colosseum, in the public burnings by pagans and papists, and in all the other modes by which believers in Christ were forced into fame.

I long for the day when the precepts of the Christian religion shall be the rule among all classes of men, in all transactions. I often hear it said "Do not bring religion into politics." This is precisely where it ought to be brought, and set there in the face of all men as on a candlestick. I would have the Cabinet and the Members of Parliament do the work of the nation as before the Lord, and I would have the nation, either in making war or peace, consider the matter by the light of righteousness. We are to deal with other nations about this or that upon the principles of the New Testament. I thank God that I have lived to see the attempt made in one or two instances, and I pray that the principle may become dominant and permanent.

We have had enough of clever men without conscience, let us now see what honest, God-fearing men will do. But we are told that we must study "British interests," as if it were not always to a nation's truest interest to do righteousness. "But we must follow out our policy." I say, No! Let the policies which are founded on wrong be cast like idols to the moles and to the bats. Stand to that most admirable of policies: "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise." Whether we are kings or queens, or prime ministers, or members of parliament, or crossing sweepers, this is our rule if we are Christians.

Yes, and bring religion into your business, and let the light shine in the factory and in the counting house. Then we shall not have quite so much china clay in the calicoes wherewith to cheat the foreigner, nor shall we see cheap and nasty articles described as of best quality, nor any other of the dodges in trade that everybody seems to practise now-a-days. You tradespeople and manufacturers are very much one like the other in this: there are tricks in all trades, and one sees it everywhere. I believe everybody to be honest in all England, Scotland, and Ireland until he is found out; but whether there are any so incorruptible that they will never be found wanting this deponent sayeth not, for I am not a judge.

Do not put your candle under a bushel, but let it shine, for it was intended that it should be seen. Religion ought to be as much seen at our own table as at the Lord's table. Godliness should as much influence the House of Commons as the Assembly of Divines. God grant that the day may come when the mischievous division between secular and religious things shall no more be heard of, for in all things Christians are to glorify God, according to the precept, "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

III. Our time has gone, but I must detain you a little while I speak upon

THE SHINING:

"Let your light so shine before men."

When a candle shines it is because it cannot help it. Shining is the natural result of possessing light, and I want you, dear brethren, to exert a holy influence upon others, because the grace of God is really in you. Some men made desperate attempts to appear good; they would be far more successful if they would seek to be good. Grace must be in a man as a living fountain, and then rivers of living water will flow from him. The natural result of a renewed heart is a renewed life, and the natural result of a renewed life is that men see it and glorify God.

Shining, however, is not altogether a thing of necessity so as to forbid our attention to it, for the text demands care of us. "Let your light so shine." I must ask the printer to put the two letters—s, o—in very large capitals. "Let your light SO shine—let it so shine that men may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in Heaven." You will not shine in the best manner, though you may have grace in your heart, unless you abound in prayerful, watchful, earnest care. You must guard heart and lip and hand, or your light will not so shine before men as could be desired. Your light will need trimming. Neglect it not.

The shining which comes from the Christian is here described as "good works." Good talk is very well, but it takes a great deal of talk to light a room. Good works are the splendor of the light of God. What works are good works? I would answer—upright actions, honest dealings, sincere behavior. When a man is scrupulously true, and sternly faithful, all right-minded persons admit that his works are good works. Good works are works of love, unselfish works, works done for the benefit of others and the glory of God.

Good works, like the shining of a candle, have good effects. A candle cheers the gloom. What a comfort it is when you have long been wandering in the dark to spy out a twinkling candle in a cottage window! A candle directs and guides men, and by its illumination it instructs them. In its light they see, discern, and discover. He who acts teaches. The man who lives Christianity preaches it. He is the truest evangelist whose life brings glory to God and good-will to men.

But note, it is said, "it giveth light to all that are in the house;" so that when we are lit from on high we are first to shine at home. It is not abroad alone that we should make our Christianity known, but chiefly at the fireside, to those who are in the house. Some have a very little house, they live in a couple of rooms with a small family; let them take care that they have grace enough to make a few thoroughly happy, which is not always the easiest thing in the world. Others have a large family; may they have grace enough to influence the whole. A few have large workshops, and employ many hands, and these ought to exercise a holy influence over all their workfolks.

The text says that the candle gives light to all that are in the house. Some professors give light only to a part of the house. I have known women very good to all but their husbands, and these they nag from morning to night, so that they give no light to them. I have known husbands so often out at meetings that they neglect home, and thus their wives miss the light. I have known masters who are utterly indifferent about their servants; and mistresses who quite forget to seek the good of their maids. If our light be in good order it will illuminate the parlor and the kitchen, the drawing-room and the scullery, shining upon all that are in the house. Candles do not shed all their light either that way or this, but they shine in all directions. A Christian should be an all-round man, blessing all, both great and small, who come in contact with him.

I have had to hasten over all this, but I pray God to make it none the less effectual for the stirring up of every Christian here to use all the light he has.

and it seems to get darker, for the emissaries of Satan are going about thirsting to quench every light. Look ye well to your lamps—look ye well to your lamps, ye virgin souls. Trim well the flame, and go you forth even into the black night to meet the Bridegroom.

Churches do not exist for themselves, but for the world at large. Have ye though of this, ye professors? Ye are blessed that ye may be a blessing. Take heed that ye behave aright. You go to Christ's wedding feast, and you are glad to hear that He turneth water into wine, and you are ready to bless Him that He has kept the best wine until now. But oh, ye servants of God, remember what is said, "Draw out now and bear." These are your orders.

Neglect not your duty as servitors at your Lord's great feast. Your Master has taken the bread, and has blessed and broken it, and then He has given it to you. Is that the end of the process? Do you stand there and munch your own personal morsel with a miserable self-satisfaction? Nay, if you be indeed disciples of Christ you will remember that the next words are, "and the disciples to the multitude, and they did eat." Break then your bread among the hungry that surround you. Take the whole loaf of Christ, and rightly divide and distribute it, and you shall have as much left as at the first; yea, more, you shall gather of the fragments many baskets full. Only see ye to it that ye freely give what ye have freely received, lest hoarded manna breed corruption, lest a canker come upon your hoarded gold and silver, and lest your very souls grow moldy even to reeking rottenness before God, because you have not drawn out your souls unto the hungry, nor sought to teach those who are perishing for lack of knowledge.

PETER'S HOME TRAINING.

A Temperance Story by Rev. James B. Dunn.

The Young Lady's Remark upon Peter's Downfall—Their Parents' Custom—Its Evil Influence upon Peter—He is Turned Out of His Home—Delirium Tremens—What Brought Him to It.

"AH, sir, but it is a comfort that he never saw drunkenness under his father's roof!" was the remark made to me, a short time ago, by a young lady, as I stood gazing upon the perfect wreck of a young man who lay on a pallet of straw, suffering from an attack of delirium tremens. It was her brother, to whom she still clung with sisterly affection, notwithstanding his profligacy. Finding I could render no relief, with a sorrowful heart I withdrew from the affecting spectacle, pondering over the words, "He never saw drunkenness under his father's roof!" Was it true that his father's house had nothing to do with his present condition? Let us look at the training he there received; for to become a drunkard it is not necessary to see drunkenness.

It was the custom of the parents to use intoxicating liquors in what is called moderation, and occasionally to allow their children to partake with them. These drinks were always introduced at dinner, in the form of ale, porter, wine, when the children had their share of some of them. Then when parties were invited to dinner or supper, and this habit of drinking was carried to its fullest extent, the children were led to believe that the persons invited on these occasions were the particular friends of their parents; and the preparations made induced them to suppose that it was their wish to make the visit as happy a one as possible, and to do so the drink must be circulated.

This course went on from year to year; but as the children grew up, the fruits of the system were seen in the irregularities and bad conduct of some of them. One of the sons, the eldest, had formed a strong appetite for intoxicating liquors, as well as for the gay society of companions like himself; and sometimes he came home late at night under the influence of liquor. The poor mother was the first to perceive the evil courses of her favorite son, and hoping to be able to stop him before he went farther, concealed them for a while from the father.

But all her tenderness and persuasion could not induce the young man to stop, and he proceeded farther and farther, until she could no longer hide the case from her husband. With tears she now disclosed the awful facts of the conduct of their unhappy child, and the fruitlessness of her efforts to reclaim him. Then was the father angry both with son and wife, and declared that if he did not reform he should quit the house.

The young man was called in, examined, entreated, and at last threatened. Making some confessions, he promised to amend. For a while there was an improvement in him; but the temptations to which he was still exposed in his father's house, and the love of his former indulgences, were too powerful; he went back to his old habits, and became worse than before.

At last, the enraged father could bear with him no longer, and in a passion drove him from the house, telling him to go where he pleased, but not to disgrace him. The young man, now left to himself, and reckless of all consequences, having lost all self-respect, as well as all regard for the good opinion of others, plunged deeper and deeper into the vortex of pleasure, until he was brought down by delirium tremens to the gates of death.

In this condition I was called to see him. The parents were informed of the situation of their outcast child, and would now do anything to save him. But it was too late! Most devotedly did his sister wait upon him, till she closed his eyes in death. True, it may have been that "he never saw drunkenness in his father's house." But was there no connection between his training in that father's house and his miserable end?

On the following day—the heart-stricken mother being unable to endure the sight—the father alone went with me to the bedside of the dying youth; but what an object there presented itself to his view! He could hardly recognize the features of his own son, and for a while could give no expression to the feelings which agitated his breast. But he must speak, for it is the last opportunity which he shall ever have of addressing this lost child—and he must speak as becomes a father under such circumstances.

"Son," he said, "you have fallen low indeed, by the evil life you have followed. Where did you learn the habit of intemperance, which has reduced you to this condition?"

"Father," the young man replied, with a faltering voice, "I learned it in your house. Not that you tempted me to be a drunkard, but you taught me to like intoxicating drinks, and you showed me, by your example, that I could safely use them. I acquired the love for such things at your own table, but I have not been able to keep within those bounds of moderation which you have preserved, and I die a victim to intemperance first begun in my father's house!"

The case of this young man is not a rare one. Innumerable are the homes and hearts ruined by the fireside usages and examples of inconsiderate parents — parents otherwise estimable, loving, tender, prayerful; but they will drink, moderately it may be, but nevertheless they drink, and have reared up those who drink under their own roof-tree, and unintentionally hastened many an ardent young soul to destruction.

"A TEASPOONFUL OF RUM TODDY BROUGHT ME TO THIS,"

said a young man, a few days before his execution; and on being asked to explain himself, continued: "When a child, my father was in the custom of taking me on his knees at dinner-time, and giving me one teaspoonful out of his glass; and by this means the taste for drink was acquired, under the influence of which I committed the crime for which I am about to suffer." Think you that a father, after having laid in a drunkard's grave the wrecked form of his first-born, would touch the intoxicating cup again? Surely not!

A YOUNG LADY WAS RECKLESS ENOUGH TO REACH

over the Table-rock which overhangs the Falls of Niagara, that she might pluck some flowers which grew upon its edge; but as she stooped she lost her balance, and—dreadful thought!—was dashed from that awful height to the abyss below! We almost think we hear her wild shriek and feel her giddy whirl. By and by a father comes to the spot to gaze on that scene of unrivalled sublimity. The flowers attract the notice of his little child, and she, too, steps forward; but quick as thought the parental hand drags her back, while, with all the eloquence of a father's voice, he tells the fatal story.

Fathers and mothers! thousands of little ones have gone down a more awful gulf! Will you sport on its brink as if there were no danger? Or will the hand that drags back from temporal death furnish the means of more dreadful ruin? Show by your abstaining from intoxicating drink that you possess the Spirit of our Lord, who said, "The Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them."

INCIDENTS OF THE FIVE POINTS MISSION.

A Priest Converted at a Deathbed.

ONE Sunday morning the mission-room was filled as usual with rescued children and attentive adult listeners. The missionary preached from "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." He explained simply and solemnly the nature of true repentance, its necessity, and the fearful results of neglecting it. While enforcing the subject his eye rested upon a countenance he had not seen before. It was that of a respectable-looking man in the prime of life. It indicated deep and troubled thought, but as visitors were frequent at the mission, and his whole appearance seemed to show that he did not belong to that region, the natural conclusion was that he was a casual though deeply interested visitor. The time and place of the class-meeting were announced, and a general invitation was given to all anxious on the subject of religion to attend.

The evening came, and in the little mission-room were assembled from twenty to thirty ignorant and degraded men and women. In some, curiosity had been the predominant motive; in others a vague alarm had been awakened; in some the influence was asserting its power; in others the spirit of true repentance was revealing the past, and awakening a faint hope for the future. As the missionary glanced over his little flock to take anew the gauge of their necessities, he saw the stranger who had attracted his notice on the preceding Sabbath. He was there, in that little simple meeting. Who was he? what brought him there? thought the missionary, too much accustomed, however, to strange things to feel more than a momentary hesitation.

The hymn was sung, the prayer uttered, the usual testimony elicited, suitable advice given to all who were in the habit of attending, and the missionary accosted the stranger. He rose and in a calm, impressive manner made (in substance) the following remarks: "I was brought up a Roman Catholic. I was for many years a priest in that communion; but several years ago, through the reading of the Holy Scriptures, I became convinced that neither the doctrine nor the practice of that Church was in accordance with the Word of God. I left it and have ever since been seeking after light and rest. I left my native country, and am here a stranger in a strange land.

"Last Sunday, sir, I heard you preach. You explained the nature of true repentance. With exceeding power the question was forced upon my mind, Have I repented? I felt I had not, according to that rule. You spoke of forgiveness of sins and the consciousness of pardon. I saw there was an experience I had never known. I had professed for years to forgive the sins of others, and I felt that hour that mine were not forgiven. You enforced the text that all would perish except they repented: I saw I was among the number, and I became alarmed. I went home to read and think and pray, but the conviction continues. I am alarmed to-night. What must I do, sir, to obtain rest and safety? I came here to be instructed in these important truths."

He sat down, and for some moments silence prevailed. The missionary was praying for "the wisdom that is profitable to direct." A conversation then ensued. Feelings were expressed, difficulties stated, and explanations given. The plan of salvation was simply unfolded, and passages of Scripture marked for examination and for proof. They parted with the mutual agreement to pray earnestly for the enlightening influences of the Holy Spirit until they should meet again.

For weeks a similar course was pursued. On the Sabbath he was a wrapt and prayerful listener. In the temperance meetings he exerted all his influence, and in the class-meeting he narrated his struggles and his desires. His manner was singularly calm and quiet. He would give the most perfect analysis of his emotions, compare them with the Word of God, note where they were in accordance with it and where they came short of its requirements. But to his own perception this seemed a mere intellectual process. He complained that he did not feel, while the missionary and his wife, who were sympathizing with him at every step, saw clearly that while light increased his spirituality increased also, and that he was gradually approaching that point where the witness of acceptance would seal the perfect consecration and the consciousness of adoption fill him with joy unspeakable.

Three months passed by; for occasionally he was impeded by harassing doubts and fears. Justification by faith was a mystery not yet grasped. He saw clearly his need of a Saviour. He recognized Jesus as that Saviour. He rejoiced in the redemption accomplished for the world. He believed that he was included in it. But the simple reliance of the soul upon Christ, as a personal present Saviour, was not yet exercised. The transition point was not yet passed.

Some months previous to this a youth connected with the Sabbath-school of the mission had been taken ill, and he was now about to die. Peace reigned in his heart and heaven was opening before him. A summons came to the missionary to visit him once more, and he invited his anxious friend to accompany him. Together they stood beside that bed of death. The wasted pallid face grew bright at their approach, and to the missionary's question, "How do you feel now, Thomas?" came forth the triumphant response, "Oh! I am happy, Mr. Luckey. I feel I am going home. My sins are all forgiven: praise, praise the Lord!" They bowed in prayer and praise, and then, having an engagement, the missionary immediately left. His companion remained beside the dying lad. Weak and exhausted, the latter lay motionless, with his eyes closed, looking as though the vital spark were even then extinguished.

Solemn and varied were the thoughts that occupied that watcher's mind and filled his heart with almost uncontrollable emotion. Not that the scene in all respects was new. He had stood beside scores of death-beds, and heard confessions, and given absolution, and applied holy oil. He had seen souls trembling on the verge of "purgatory" and shrinking in utter dread from the undefined process which was to prepare them eventually for a distant heaven; and he had soothed them with the promise of innumerable masses which were to redeem them from the bondage of another sphere. But in the clear light which had lately shone into his mind, he saw that this was not the truth. He saw that earth was the place where redemption was achieved and where victory was promised.

In the Bible he had read, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?" "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." And here, before his eyes, was a living, yet dying, exemplification of these glorious truths. He saw clearly that Christ was indeed a Saviour, an almighty Saviour. The triumphant words of the dying lad were ringing in his ears—"I am happy: I am going home: my sins are all forgiven." Unconsciously his personal confidence was increasing, and faith and hope were gaining ascendency over doubt and fear. He sat gazing on the boy. Suddenly the closed eye opened and fastened its earnest gaze upon him, and with supernatural energy the dying lad exclaimed, "Mr. ——, are your sins forgiven by Christ your Saviour?" The dim eye closed again, and the mortal put on immortality.

"Is Christ your Saviour?" The question echoed through that gazer's heart. Rapidly his mind surveyed the past, the present, and the future. The fulness and freeness of redeeming grace opened to his spiritual vision. His weary heart reposed itself on Christ. The witness of acceptance was clearly and joyously experienced, and he exclaimed, "Oh! yes. I feel He is my Saviour. O Thomas, would that you had lived till I could have told you so!"

THE COMING PRINCE OR ANTICHRIST.

By R. Anderson, LL.D., Barrister-at-Law.

The Coming Prince—Daniel's Representation—The Head of the Revived Roman Empire—The New Jerusalem Typifies the Jewish Church—Babylon the Apostacy of Rome—Satan's Master-lie a Travesty of the Incarnation.

IN the Book of Daniel the "Coming Prince," or Antichrist of the last days, is presented as the head of the revived Roman Empire of the future, and a persecutor of the saints. There is not a single statement respecting him that presents the smallest difficulty. But some of the statements of St. John seem inconsistent with the earlier prophecies. According to Daniel's visions the sovereignty of Antichrist appears confined to the ten kingdoms, and his career seems limited to the duration of the seventieth week. How then can this be reconciled with the statement of St. John that "power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations, and all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him?"* Is it credible, moreover, that a man endowed with such vast supernatural powers, and filling so marvellous a place in prophecy, will be restrained within the narrow limits of the Roman earth?

If these points be urged as objections to the truth of Scripture, it is enough to mark that the prophecies of Christ were beset with kindred difficulties. Such prophecies are like the disjointed pieces of an elaborate and intricate mosaic. To fit each into its place would baffle our utmost ingenuity. To discover the main design is all we can expect; or if more be demanded of us, it is enough to show that no part is inconsistent with the rest. And these results will reward the student of the Apocalyptic visions of Daniel and St. John, if only he approach them untrammelled by the crude views which prevail respecting the career of Antichrist.

These visions are not a history, but a drama. In the twelfth chapter of Revelation we see the woman in her travail. In the twenty-first chapter she is manifested in her final glory. The intervening chapters afford brief glimpses of events which will fill up the interval. It is with the thirteenth and seventeenth chapters that we have specially to do in connection with the present subject, and it is clear that the later vision unfolds events which come first in the order of time.

THE FALSE CHURCH AND THE TRUE

are typified under kindred emblems. Jerusalem, the bride, has its counterpart in Babylon, the harlot. In the same sense in which the New Jerusalem is the Jewish Church, so likewise Babylon is the apostacy of Rome. The heavenly city is mother of the redeemed for ages past (Galatians 4 : 26); the earthly city is mother of the harlots and abominations of the earth (Revelation 17 : 5). The victims who have perished in the persecutions of Antichristian Papal Rome are estimated at fifty millions of human beings; but even this appalling record will not be the measure of her doom. The blood of "holy apostles and prophets"—the martyred dead of ages before the Papacy arose, and even of pre-Messianic times—will be required of her when the day of vengeance comes (Revelation 18 : 20).

As it is only in its Jewish aspect that the Church is expressly symbolized as the bride, so also it is at a time when this, their normal relationship, has been regained by the covenant people that the apostate Church of Christendom, in the full development of its iniquity, appears as the harlot. The vision clearly indicates, moreover, a marked

REVIVAL OF HER INFLUENCE.

She is seen enthroned upon the ten-horned beast, herself arrayed in royal hues and decked with gold and costliest gems. The infamous greatness of Papal Rome in times gone by shall yet be surpassed by the splendor of her glories in dark days to come, when, having drawn within her pale it may be all that usurps the name of Christ on earth, she will claim as her willing vassal the last great monarch of the Gentile world.

As regards the duration of this period of Rome's final triumphs Scripture is silent; but the crisis which brings it to a close is definitely marked: "The ten horns and the beast shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh and burn her with fire (Revelation 17 : 16).

One point in the angel's description of the beast in relation to the harlot claims special notice. The seven heads have a twofold symbolism. When viewed in connection with the harlot, they are "seven mountains on which the woman sits;" but in their special relation to the beast they have a different significance. The angel adds, "and they are seven kings;" that is, "kingdoms," the word being used "according to its strict prophetic import, and to the analogy of that portion of the prophecy which is here especially in view."

In the seventh chapter of Daniel the beast is identified with the Roman Empire. In the thirteenth of Revelation he is identified also with the lion, the bear, and the panther, the first three "kingdoms" of Daniel's vision. But here he is seen as the heir and representative, not of these alone, but of all the great world-powers which have set themselves in opposition to God and to His people. The seven heads typify these powers. "Five are fallen, and one is." Egypt, Nineveh, Babylon, Persia, Greece, had fallen; and Rome then held the sceptre of earthly sovereignty, the sixth in succession to the empires already named. "And the other is not yet come, and when he cometh he must continue a short space."

Here the prophecy is marked by the same strange "foreshortening" already noticed in each of Daniel's visions. While Rome was the sixth kingdom, the seventh is the confederacy of the latter days, heading up in "the Coming Prince." The Coming Prince himself, in the full and final development of his power, is called the eighth, though belonging to the seven.

The subject of the twelfth chapter is the dragon, the woman in her travail, the birth of the man-child and his rapture to heaven, the conflict in heaven between the archangel and the dragon (verse 7); the dragon's banishment to earth; his persecution of the woman, and her flight to the wilderness, where she is sustained for "a time, and times, and half a time," or 1260 days (verses 6–14)—the second half of Daniel's seventieth week. The chapter ends by the statement that, baffled in attempting to destroy the woman, the dragon "went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." The thirteenth chapter, crossing the lines of Daniel's visions, represents the fulfilment of the dragon's purpose through the agency of the man of prophecy, whom he energizes to this end. Whatever meaning be attached to the birth and rapture of the woman's child, there can be no reasonable doubt that the obedient, faithful "remnant of her seed" is the Jewish Church of the latter days, the persecuted "saints of the Most High" of Daniel's prophecy.

The serpent, the woman, and the man, appear together on the earliest page of Scripture, and they reappear upon the latest. But how significant and terrible the change! No longer the subtle tempter, Satan is now displayed in all his awfulness as the great fiery dragon who seeks to destroy the woman's promised seed. And instead of the humbled penitent of Eden, the man appears as a wild beast, a monster, both in power and wickedness. The serpent's victim has become his willing slave and ally.

God has found a man to fulfil all His will, and to Him He has given up His throne, with all power in heaven and "on earth." This will hereafter be travestied by Satan, and the coming man shall have the dragon's "power, and his throne, and great authority" (Revelation 13 : 2). Both the dragon and the beast are seen crowned with royal diadems (Revelation 12 : 3; 13 : 1). Once, and only once, again in Scripture the diadem is mentioned, and then it is as worn by Him whose name is "King of kings, Lord of lords" (Revelation 19 : 12–16). It must be as pretenders to His power that the beast and the dragon claim it.

The personality of Satan and his interest in and close connection with our race throughout its history are among the most certain, though most of revelation. The popular classification of angels, men, and devils, as including intelligent creation is misleading. The angels that fell are "reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day" (Jude 6). Demons are frequently mentioned in the narrative of the Gospels, and they have also a place in the doctrine of the epistles. But the devil is a being who, like the archangel, seems in his own domain to have no peer.

This will afford an insight into the character of the predicted serpent-worship of the last days.* Satan's master-lie will be a travesty of the incarnation: he will energize a man who will claim universal worship as being the manifestation of the Deity in human form. And not only will there be a false Messiah, but another being, his equal in miraculous power, yet having for his only mission to obtain for him the homage of mankind. The mystery of the Godhead will thus be parodied by the mystery of iniquity, and the Father, the Son, and the Spirit will have their counterpart in the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet.

(To be concluded.)

* Rev. 13 : 7, 8. In the best reading of verse 7, the same four words occur as in 7 : 9—"nations, kindreds, people, and tongues."

* All the world wondered after the beast; and they worshipped the dragon (serpent) which gave power unto the beast; and they worshipped the beast (Rev. 13 : 3, 4).

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Mike Pleads for a Visit to Aleth—Aleth's Grief Over His Disappointment—Mr. Habershon Interferes—Mike's Visit—Aleth's Interest in the Burnt Shed—Etta's Influence—Etta Visits Mrs. Clemence—Project of Renewing the Shed.

"POOR little thing," said Miss Habershon to Mike! it's very sad. But oh, no! I don't think it would do for you to see her. Oh, no! It would frighten her so."

"Frighten her! Why, miss, I'd take my word old Michael wouldn't frighten nobody, leastways a little angel like that! The angels is always about us—beg your pardon, miss (making a sort of dab at the front of his hat)—and they're quite used to the likes of us poor men. They used to come about our Saviour, and He didn't only look like a working-man. An' she's a angel, if there ever was one on this earth. I've a seen her lots o' times a-runnin' about with her hoop on that 'ere road, and with her pretty hair and smiling face and rosy cheeks in the church."

This unexpected burst of eloquent feeling on Mike's part rather took Miss Habershon aback, she being by no means a person of many words; however, that it had taken some measure of effect was evident from her reply,

"Well, I will see about it, and let you know the next time you come. But if you do see her, it must be in an afternoon. She never can see any one in the mornings."

With repeated bows, and thanks even for the hope, Michael departed; while at the same time Miss Habershon retired to her housekeeping duties, following them up by a visit to Aleth. When Aleth heard that the giver of her many little presents, old Michael, whom Hutton liked so much, and whom she had seen in the church and on the road, had asked to see her and had been sent away, she covered her face with her white little hands and burst into tears.

This very rare expression of grief on Aleth's part put Miss Habershon into a perfect flutter of fright. She rang for the nurse, got a bottle of eau-de-cologne, provided a pocket-handkerchief out of the drawer, and furthermore disappeared into the study to confess to her brother the mistake of which she had been guilty. Mr. Habershon went up, and found his sunbeam smiling through the tears like a little rainbow. Nurse had found out in a moment the disappointment, and had made the child laugh by telling her that "old Mike was wanting now to bring her a talking jackdaw." This piece of news was on her lips as Mr. Habershon reached her low couch. He fondled and petted her, and kissed her little hands and face; and when he went down-stairs he said,

"Jane, I think you might let the old man come up some afternoon for a few minutes. Any little variety is good for her. She has had no fresh visitors lately. I dare say he will bring her some flowers or something, and she will like to see him."

"Very well," said Miss Habershon; "I will see that he comes up the next time he is here."

The "next time" was very soon. Mike arrived about three o'clock smartened up wonderfully, and carrying in his hand a flat paper parcel. After an interview, first with the "master," and then with the "miss," he was duly ushered into Aleth's presence, where, making the lowest of bows, he said,

"Be ye better, my dear? They're all a-askin' arter little miss."

"Thank you, I'm quite well," said Aleth. "Was the Shed all burnt?"

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" inwardly groaned poor Michael. Was the bone of contention and derision and the great sorrow to be brought up so suddenly, and in such august and ecclesiastical precincts, into the uncompromising daylight of Aleth's queries!

So he hastily said, "Yes! my dear. Yes! yes! Burnt down it was—burnt down. There's been a lot of fires. Please, miss, did you ever hear of the pretty little story 'bout the Gentle Shepherd, how he gave His life for the sheep, and how He gathered the lambs to His fold? And there was that sheep that ran away over the mountains. Wasn't it a pity? but the Good Shepherd, He brought it back, He did."

"Oh yes," said Aleth; "that was Jesus. I know all about Him. He is our Saviour. He told the story, and said, 'I am the Good Shepherd.'"

"Then here it is!" said old Mike, delightedly undoing his parcel, and presenting Aleth with one of the Tract Society's simple colored pictures of "The Good Shepherd," which he had framed himself in straight, varnished deal, painted like mahogany.

Aleth's pleasure was undisguised, and her thanks so profuse for this and all the other presents that poor old Michael looked as bashful over their unworthiness, as proud of the favor they had found.

"But the Shed!" began Aleth again. Only the nurse was present this time; so, it was not so alarming to Michael as before. "Can it never be built up again? What will everybody do? Won't they be in great trouble?"

Michael lowered his voice, and said confidentially, "Oh no, Miss Aleth, dearie, you mustn't think nothing about the poor old Shed. It's all done and gone now. Perhaps we was too fond of it," he added, soliloquizing, "and now it's gone."

"But," said Aleth, raising her head, and getting rather too animated, "what can you do? It's such a dreadful pity! and where do you have the prayer-meetings that Hutton likes so much? Do you have them in the church? Do ask papa to let you have them in here. I would like to see them so much!"

"Now, I think you are getting excited," said the nurse. "I shall have to ask Mr. Michael to go away."

"Oh no, no, nurse!" pleaded the child, "I have got some more things to ask him."

"Then don't talk nonsense," said the nurse; "talk sensible, can't you?"

Old Michael had passed his coat-sleeve over his eyes, and was once more trying to introduce a different topic, when Aleth said,

"Oh, do ask papa about it, Mr. Michael. He's got all the parish, and he can do anything he likes; and he's very rich too, at least I think he is, isn't he, nurse?" she said, appealing to the higher authority.

"Miss Aleth," said Mike, "look 'ee here! I don't never want to trouble nobody about the poor old Shed, nor nothing else—nor none of us don't. We've got a Father up there. He's good and kind; and we ask Him for all that we want. He don't never forget us."

Aleth lay thinking. Then she said, "I pray too. I say 'Our Father,' and 'Thank Thee, O God!' and 'Make me very patient!' and some more things besides. And I say a hymn to nurse sometimes, and to Etta too. Etta likes you very much. Etta says you're her good 'angel.'"

"Oh, dear me! I don't know whatever the child's talking about!" said bewildered old Mike, turning to the nurse.

"It's the young lady at the Hall," said the nurse; "she's been coming in pretty often to see her; and she teaches her to mind all sorts of bits of hymns and texts. She's a wonderful child for memory," the nurse added sotto voce. "Now, then, can't you say something, my dear?" she added in a louder tone.

Folding her hands, Aleth recited the hymn commencing, "My rest is in heaven, my rest is not here."

"May the Good Shepherd bless the child!" said Michael, bowing his head reverently, and speaking in a very quavering voice.

And thus the interview ended; for Mike, whose devotion to the child was growing every moment, began to see plainly, in the light of prudence, that if he did not soon bring his visit to a termination, it would be considered too long, and perhaps lose its chance of repetition.

Aleth, in her sympathizing inquiries after the "Shed," did not know that, nothing daunted by the downfall of their shelter, Hutton, Michael, and the other men, who acted in that town, in their humble way, as the Lord's "remembrancers," had arranged to have their little meetings alternately at one another's houses; one evening in the week having been claimed by Mr. and Mrs. Clemence for the "little room" in their own house, which was truly, like most other rooms in Ferncroft, "a place where prayer was wont to be made."

Not many weeks had elapsed from Lady Isabel's visit, when, after sundry little notes had been exchanged, Etta arrived at Ferncroft for the miscellaneous evening meal, and the promised chat afterward, when, to Mrs. Clemence's pleasure, both were able to open their minds to one another much more freely than she had expected. Shyly at first, and then more frankly, Etta admitted the blank left by her crushing sorrow, and the gradual entrance of the recognition of Christ—her Lord—as her Saviour, her Master, her Friend.

A more personal acquaintance with Him, a clearer knowledge of Him, she implied, though her words were few; and Mrs. Clemence understood. With her own persuasiveness and gentle tact she drew out more of her guest's real feeling than any of Etta's other acquaintances could or would have succeeded in drawing out; and this, not from dislike of the subject, but from a natural reserve, as well as dislike of anything like pretence or mere talk.

"I have always hated the idea of getting into a rut," she said; "and I always imagined that religion in most people was a 'rut!' that is, a narrow, stiff, conventional, gloomy thing—I don't quite know how to express myself—that put its votaries instantly, or gradually, as the case might be, into a system of straight cases and corpse-like bandages. And then in my great sorrow," she continued, hesitating, "I longed and thirsted for some one, something, that would be a real presence to me, that would fill up the yawning chasm, the blank in my life. In fact, I began to long for a God—I do say it with reverence, dear Mrs. Clemence!" she interrupted, suddenly clasping in hers the soft, thin hand that lay so temptingly near her, and seating herself on a low stool almost at Mrs. Clemence's feet; "but I wanted One who would be an original friend to me! I do not know at all how to explain myself; it is so impossible to put such ideas—and yet they are realities!—into words. I wanted some one all for myself, who would suit me."

"You wanted One who could both know and understand and help you; and you wanted a Friend who could comfort too," answered Mrs. Clemence in a low calm voice. "I understand you, dear."

Then Mrs. Clemence told Etta that on this evening, usually, a little prayer-meeting was held in their small outer room, and explained that though she herself and Mr. Clemence generally went in for some part of the time, they never stayed the whole hour, because they thought it well to let the men have the freedom of expression and pleasant interchange of thought among themselves, which might not be so unfettered if they were present.

"To-night we will go in for the end," she said; "and you will see what it is like; and can join in the simple, earnest praise and heartfelt petitions that, among the working people, is so refreshing, when they are truly Christians."

To tell the truth, poor Etta rather trembled at the idea of anything like a "prayer-meeting!" Echoes of such a thing she had heard, once or twice, as a murmur in the dim distance. But to be brought into actual contact with it! that was rather alarming.

When they went in the men were reading round the fourth chapter of the Book of Acts. Their simple, descriptive remarks, and their comments, so touching, so spiritual, amazed at least one of their guests. She had never heard anything like it before. Then their prayers! Her heart was overflowing, and her eyes—poor Etta! she was rather ashamed of the tears that would come—all but her lips, and they were sealed. She could not answer a word, even to old Mike's enthusiastic and delighted greeting at the close; nor could she respond as she would have wished to the more deferential, though none the less warm, welcome of one or two of the others who recognized her as a new friend.

"They lost that old Shed they used to be so fond of," she said to Mrs. Clemence afterward. 'I had no idea that was what they used to do here! It is a great, great pity they have no place that they can use whenever they like.

Here Mr. Clemence interposed. He said, "For twenty pounds I believe they could build it up again, and by paying a very trifling rental they might have the use of it all the year round—"

"And might use it for all sorts of purposes," chimed in Mrs. Clemence; "keeping it for a prayer-meeting during two or three times in the week. Have you heard," she said, turning to Etta, "of Lady Isabel's delightful plan for the men at Thornham?"

"I know," answered Etta; "my brother Harold wrote to me about it. He said it seemed a capital plan, and that all the men looked so happy and comfortable in it. How I wish we could have one here! It would be very nice indeed. Do you really think," she added, "that the Shed, if it were rebuilt, could be turned into such a blissful arrangement as Lady Isabel's coffee-room?"

"It would be the very thing," said Mr. Clemence. "The only difficulty is the old story—want of funds!"

"Yes, that is always the difficulty," said Etta. "Yet they have just spent two thousand pounds on the new chancel; and they are talking now of another thousand for the bells."

"A fraction of it might save many souls, if put into the Lord's hands, and blessed by Him," said Mr. Clemence. "The whole of that sum might, if spent in missionary effort, entirely renovate this and many other towns."

"Yes," said Etta thoughtfully, "I do believe you are right. You mean by sending out preachers, and Bibles, and books, and teachers?"

"Yes, and in many other ways besides, too numerous and too elaborate to enter into now. One way would be 'the Shed,'" he ended, laughing.

"And the dream vanishes!" said Mrs. Clemence. "How melancholy! but it may solidify some day. There is no saying."

A bell rang, Etta's footman was in the hall, and the evening terminated, with many hopes on her part of a frequent repetition of it.

PARABLE OF THE POUNDS.

S. S. Lesson for May 29th. Luke 19:11-27. Golden Text, Rom. 14:12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE hearts of the twelve Apostles were set with determinate expectation on the promises of God that the kingdom and glory should return to the land of Israel (Jer. 33:6-22); they longed that Jerusalem should be again "a name of joy, a praise and an honor before all the nations of the earth;" they yearned for the fulfilment of the prophecy, "They shall take them captives whose captives they were; and they shall rule over their oppressors" (Isa. 14:2). The Lord Jesus had plainly told them of His coming sufferings (Luke 18:31-33), but "they understood none of these things; and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken." Even after the resurrection, and immediately before the ascension of our Lord, they asked, "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel" (Acts 1:6)? Thus it is not surprising that the occasion of the parable in our subject was "because He was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear." Of the men of faith it is said, "Now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly; wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. 11:16).

But great responsibility must accompany great privilege, and this is the teaching of our parable. "So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God," says our Golden Text, and may God teach us to walk daily in the sense of our just accountability to Him.

Jesus said therefore, "A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return." Jesus said to Pontius Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence" (John 18:36). We who are God's children have already a pledge of His coming kingdom, for "the kingdom of God is . . . righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost" (Rom. 14:17). "And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come." No man in his senses would trust the management of his business affairs and his money into the hands of people who were unknown to him, still less to those who were in a position of enmity; tried and trusted servants alone could be charged with the responsibility. Thus we cannot reckon the "servants" to be unconverted people who are in charge of the Master's goods, the only charge which such have is the message of reconciliation by which they may some time or other enter into His service. They are in the position of the citizens who "hated him and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us."

What, then, is our charge as servants? In what have we to occupy till our Lord come? Everything. As redeemed, as blood-bought, we owe it to the Lord that our existence shall have no meaning but for Him; that our presence shall be His presence, our life His life, our words His words, our works His works. We owe it to Him that everything we do shall be in charge for Him, and every detail of our life pressed into His service as a means of glorifying Him. We owe it to Him that in every success He shall gain the credit; that in every difficulty He shall extricate us; that in every temptation He shall deliver us, in every sorrow He shall comfort us, in every sickness He shall heal us, in every perplexity He shall counsel and guide us. We owe it to Him that our life in every particular shall furnish Him with one opportunity after another of manifesting His glory. O to live every moment in the consciousness that we are in charge for God!

When the nobleman "was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded those servants to be called unto him to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading." This is the judgment-seat of Christ, mentioned in 2 Cor. 5:10; Eph. 6:8; Rev. 20:12, etc., and does not seem to be the same as the judgment of the wicked which takes place after the millenium (Rev. 20:5, 11-15), where the question is as to whether their names are written in the Lamb's book of life; for these here are the known servants of the Master, and are rewarded, not according to their faith, but the fruits which their faith has brought forth.

The first servant came, and in the account which he gave in he spoke no word of his own faithfulness or energy, "Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds." Thou also hast wrought all our works in us (Isa. 26:12); we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained (or prepared) that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10).

The servant had been enabled to render tenfold the Master's goods which were in his hand. Reader, are there tenfold more living souls in the circle of your influence since you were converted? Is the standard of Christianity in your family or in your church tenfold higher since you knew the Lord, and were put in charge by Him? Is the standard of morality in business among Christians tenfold purer around you since God trusted you to represent Jesus as a man of business? If not, what has your trust produced? The nobleman "said unto him, Well, thou good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities." Whether this authority over cities will take place in the regenerated earth during the millenium remains to be proved when Jesus comes; the redeemed sing in heaven, "We shall reign on the earth" (Rev. 5:10). "And the second came, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained five pounds:" the result was less, no praise for faithfulness is accorded in this instance, but the reward is in just proportion: "Be thou also over five cities."

"And another came, saying, Lord, behold here is thy pound, which I have kept (not lost) laid up in a napkin; for I feared thee, because thou art an austere man: thou takest up that thou layedst not down, and reapest that thou didst not sow." This was no stranger, but a servant who had been known and trusted by his master; but he saw that master through the colored glass of his own evil heart. Are there not many among those who have received forgiveness of sins, have been reconciled to God, who nevertheless know Him as a hard Master, who think of Him only as exacting an impossible obedience, requiring a faithfulness which is beyond their power, and that which to others is a precious charge is to them a hard duty. These are they who calculate with how little religion a man may get to heaven, who think it a denial to give up worldly amusements for the Lord's sake, who hold to the point that they are saved through faith with the greatest tenacity, cling to their pound, but never make use of it to win others, or to increase the kingdom of God on earth. They receive what they can get from God, but never yield themselves unto Him: these are the souls who try the love and patience of more faithful Christians: some say they are not converted at all, and certainly they are not converted from living for themselves; they believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and they claim to have everlasting life, but, like Lot, they must in the end suffer loss.

The nobleman never denied that this man was a servant; he said, "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant. Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not sow; wherefore then gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury? And he said unto them that stood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds." "Take from him the pound." This is awful, but this is the word of Jesus. The servants who are not true to their trust must lose at that time of righteous retribution that grace of God which they have received in trust; but the faithful ones will receive at that time an additional share. The enemies of Christ, however, who remain unbelieving, who have never come nigh unto Him, nor entered into His service, "bring hither," He says, "and slay them before me." The Lord make us true to Him and faithful to our charge!

Lighted Home by a Torch.—A Minister walked, one evening, two miles into a neighborhood where very few could read, to spend an evening in reading to a company who were assembled to listen. When about to return by a narrow path through the woods, where paths diverged, he was provided with a torch of light wood; but he objected that it was too small, weighing not over half a pound. "It will light you home," answered the host. "Yes," was the reply; "but the wind may blow it out." "It will light you home" was the rejoinder. "But if it should rain?" was again objected. "It will light you home," the host insisted. Contrary to apprehensions, it gave abundant light all the way home, furnishing an apt illustration to the way in which doubting hearts would be "lighted home" safely along the "narrow way," if they would take the Bible as a light to their feet, and lamp to their path. Some men bring forward objections to the Bible, but they may be answered in the words of the friend who furnished the torch, "it will light you home."'

What a Few Tracts Did in Bengal.—Some years ago a missionary was preaching in the neighborhood of the Garrow hills, in north-eastern Bengal. He had been fiercely opposed; he found it impossible to gain a hearing; discouraged and saddened he turned to depart; before leaving, however, he distributed a few tracts. Those who received them were about to tear them up, when two or three hillmen who happened to be in the crowd begged that they might be given to them. They took the tracts to their native hills; the reading of them awakened a spirit of inquiry; ere long a deputation waited on the missionary; they entreated that Christian teachers might be sent among them. This was done, and at the present day there is a flourishing Church of several hundreds of members in those hills.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Marriage of the Heir to the Crown of Austria, Prince Rudolph, to the Princess Stephanie of Belgium, was solemnized at Vienna on May 10th, with imposing magnificence. The marriage is a very popular one in both countries, and the princess received a hearty welcome from the people over whom her husband expects to reign. This arises from the report that Prince Rudolph wooed and won his bride as ordinary lovers do, and that it is more of a love match than Imperial marriages usually are. The cable reports of the ceremony, say that the bride bore herself with charming modesty and grace, and won all hearts by her ingenuous and simple manner. An affecting incident occurred at the critical stage of the ceremony. The princess, who had maintained an apparent composure up to that moment, broke completely down and burst forth into a fit of weeping and trembling from long-suppressed nervous excitement. Prince Rudolph was calm and collected, and succeeded in calming the agitation of his bride.

In commemoration of the marriage the Emperor Francis Joseph has founded twenty-two scholarships at various schools, and has given 100,000 florins for the free admission of ten pupils to the establishment for the education of the daughters of officers. He has also granted complete or partial amnesty to 331 persons imprisoned for various offences.

Prince Rudolph is twenty-three years of age, and is described as being manly and good natured, and passionately fond of sport. He has been carefully educated, and speaks English, French, and Italian fairly well. The bride is only sixteen. Her first experience of the outer world was gained at the Paris Exposition, to which she was taken incognito by her father. It is related that an American gentleman met the King and his daughter there, and, unaware of their rank, was so delighted with the beauty and intelligence of the Princess that he made her a proposal of marriage.

The Irish Land Bill will, it is Hoped, be Read a second time in the House of Commons on May 20th. It will then be debated clause by clause, and after that ordeal the final stage of the third reading will be reached, when if it is passed it will be sent to undergo the same process in the House of Lords. Mr. Forster, Chief Secretary for Ireland, in a speech at Bradford expressed himself as very hopeful of the fate of the bill, as he believed the landlords themselves wished the question settled speedily.

A striking commentary on the State of Ireland may be obtained from a speech Mr. John Bright delivered May 9th, in the House of Commons. He said that if a great fleet, assembled at Cork or Galway, offered free passage to the whole population of Connaught it was probable that all, certainly that half, would find their way to the United States.

The Subject of Free Trade is Assuming Serious proportions in England. The Anglo-French Commercial Treaty which Mr. Cobden negotiated with the Emperor Napoleon III. in 1860 will not be renewed by France, and it is proposed to make alterations in the French tariff, the mere mention of which has caused something like consternation in the commercial and manufacturing centres. The new system, if put into operation, will have the effect of shutting out many of the most important descriptions of English goods; and the English public is opposed to the imposition of retaliatory duties on French wines and silks. The American prohibitory tariff checks English trade in this direction, and if trade with France is also restricted there is a probability of a serious decline in British commercial prosperity.

The Success of the French Operations against Tunis is causing serious alarm in Europe. The French Government seized on the opportunity offered by the turbulence of a Tunisian tribe on the borders of the French province of Algeria, which the Bey professed himself unable to quell, and occupied the territory. They then surrounded the capital of the Bey, who was meditating a flight, and forced him to sign a treaty guaranteeing all they required and giving them a controlling influence over Tunis which is little less than annexation. England, Italy, and Turkey are all aggrieved by this high-handed proceeding. Italy protested and Turkey prepared to send a war vessel to protect the Sultan's interests as Suzerain of Tunis. The French ambassador at Constantinople was however instructed to hand to the Porte a note, saying that the despatch of any armed force to Tunis by Turkey would be regarded as a declaration of war.

The British Government has decided to express an opinion on the annexation of Tunis in a despatch which will maintain the ground hitherto taken by England, that Tunis is a part of the Ottoman Empire, the integrity of which is guaranteed by the European Powers, but for the present nothing further is intended than to place this protest on record. There is, however, cause for disquiet apparent to England, where the prevalent feeling about the question is that the policy of semi-annexation will have an injurious influence on the fortunes of the French Republic and the peace of the Continent. From both points of view the policy of France appears most unfortunate and may easily lead to deplorable results.

The Hostility Between the Authorities and the people of Ireland increases in spite of the Land Bill. Earl Spencer, Lord President of the Council, speaking in the House of Lords, said "the government regretted that its hopes of the result of recent legislation for the maintenance of order in Ireland had not been realized so far." Agrarian crimes, assassinations, and arrests under the Coercion act are of daily occurrence, and the state of the country is described as little short of anarchy.

The landlords are making almost superhuman efforts to recover their rents. Sheriffs' sales and evictions are frequent, and each is attended by a demonstration which contains all the elements of some future encounter between the people and the military and police. The feeling of exasperation against the constabulary is becoming more and more bitter every day. Even large bodies are attacked and stoned in the most determined manner There is a growing opinion that the people are determined to resist the police by force of arms if necessary. The feeling among the detachments in the country districts is one which bodes no good for the people if any outbreak should occur.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Infidel Member of the British Parliament, made another attempt to take the oath and his seat on May 10th. Entering the House he advanced to the bar to be sworn. The Speaker ordered him to withdraw. He refused to do so, when the sergeant-at-arms, at the Speaker's request, approached and touched Mr. Bradlaugh on the shoulder. He still refused to withdraw. Sir Stafford Northcote then moved that he be removed and not permitted to enter the door again until he promised that he would not further disturb the proceedings of the House. The motion being carried, Mr. Bradlaugh left the House, and sent a written protest to the Speaker. Mr. Gladstone's bill to facilitate his admission is postponed during the consideration of the Irish Land Bill. The prosecutor in the late case is endeavorig to force Mr. Bradlaugh into bankruptcy, which would force him to vacate his seat in Parliament.

The Motion to Erect a Monument to the late Lord Beaconsfield in Westminster Abbey was passed in both Houses of the British Parliament on May 9th. Mr. Gladstone in making the motion delivered an eloquent speech, which, considering that Lord Beaconsfield had been his most inveterate political rival for many years, has raised his character for magnanimity throughout the world. In the course of his speech he said that although himself separated from Lord Beaconsfield by longer and larger divergence than perhaps ever existed between two persons so constantly in contact, yet he had pleasure in dwelling on his great qualities; on his extraordinary intellectual powers, which all would do well to remember; on the strength of will and persistency of purpose manifest throughout his career; on his strong sympathy with his race, and his kindness to struggling literary genius. In conclusion, Mr. Gladstone took occasion to record his firm conviction that Lord Beaconsfield was never actuated by personal antipathy towards himself. Sir Stafford Northcote, who succeeded Lord Beaconsfield as leader of the Conservatives in the House of Commons, in seconding the motion, said Mr. Gladstone had already erected a monument better than marble.

Mr. Gladstone in making the motion imperilled his popularity with a large section of his party. The London correspondent of the New York World reports that even the members of the cabinet were not in accord on the subject, and that five of them ostentatiously walked out of the House before the division on his motion; these were Sir Charles Dilke and Messrs. Bright, Chamberlain, Fawcett, and Leonard Courtney. It is an unprecedented thing for a premier to be thus publicly deserted and snubbed by members of his own ministry.

The "Spirit Ration" in the British Army is about to be discontinued, a motion to that effect having been made in the House of Commons on March 22d. This by no means implies, of course, a peremptory enforcement of total abstinence from ardent liquors on the part of soldiers. But, happily, of recent years a great reformation has taken place in the drinking habits of the military class. A very considerable proportion of men have, if not taken the pledge—though very many of them have done even that—renounced intoxicating beverages altogether, and, in consequence, sell their spirit ration to their comrades, with what results may be easily imagined. It used to be a tradition in both the army and the navy that the fighting spirit was sustained, and even stimulated, by a generous distribution of potent drinks: but never was a theory more thoroughly blown to the winds than by the exploits of Sir Henry Havelock's "water-babies," as they were disdainfully nick-named on the march to and relief of Lucknow.

A Brave Saddler of Turin, having been Summoned to Nice by a business engagement, took with him his only daughter, a child of seven, whose fondness for music prompted her to persuade her father to purchase seats in the theatre which was recently destroyed by fire. He secured places in the gallery, and was occupying them with his little girl when the alarm of fire rang through the house. Snatching up the child, he broke through the panic-stricken crowd to the gallery door; but during the struggle his child was torn from his grasp. By an almost superhuman effort he contrived to re-enter the gallery, by that time plunged in all but total darkness, and, while groping about among the overthrown seats, caught hold of a little girl, insensible from fright, whom he carried out into the street, fully believing her to be his own daughter. She proved, however, to be a strange child. Hastily setting her down upon the pavement, he desperately fought his way for the second time into the burning theatre, from which he never again emerged alive. His charred corpse was found, two days later, among the ruins of the gallery stairs. The danger this child was in, in the burning theatre so excited the father that he risked and lost his life in the effort to save her; yet parents see their children in danger of eternal fire and yet make no attempt to secure their salvation.

EXETER HALL JUBILEE AND RE-OPENING.

Fifty Years' Retrospect—The Site of Shows—A Wonderful Elephant—"Seeing the Lions"—The Opening of the Building—State of England at the Time—Scene of the May Meetings—Eminent American Visitors—Ecclesiastical Interference—The Hall for Sale—A Philanthropic Rescue.

As already mentioned among our notes on Foreign Topics, this historic building in London, renovated and greatly improved, was formally re-opened on March 29th. The edifice has become the property of the Young Men's Christian Association, and on the afternoon of the opening day a numerously attended prayer-meeting was held in the Lower Hall, presided over by Mr. George Williams, the munificent treasurer of the Association. In the evening of the same day a public meeting was held in the Large Hall, which was crowded in every part by a most enthusiastic audience.

Among those who were present on the platform were many gentlemen well known by reputation on this side the Atlantic. Of these were: The Earl of Shaftesbury (the President of the Association, who occupied the chair), the Archbishop of Canterbury, Earl Cairns, the Lord Mayor of London, Lord Mount-Temple, the Revs. Canon Fleming, Prebendary Wilson, J. P. Chown, W. M. H. Aitken, and Messrs. Hugh Matheson and Samuel Morley, Sir Thomas Chambers, M.P., Lord Radstock, etc. It may prove to be interesting to our readers if we take which have now culminated in a jubilee, which, in turn, has been made the starting-point of a new era of life and usefulness. In half a century England has made such wonderful strides of progress that the mind finds itself unable to appreciate the advances made—advances which Exeter Hall, or rather Christian work associated with its meetings, has stimulated in no small degree. There is some interest attached to because the land immediately contiguous formerly belonged to Exeter House, one of those fine mansions with spacious gardens which were once the charm and glory of the metropolis. When the house was removed, some adventurous spirits erected rooms on the spot for the exhibition of works of art, and it was there, when, in 1802, she landed in England with her waxen images, that Madame Tussaud first held her court. Close at hand were the rooms in which the Beefsteak Club, of which George IV. was once a member, held on its not very creditable course until 1869, when the silver gridiron and dining-plate realized fancy prices.

FORMERLY A MENAGERIE OF WILD BEASTS.

The exact site of the present hall was formerly occupied by Exeter Change, where in 1809, and some following years, a show of wild beasts was to be seen. The Change must have been a great disfigurement to the Strand, projecting as it did over the pavement, and its front being plastered all over with pictures of wild beasts. Country cousins, however, came to London in large numbers to see it, with its menagerie. In those days the Zoological Gardens were not in existence, and Exeter Change and the Tower of London were the only two places in the metropolis where wild beasts could be seen alive, except, of course, in the travelling wild beast shows; so that visitors to London were generally taken first to the menagerie in the Strand to "see the lions."

The great attraction was a wonderful elephant named "Chunee," who weighed nearly five tons, stood eleven feet high, and was estimated to be worth $5000. After about twelve years of captivity he became ungovernable, and on March 1st, 1826, Mr. Cross, the proprietor, in his great alarm, sent for a guard of soldiers from Somerset House. The soldiers, being marshalled in due order, fired several volleys, and the gigantic beast fell at last, pierced with more than one hundred and fifty musket bullets. With the death of "Chunee," the chief attraction, Exeter Change itself soon passed away, and in 1830 the Hall whose jubilee has just been celebrated arose on its ruins, a more lasting temple, devoted to nobler uses.

One other notable circumstance may be fitly mentioned here. Anthony Ashley, the first Earl of Shaftesbury, resided for a time in old Exeter House; and little did he or his son or his sceptical grandson imagine that years later, so near the spot, a building would arise which would be so intimately connected with the name of their philanthropic descendant.

When Exeter Hall was opened, fifty years ago, England was in a transition state, and the era of modern progress set in with the accession of William IV. in 1830. For years, however, the bark of the state was driven by fierce Euroclydons through such a tempestuous sea that no political seer could have prognosticated the calm and prosperity which ultimately ensued. When the battle for Reform, in 1832, shook the country from end to end, the day of victory seemed only to embitter and intensify party rancor. While the dawn of the new era of general advancement was deepening into sunrise, the people do not appear to have been quite sure whether they cared to change the old for the new order of things. Railways were eyed with something more than suspicion; for the Stockton and Darlington line, the first opened for passenger traffic in the kingdom, was not only indicted for a nuisance, but a verdict of "guilty" was actually entered against the enterprising directors. Arson and machine breaking were also rife; and the working-men, suffering from grievances the origin of which was misunderstood, were clamorous for relief. England was asking for the Repeal of the Corn Laws and for Free Trade, which were only granted after a long struggle.

When Exeter Hall was opened, in times like these, and in a London greatly differing from the modern British metropolis, the epoch of as we understand them, had not set in, one of the grandest religious events of the year then being the annual sermon at Surrey Chapel, a building which, on March 21st, 1881, passed away for ever. Though Sunday-schools were extending their influence among the poor, the London City Mission was as yet not even thought of. Compared with their present magnitude, the great missionary societies were only humble agencies. The Religious Tract Society quietly pursued its useful course, publishing little books, and two small periodicals a month; while the British and Foreign Bible Society scattered about one fifth of the number of the sacred volume now annually issued.

The day was, nevertheless, one of abundant promise; abuses were threatened on every side, old prejudice was giving way, but the ability was not given to every one to read the signs of the times. Sweeping storms, such as the riots consequent on the Lords' rejection of the Reform Bill, were clearing the atmosphere; and Exeter Hall was destined to become a rallying centre of those reformers of a higher grade whose aim was the social and religious elevation of the people. According to Lord Macaulay, "Exeter Hall set up its bray"; but the said bray was, after all, representative of an unspeakably momentous work.

Fifty years ago there was, unfortunately, plenty to "bray" about on the part of those who, yearning for the salvation of the world, lived for something higher than shining in society, or showing off their gifts in Parliament. Women and children were kept at their labor for fifteen hours a day in factories and coal mines until Lord Ashley's Ten Hours' Bill ameliorated their condition.

This is the kind of work in which the present Earl of Shaftesbury has been engaged during the half century that Exeter Hall has existed; the life of the Earl constituting thus a part of the history of the building. Evangelistic and kindred work, both at home and abroad, from time to time has been stimulated by the meetings held in the familiar Hall, while such reformative agencies as the City Mission and the Ragged School Union have actually been called into existence during those fifty years. In fact, there are few modern buildings in London that possess such as Exeter Hall. The building was really one of the latest products of the great Evangelical revival of the last century. The natural result of that movement was an outburst of missionary and philanthropic zeal, the chief of the societies which meet annually at Exeter Hall in May having been formed eighty or ninety years ago, were inaugurated at some humble tavern in Aldersgate Street, or coffee-house in Paternoster Row, but, growing in popularity and activity, Freemasons' Hall became for a time their chief rendezvous. At length, in 1830-31, Exeter Hall was erected.

Thirty or forty years ago the place had a strong Orange flavor about it. It was here that the defunct Protestant Association used to meet, under the Presidency of Lord Roden, or Lord Winchilsea, or some other Protestant peer, while Hugh Stowell or Dr. McNeile thundered against Romish aggression. Here, too, Dr. Cumming used to declaim against the Papacy. Here also Father Gavazzi, during his earlier visits to England, arrayed in a black gown with an embroidered cross on the back, poured out his fiery invectives against Pius IX.

As a rule, however, Exeter Hall has been more distinguished for its missionary and philanthropic activity than for mere polemics.

The memory of such men as Livingstone and Moffat, and Ellis, and Mullens will live when mere theological controversialists will have been altogether forgotten. It was on this very platform that William Knibb, in a burst of passionate oratory, held aloft, and then flung down, the clanking shackles of a West Indian slave. The earlier fame of Exeter Hall rests not upon theological controversies, but upon the breaking of fetters and the liberation of the oppressed.

Americans, too, have an interest in the great hall in the Strand. Many years ago Emerson, the philosopher of Concord, lectured within its walls. It was in Exeter Hall that John B. Gough, in the prime of his manhood, gave a series of dramatic orations on temperance, which first established his fame as a public speaker on that side of the Atlantic. On the same platform have been received the late Dr. Joseph P. Thompson, of New York, and other distinguished Americans, less known to English fame.

From time to time the platform of Exeter Hall has been turned into a temporary pulpit. The first occasion was when the late Rev. Samuel Martin was rebuilding his chapel at Westminster, where Dean Stanley has since so often fraternized with Nonconformists. Somewhat later it was the scene of as a popular London preacher. He was then little more than a lad, but he had already so filled his own once empty chapel in New Park Street that enlargement had become necessary. With the courage which has always characterized him, he ventured on Exeter Hall during the alterations, and very soon crowded it from end to end.

Later yet, it was engaged by a number of the London Evangelical Clergy for Sunday evening services, who were soon made to understand, through Episcopal interference, that they had unwittingly infringed the parochial system of the Church of England. The incumbent of the little church round the corner in Burleigh Street stood upon his technical rights, and the Evangelical clergymen had to succumb, although only for a time. It is hard to believe, in days when suffragan bishops preach in local town-halls, and rectors and laymen in theatres and music-halls, that such obstructiveness could have been submitted to less than five and twenty years ago. Nonconformists, of course, took up the work which Evangelical clergymen were thus compelled to abandon; and, more recently, Exeter Hall was made the headquarters of the great revivalists, Moody and Sankey.

Toward the end of 1880 it was rumored that owing to the expiration of the lease, the hall was about and converted into a hotel or common variety theatre, but the rumor was soon authoritatively dismissed as "an evil dream." Evangelical Protestantism was happily rescued from this peril and shame by the energetic combination and munificence of six Christian gentlemen, J. D. Allcroft, R. C. L. Bevan, Samuel Morley, M.P., George Williams,

T. A. Denny, and E. M. Denny, who, subscribing the sum of £25,000, privately purchased the property from the original shareholders for the Young Men's Christian Association, and with the further design of providing, in its altered and renovated form, for the usual anniversaries and meetings of the Bible, Missionary, and other kindred institutions.

This aim has been realized; the edifice has been reconsecrated by the prayers of Christian men and women, and devoted anew to the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom; and we hope that our readers will earnestly pray that the Divine blessing may descend, not only on the noble-hearted friends whose wealth has been used in such a holy enterprise, and the Association which seeks to help and elevate the young men of London, 250,000 of whom are daily employed in commercial activities, but also that the annual May meetings in the newly beautified hall may receive a larger and a richer benediction than ever from the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

RT. HON. THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

Philanthropic Labors—Help for Factory Slaves—Ragged Schools—Bible Society—The Y.M.C.A.—The Exeter Hall Meeting—Octogenarian Celebration.

NO living man could have been more fittingly invited to preside at the re-opening of Exeter Hall than Lord Shaftesbury. During a long public life his lordship's name has ever been identified with every good and philanthropic movement; but in no organization has he taken a deeper or warmer interest than in the Young Men's Christian Association.

As Lord Shaftesbury was born on the 28th of April, 1801, he is nearly as old as the century, but still retains a clearness and strength of faculty and a power of expression which render his speeches as interesting and forcible as ever.

Having already given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for November 7th, 1878, with his portrait, many details respecting his lordship's ancestry, we shall now confine ourselves to the mention of a few of the more prominent movements in which he has taken part.

His efforts on behalf of

of England will long be remembered with gratitude by his countrymen.

Although the appalling state of things had somewhat altered for the better when Lord Shaftesbury entered the field, some of the worst evils of the factory system remained, and these his lordship attacked both in and out of Parliament with an eloquent vehemence and persistency which ultimately bore down opposition and secured for the children of poverty and toil, in 1844, after a struggle of ten years, the Ten Hours' Bill, limiting the labor of factory operatives to Ten Hours a day.

THE ADVOCACY OF RAGGED SCHOOLS and kindred institutions has also long been recognized as a noble feature of his public character. When the cause of Ragged Schools was yet in its infancy, and all sorts of doubts and difficulties were raised by the timid or the careless, Lord Shaftesbury, without one misgiving, made the cause of the poor and the friendless his own, and pleaded for the thousands of little outcasts who were his clients as if they had been his own children. Without a single exception, his lordship has presided at every one of the anniversaries of the Ragged School Union. It is said that since their establishment the ragged schools of London have been the means of rescuing from neglect and vice considerably more than 200,000 children, and to this magnificent result no man has contributed more largely than Lord Shaftesbury.

His Lordship is

a supporter of special religious services in theatres, etc., and a promoter of many schemes for the social, intellectual, and moral improvement of the masses. The City Mission, the Church Pastoral Aid Society, and the Society for the Conversion of the Jews, have also received much valuable help from the Earl.

The address he delivered as

on the evening of March 29th was in all respects worthy of the man and the occasion. When the prolonged cheering which greeted him had subsided he said that long as he had been accustomed to Exeter Hall, he was overawed by the circumstances of the present meeting and by that vast assembly. They were present to commemorate a great and signal success and to quote the triumph of years, and while they were thankful for the past they were ambitious for the future. He saw that the metropolis and the other great cities were rapidly soaking up the physical and intellectual power of the country, and drawing thousands of youths into the midst of the greatest dangers and temptations to which they could be exposed, without the advantage of parental control and the securities of domestic life.

Knowing well that the strength of the nation depended upon the moral condition of the people, it struck them that an institution like this would be of the utmost service in promoting religion and culture among young people, and enabling them to overcome the obstacles and oppressions to which they might be subjected. It was a grand conception, and had succeeded beyond all anticipation. The Society had branches throughout England, and alliances in India, the Colonies, and the United States, and he believed that its operations would do much to save the commercial reputation of the country—a reputation which had been rapidly falling into dishonor.

The character of England had now fallen into such dishonor that Hindoo merchants, who at one time confided implicitly in English traders, now carefully weighed and tested the goods sent out by them from Great Britain. These facts he regarded as a striking proof of the need for Young Men's Christian Associations, while the history of those Associations abundantly proved their adaptation to the purposes for which they were designed.

Toward the close of the meeting the Earl, in acknowledging a vote of thanks, said that he had now been for and was the only president they had had. In rejoicing that the Hall was preserved for its original purpose, he was reminded of the saying of a good though mistaken man—Macaulay, who had hoped that the brayings of Exeter Hall would come to an end ere long. He (the Chairman) thought some of those brayings, like those of Balaam's ass, spoke the words of truth and soberness. Exeter Hall stood on what had been the gardens of the Earl of Exeter. One of his ancestors had lived there, and had married a daughter of the house from whom he (the Earl) was descended. The primate had reminded him that he could not live very long. Well, he hoped to be able to meet them once again, but, should it be ordered otherwise, they might rest assured that he would not cease as long as he lived to pray for their welfare, temporal and eternal.

THE EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

of this popular nobleman occurred on April 28th this year, and the various societies with which he is connected resolved to make the occasion an opportunity to express publicly their sense of his long and valuable services. The Lord Mayor of London offered the use of the Guildhall for a public meeting. The vast hall itself was thronged as it had seldom been before, the gathering including members of all the principal religious denominations and of various shades of politics. In the Guildhall yard there were donkeys attached to barrows and decorated with small flowers, in testimony of the manner in which his Lordship has long befriended persons of the costermonger class, while inside, the scene on the platform was enlivened by flowers, brought to the hall in baskets by girls in neat-looking dresses, who represented the Watercress and Flower Girls' Mission. The spacious platform was crowded with friends of the noble Earl, and the chair was occupied by the Lord Mayor, who was attended by the sword and mace-bearer, and wore his civic robe as chief magistrate of the city. Congratulatory letters were read from the Duke of Abercorn, Lord Northbrook, Lord Hatherley, the Duke of Grafton, Lord Leigh, the Marquis of Ailsa, Lord Elcho, Mr. Gladstone, and others. A letter was also received from Mr. Alfred Tennyson, the Poet Laureate, who said: "Allow me to assure you in plain prose how cordially I join with those who honor the Earl of Shaftesbury as the friend of the poor, and who wish him many years of health and strength in which to continue his good works, and to invite others to follow his example."

The following resolution, moved by the Earl of Aberdeen, and seconded by the Right Hon. W. E. Forster, M.P., Mr. Gladstone's Secretary for Ireland, was carried by acclamation:

That this meeting desires to record its grateful recognition of the distinguished services rendered by the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury, K.G., who for more than half a century has unceasingly and ungrudgingly devoted his time and talents in ameliorating and improving the condition of the laboring classes, and for his philanthropic efforts in bringing under humane and Christian influences the neglected and depraved juvenile population of London and other large cities, by which, in London alone, at least 300,000 of the youth of both sexes have been rescued from the ranks of the criminal and dangerous classes, and made good and useful citizens, loyal and faithful subjects of Her Majesty.

Mr. Williams, one of the leaders of the Ragged School movement, read an address to Lord Shaftesbury on behalf of the Committee of the Ragged School Union, which concluded with the following words:

With a view to commemorate your lordship's birthday, as well as the signal services which you have rendered to the Ragged-school movement, the children and teachers, aided by a few friends of the Ragged-schools of London, have asked the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor to present to you on their behalf, and with their affectionate regards, the accompanying portrait, which has been subscribed and paid for in sums ranging from the smallest current coin of the realm—viz., from one farthing—to one guinea. The blessing of the Lord be upon you. We bless you in the name of the Lord.

At the word "portrait" a full-length likeness of Lord Shaftesbury, in the form of an oil painting, which hung on the wall at the side of the platform, was unveiled.

An address, beautifully illuminated, and from a graphic or pictorial point of view a decided work of art, inclosed in a handsome morocco case, with chasings of silver dipped in gold, was also presented by the same Union.

Lord Shaftesbury was visibly affected by the congratulations he received, but evinced in his speech the consciousness of the source of the influence for which his friends were so thankful. The noble Lord concluded as follows: "You have heard the address and the speeches; you have heard the touching things which have been said in my honor. let me remark, with the deepest sincerity—ascribe it not, I beseech you, to cant and hypocrisy—that if those statements are partially true, it must be because power has been given to me from above. It was not in me to do these things. 'What hast thou that thou didst not receive?' I now come before you—I cannot conceal it—I come before you with three score and twenty years upon my shoulders. I am what the Hebrews would call 'a son of eighty years.' Yet, with all that, by God's mercy I am still 'able to come in and go out before my people.' How long that may last is another thing. While it remains, may I continue to enjoy your esteem, and to have a lively and grateful recollection of a day the events of which I could never have believed unless they had been assured to me as they have been this afternoon by your actual presence and your personal testimony."

Dr. Robert Moffat, the Venerable Missionary who labored for many years with blessed result in Africa, was entertained by the Lord Mayor of London at the Mansion House on Saturday, May 7th, who gave a banquet in his honor. Many distinguished guests were present by invitation of the Lord Mayor. Dr. Moffat was the father-in-law of Dr. Livingstone, the African explorer.

TWELFTH ANNIVERSARY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Delivered February 20th, 1881.*

IT is astonishing what a favorite scriptural number twelve is. Twelve tribes of Israel. For the ancient tabernacle, twelve chargers, twelve silver bowls, twelve bullocks, twelve lambs of the first year. Further on, twelve stones taken from the depths of the Jordan to build a memorial; twelve lions on the steps of Solomon's throne; twelve legions of angels; twelve apostles, twelve baskets of fragments, twelve stars for the woman's crown in Revelations, twelve gates of Heaven, with twelve pearls and twelve foundations, with the names of the twelve apostles, and twelve manner of fruits. In my text the tired and thirsty Israelites came upon an oasis in the desert, and lo! there are just twelve wells of clear, bright, heaven-brewed, God-given water.

Preaching my twelfth anniversary sermon as your pastor, I find myself surrounded by into which this host of God's Israel on the march shall dip their canteens and bring up refreshment, and instruction, and gratitude, and congratulation. We have come this morning to Elim, where there are twelve wells of water.

If you ask me in hard figures what has been the growth and what is now the condition of this church, I tell you that our financial income for the last year was $29,946.65. The current expenses of the year were $25,966.97. Net gain applied to the sinking fund, $3979.68. Our contributions to the poor, $629.65. Sabbath-school collections for the last three months, $779.02. Sabbath-school membership, 1405. As to the enlargement of our church membership, we have to report that we have received during the past year 640 on profession of faith and 61 from sister churches, making 701 new members. Received during my ministry of twelve years, 2793 members. Subtracting the deaths and dismissions, our present membership is 2296. So that, you see, all these wells of blessing are full of gracious reminiscence.

I had thought that in this my anniversary sermon I would make mention of the obstacles which have been thrown in our way by the fire of 1872, and by the hotter fires of persecution and abuse; but this morning the greatness of God's kindness obliterates everything, and if I wanted to build a groan, I do not know in what forest I would hew the timber, or from what quarry I could dig the foundation-stone, or who would construct for me an organ with a tremolo for the only stop; and so this morning I occupy my time in building one great massive, high, deep, broad, heaven-piercing hallelujah, standing within which there is an organ of twelve stops, run at full diapason with the waters from the twelve wells of salvation. May God help me while I preach, and keep me from the orthodox but unpardonable sin of pulpit dulness.

I have thought this morning it might be well for me to give some of the characteristics of

A BROOKLYN PASTORATE.

And, in the first place, I remark that a Brooklyn pastorate is always a difficult pastorate. No city under the sun has a grander array of pulpit talent than Brooklyn. The Methodists, the Baptists, the Congregationalists, the Episcopalians, all the denominations send their brightest lights here. He who stands in any pulpit in Brooklyn, preaching, may know that he stands within five minutes' walk of sermons which a Saurin, and a Bourdaloue, and a John M. Mason, and a George Whitefield would not be ashamed of. No city under the sun where a poor sermon is such a drug in the market.

For thirty years Brooklyn has been surcharged with homiletics, an electricity of eloquence that struck every time it flashed, from the old pulpits which quaked with the power of a Bethune, and a Cox, and a Spencer, and a Spear, and a Vinton, and a Farley, to the present pulpits with Buckley, and Gallaher, and Cuyler, and Scudder, and Pentecost, and Ludlow, and Ingersoll, and Hall, and Vandeveer, and Beecher, and Storrs, and Van Dyke! So that during all the time there has been something to appeal to every man's taste, and to gratify every man's preference.

Now, let me say to all ministers of the Gospel who are ambitious for a Brooklyn pulpit, that it is always a difficult pastorate. If a man shall come and stand before any audience in almost any church in Brooklyn, he will find before him men who have heard the mightiest themes discussed in the mightiest way. You will have before you, if you fail in an argument, fifty logicians in a fidget. If you make a slip in the use of a commercial figure of speech, there will be five hundred merchants who will notice it. If you throw out an anchor or furl a sail in the wrong way, there will be ship captains right off who will wonder if you are as ignorant of theology as you are of navigation! So it will be a place of hard study. If you are going to maintain yourself, you will find a Brooklyn pastorate a difficult pastorate.

I remark still further, a Brooklyn pastorate is always

A CONSPICUOUS PASTORATE.

The printing-press of the country has no greater force than that on the sea-coast. Every pulpit word, good or bad, wise or ignorant, kind or mean, is watched. The reportorial corps of these cities is an organized army. Many of them have collegiate education and large culture, and they are able to weigh oration, or address, or sermon. If you say a silly thing you will never hear the end of it, and if you say a wise thing it will go into perpetual multiplication. There is no need of decrying that fact. Men whose influence has been built by the printing-press spend the rest of their lives in denouncing newspapers. The newspaper is the pulpit on the wing. More preaching done on Monday than on Sunday. The omnivorous, all-eyed printing-press is ever vigilant.

Besides that, a Brooklyn pastorate is always conspicuous in the fact that everybody comes here. Brooklyn is New York in its better mood! Strangers have not seen New York until they have seen Brooklyn. The East River is the chasm in which our merchants drop their cares and their anxieties and their business troubles, and by the time they have greeted their families in the home circle they have forgotten all about Wall Street and Broadway and the shambles. If they commit business sins in New York during the day, they come over to Brooklyn to repent of them!

Everybody comes here. Stand at the ferry gates on Sabbath morning at 10 o'clock, or Sabbath evening at 7 o'clock, and you see North, South, East, West—Europe, Asia, Africa, New Zealand, Australia—coming to Brooklyn to spend the Sabbath, in the persons of their representatives. Some of them fresh from the sea. They have just landed, and they want to seek the house of God publicly to thank the Lord for their deliverance from cyclone and the fog-banks off Newfoundland. Every song sung, every prayer offered, every sermon preached in New York and Brooklyn, and all along this sea-coast, in some shape goes all round the world. A Brooklyn pastorate is at the greatest altitude of conspicuity.

Again I remark, that a Brooklyn pastorate is CHARACTERIZED BY BREVITY.

I bethink myself of ten or twelve excellent ministers of the Gospel who have for a score of years administered in Brooklyn; but the vast majority of the two hundred and seventy-five evangelical churches in Brooklyn have changed sentinels again and again, and my brief residence in Brooklyn of twelve years has made a comparatively long pastorate.

Sometimes the pastorate has been brief for one reason, and sometimes for another reason. Sometimes the ministers of the Gospel have been too good for this world, and Heaven has transplanted them. Sometimes they changed places by the decree of their denomination. Sometimes they came with great blare of trumpets, proposing to carry everything before them, and got extinguished before they were distinguished! Some got preached out in two or three years, and told the people all they knew! Some with holy speed did in a short time work which it takes us a great many years to do.

Whether for good or bad reasons, a Brooklyn pastorate is characterized by brevity; not much of the old plan by which a minister of the Gospel baptized an infant, then received him into the church, after he had become an adult married him, baptized his children, married them, and lived on long enough to bury almost everybody but himself. Glorious old pastorates they were. Some of us remember them—Doctor Spring, Peter Labaugh, Dominie Zabriskie, Daniel Waldo, Abram Halsey. When the snow melted from their foreheads it revealed the flowers of an unfading coronal. Pastorates of thirty, forty, fifty, fifty-five years' continuance. Some of them had to be helped into the pulpit or into the carriage, they were so old and decrepid; but when the Lord's chariots halted one day in front of the old parsonage they stepped in vigorous as an athlete, and as we saw the wheels of fire whirling through the gates of the sunset we all cried out, "My father, my father! the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof."

I remark again: a Brooklyn pastorate is characterized by

ITS HAPPINESS.

No city under the sun where people take such good care of their ministers. In proportion as the world outside may curse, a congregation stands close up by the man whom they believe in. Brooklyn society has for its foundation two elements—the Puritanic which always means a quiet Sabbath; and the Hollandish, which means a worshipful people. On the top of this an admixture of all nationalities—the brawny Scot, the solid English, the vivacious Irish, the polite French, the philosophic German; and, in all this intermingling of population, the universal dominant theory that a man can do as he pleases, provided he doesn't disturb anybody else.

A delightful climate. While it is hard on weak throats, for the most of us it is bracing. Not an atmosphere made up of the discharged gases of chemical factories, or the miasms of swamps, but coming panting right off three thousand miles of Atlantic Ocean before anybody else has had a chance to breathe it! More pure, elevated men in our offices of trust than any city I know of. All through the city a society of kind, genial, generous, sympathetic people. How they fly to you when you are in trouble. How they watch over you when you are sick. How tender they are with you when you have buried your dead. Brooklyn is a good place to live in, a good place to die in, a good place to be buried in, a good place from which to rise in the beautiful resurrection.

In such a city I have been permitted to have twelve years' pastorate. At we are as a church in a better condition of prosperity, financially and spiritually, than ever before. Our history has been so peculiar, I have sometimes felt that I was almost indispensable to this church; but that time has passed, and now I can think of a great number of men any one of whom would be adapted to this pastorate. Do not let any of us be egotistic, and feel that the church depends on any of us. If there came an epidemic and swept off the pastor, and all the elders and all the trustees, this church would not stop a half-second in its upward progress. God started it, and He is giving it momentum. It will stand long after we are all gone, doing its work for God and eternity.

* Dr. Talmage did not occupy his pulpit at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday; we therefore avail ourselves of the opportunity to publish the interesting discourse he delivered on the occasion of the twelfth anniversary of his settlement in Brooklyn.—ED.

For the first time in our history we are in smooth waters, and the same skill that could run the machinery of a village church of two hundred people could conduct this. Through the generosity of our friends here and our friends everywhere, we have got beyond all financial perturbation. While we shall always want your earnest and hearty financial support, the dollar question will never be an irritation or an exhaustion. We are all ready to move on in solid phalanx for the comfort and salvation of a struggling world.

Standing amid these twelve wells of water, these twelve wells of reminiscence, as I stir the water I find some of your tears. During these twelve years how many heart-breaks, how many financial losses, how many bereavements! Hardly a family of the church that has not been struck with sorrow. But God has sustained you in the past, and He will sustain you in the future. I exhort you to be of good cheer, O thou of the broken heart. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

While I stir the waters of this last, and the twelfth well, I find some of my own tears. At half past ten o'clock on the night of January 6th I got a new baptism. I hope it will not make me less cheerful and buoyant; but I am quite certain it will make me more sympathetic. We have, I believe, to the Tabernacle, and I wish over every door, and on the posts of each of the eighteen doors, there might be written one word, "Sympathy."

EIGHTEEN DOORS

SYMPATHY FOR ALL THE YOUNG.

We must crowd them in here by thousands, and propose a radiant Gospel that they will take on the spot. We must make this place so attractive for the young that a young man will come here on Sabbath morning, put down his hat, brush his hair back from the forehead, unbutton his overcoat, and look around wondering if he has not by mistake got into heaven. He will see in the faces of the old people, not the gloom which some people take for religion, but the sunshine of celestial peace, and he will say, "Why, I wonder if that isn't the same peace that shone on the face of my father and mother when they lay dying?" And then there will come a dampness in his eyes through which he can hardly see, and he will close his eyes to imprison the emotion; but the hot tear will break through the fringes of eyelashes and drop upon the coat-sleeve. He will put his head on the back of the pew in front and sob, "Lord God of the old people, help me!" We ought to lay a plot here for the religious capture of all the young people of Brooklyn.

Yes, sympathy for the old. They have their aches and pains and distresses. They cannot hear or walk or see as well as they used to. We must be reverential in their presence. On dark days we must help them through the aisle, and help them find the place in the hymn-book. Some Sabbath morning we shall miss them from their place, and we shall say, "Where is Father So-and-so to-day?" and the answer will be, "What, haven't you heard? The King's wagons have taken Jacob up to the palace where his Joseph is yet alive."

Sympathy for business men. Twelve years of commercial life in New York and Brooklyn is enough to tear one's nerves to pieces. We want to make our Sabbath service here a rescue for all these martyrs of traffic, a foretaste of that land where they have no rents to pay, and there are no business rivalries, and where riches, instead of taking wings to fly away, brood over other riches.

SYMPATHY FOR THE FALLEN,

remembering that they ought to be pitied as much as a man run over with a rail train. The fact is that, in the temptations and misfortunes of life, they get run over. You and I, in the same circumstances, would have done as badly; we should have done worse, perhaps. If you and I had the same evil surroundings, and the same evil parentage that they had, and the same native-born proclivities to evil that they had, you and I should have been in the penitentiary, or outcasts of society. "No," says some self-righteous man, "I couldn't have been overthrown in that way." You old hypocrite, you would have been the first to fall!

We want in this church to have sympathy for the worst man, remembering he is a brother; sympathy for the worst woman, remembering she is a sister. If that is not the Gospel, I do not know what the Gospel is. Ah! yes; sympathy for all the troubled; for the orphans in their exposure; for widowhood with its weak arm fighting for bread; for the household which erst resounded with merry voices and pattering feet, now awfully still—broad-winged sympathy, like the feathers of the Almighty—warm-blooded sympathy, everlasting sympathy—sympathy which shows itself in the grasp of the hand, in the glittering tear of the eye, in the consoling word of the mouth—sympathy of blankets for the cold, of bread for the hungry, of medicine for the sick, of rescue for the lost. Sympathy!

Let it thrill in every sermon. Let it tremble in every song. Let it gleam in every tear and in every light. Sympathy! Men and women are sighing for sympathy, groaning for sympathy, dying for sympathy, tumbling off into uncleanliness and crime and perdition for lack of sympathy. May God give it to us! Fill all this pulpit with it, from step to step. Let the sweep of the gallery suggest its encircling arm. Fill all the house with it, from door to door, and from floor to ceiling, until there is no more room for it, and it shall overflow into the street, and passer-by on foot and in carriage shall feel the throb of its magnificent benediction. Let that be our new departure as a church. Let that be my new departure as a pastor. Sympathy!

GRATITUDE TO GOD

demands that this morning I mention the fact that during all these twelve years I have not missed a single service through sickness. When I entered the ministry I was so delicate I did not think I would preach three months; but preaching has agreed with me, and I think the healthiest thing in all the earth is the religion of Jesus Christ. In the twenty-four years I have tried to serve God in the Gospel ministry I have never had one sick day. Bless the Lord, O my soul! What ingrates we are in regard to our health.

I must in gratitude to God also mention the multitudes to whom I have been permitted to preach. It is simply miraculous, the attendance morning by morning, night by night, and year by year, and long after I have got to be an old story. I know some people are dainty and exclusive in their tastes. As for myself, I like a big crowd! I would like to see an audience large enough to scare me! If this Gospel is good, the more that get it the better.

Many have received the Gospel here, but others have rejected it. Now, I tell you what I am going to do with some of my dearest friends who have hitherto rejected this Gospel. You are not afraid of me, and I am not afraid of you, and some day, O brother, I will clasp your hands together, and I will turn your face the other way, and I will take hold of your shoulders, and while you are helpless in my grasp I will give you one headlong push into the kingdom of God. Christ says we must compel you to come in; I will compel you to come in. Can I consent to anything else with these men, who are as dear to me as my own soul? I will compel you to come in.

I am solemnized this morning with the fact that I have come to the midnoon of my professional life. I am in

THE MERIDIAN OF WORK.

I am not young. I am not old. Profiting by the mistakes of the past, I must do better work for you and better work for God. Lest I might, through some sudden illness or casualty, be snatched away before I have the opportunity of doing so, I take this occasion to declare my love for you as a people. My heart burns toward you with affection seven times heated. It is different work if a pastor is placed in a church already built up, and he is surrounded by established circumstances. There are not twenty people in this church that have not been brought into the church through my ministry. You are my family. I feel as much at home here as I do in my residence on Oxford Street. You are my family—my father, my mother, my sister, my son, my daughter. You are my joy and crown, the subject of my prayers.

Your present and everlasting welfare is the object of my ambition. I have no worldly ambition. I had once. I have not now. I know the world about as well as any one knows it. I have heard the handclapping of its applause, and I have heard the hiss of its opposition, and I declare to you that the former is not especially to be sought for, nor is the latter to be feared. The world has given me about all the comfort and prosperity it can give a man, and I have no worldly ambition I have an all-consuming ambition to make full proof of my ministry, to serve you in the Gospel, to get to heaven myself, and to take a great crowd with me. Upon your table, and cradle, and arm-chair, and pillow, and lounge, and nursery, and drawing-room, and kitchen, may the blessing of the Almighty God come down.

I throw my soul into this pastoral salutation. Standing here amid these twelve wells of reminiscence, I want to vow with you, God helping, that after our work is done we will go in through one of the twelve gates, and stand within the twelve foundations, amid the twelve apostles and twelve patriarchs, under the tree of life which bears twelve manner of fruits. In this high noon of the Sabbath day, let us pledge new fidelity while the city clock strikes twelve—twelve for the hours of the passing day, twelve for the meridian of my professional life, twelve for the years of our pleasant acquaintanceship. May the Lord God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and Joshua, and Paul, and John Knox, be our God for ever!

"DIED POOR."

"IT was a sad funeral to me," said the speaker, "the saddest I have attended for many years." "That of Edmonson?" "Yes." "How did he die?" "Poor—poor as poverty. His life was one long struggle with the world, and at every disadvantage. Fortune mocked him all the while with golden promises that were destined never to know fulfilment." "Yet he was patient and enduring," remarked one of the company. "Patient as a Christian, enduring as a martyr," was answered. "Poor man! He was worthy of a better fate. He ought to have succeeded, for he deserved success." "Did he not succeed?" questioned one who had spoken of his patience and endurance. "No, sir. He died poor, just as I have stated. Nothing that he put his hand to ever succeeded. A strange fatality seemed to attend every enterprise."

"I was with him in his last moments," said the other, "and thought he died rich." "No, he has left nothing behind," was replied. "The heirs will have no concern as to the administration of his estate." "He left a good name," said one, "and that is something." "And a legacy of noble deeds that were done in the name of humanity," remarked another. "And precious examples," said a third. "Lessons of patience in suffering, of hope in adversity, of heavenly confidence when no sunbeams fell upon his bewildered path," was the testimony of another. "And high truths, manly courage, and heroic fortitude."

"Then he died rich," was the emphatic declaration. "Richer than the millionaire who went to his long home on the same day, miserable in all but gold. A sad funeral did you say? No, it was a triumphal procession! Not the burial of a human clod, but the ceremonies attendant on the translation of an angel. Did not succeed? Why, his whole life was a series of successes. In every conflict he came off the victor, and now the victor's crown is on his brow.

"No, no; he did not die poor, but rich—rich in neighborly love, and rich in celestial affections. And his heirs have an interest in the administration of his affairs. A large property has been left, and let them see to it that they do not lose precious things through false estimates and ignorant depreciation. There are higher things to gain in this world than wealth that perishes. He dies rich who can take his treasure with him to the new land where he is to abide for ever; and he who has to leave all behind on which he placed his affections dies poor indeed."

JAMES GRAHAM'S BUSH LIFE IN AUSTRALIA.

A Day's Hunt and its Incidents—A Magnificent Cave—Universal Dread of Incensed Deity—Nature or God?—How the Kangaroos were Caught.

THE miall and boree trees (male and female of the same species) grow plentifully around here. The miall yields most beautifully grained ornamental wood, which, from its scent, is called violet wood. The boree grows something like a weeping-willow, and about the same size. Horses browse on it, and grow fat. Cattle also, eat it. In spring it is covered with strings of blossoms like the laburnum, only greener; now with ripened peas.

One of these trees grew in our way on the creek. It was then covered thickly with hundreds of birds—ground pigeons, wogna-wognas, and cockatoos. "A capital shot," said Ash. "Now, Dick, you throw your wammerah and raise them, and we'll shoot when they rise." We were full a hundred yards from the tree. Dick threw his best throw; and, as the birds rose, we fired four barrels and brought down some sixteen; some three of them were the victims of the wammerah. Dick made it ricochet among pigeons feeding on the ground, and bagged twice as many.

When we came to the creek, a water wagtail was perched on a high reed, and Dick said—"I b'lieve mine spear him." Ash thought it impossible. I was more credulous. Dick drew out his woomerah, or throwing-stick, a straight stick, about four feet long, with a socket turned up on the end to hold the knob of the light spear. It acts as a second arm or sling. Dick adjusted a slender grass-tree spear, and slung it about thirty yards off, and pierced the bird through. Ash declared there was not a rifleman among her Majesty's sharp-shooters could beat that, or bring down a bird like that with so little noise or loss of ammunition.

Ash had never been in "the caves," though I had more than once; so I prepared myself to enjoy duck-shooting at the entrance, and his admiration through the interior. These caves are found on the Baroo Narang creek, between the Macquarie and Turon Rivers. The creek is dry in summer, except a chain of "billibongs," as the natives say, or water-holes, as we phrase them. In winter it overflows from the rains, and the surplus waters of the rivers. The surrounding formation here is limestone.

The first we enter is the "Dome Cave." The entrance is an arch of not more than twelve feet high, but the first stalactite apartment is a dome between forty to sixty feet high and ninety wide. There is a little lake of pure water in it, which is fed by a stream purling under the stalagmite floor, and afterwards issuing forth into the creek. As we entered, a cloud of wild ducks flew out, or rather would have done so, but that we met them with four barrels, and brought down over two dozen. It was a murderous volley on closed ranks, and the column doubled back on itself into the dome. While we charged our pieces some attempted to escape, and Dick, with his ten-foot long currywang spear, skewered a couple more. We felt remorse at wasting life needlessly, and did not fire again. Poor Colwah groaned under his burden of game, with which we determined to send him back to the huts by-and-by, as a pleasant variety to salt pork and mutton.

The cave delighted Ash. Apartment opened on apartment till it grew dark, and we had to strike lights; and then the first gleam showed stalactite columns in various fantastic forms. Here they represented an open work of columns, like the screen that shuts off the choir in a cathedral. There, a pulpit and preacher in flowing white surplice; there, a silent congregation all in stone and in the dark, except for this gleam. Ash made some severe remarks on petrified ecclesiastics, and sermons in the dark, and hearers with hearts of stone. These remarks I attribute to his education in the dissecting-room, where he had so much to do with bodies, and so little with souls. But I tell him he ought to have observed that there was a great difference between the body when the soul was in it and when it was gone from it—"returned to God who gave it."

But surely these wondrous caves, and the minds that admire them, must have had a great and good Author—blessed be His name! Dick does not admire the dark parts of the cave; and Colwah won't enter. The latter trembles lest, "Devil-Devil jump up;" and the dashing Dick has a dread of the same, but he imitates our assurance, and fears our laugh. When we, to hear the echoes, fired a blank shot, and sang or shouted, Colwah fled to safe distance. How is it that all men naturally dread darkness and invisible power? Does it not at once prove man's spiritual nature, and that his spirit is consciously guilty and fallen?

The dreaded anger of an offended Deity is common among all tribes of the most degraded peoples of the earth. How imperative the duty, how honorable the privilege, to carry to them the glad news of Christ's Gospel, which tells of a sacrifice which has been offered and accepted for the guilty, and that pardon, and peace, and purity, come through believing in Jesus, "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world!"

In going along the creek to the Bridge Cave we shot several brace of teal. In this same place ere now, concealed in the sheep hurdles, I have brought down four brace at a crack. There are black ducks that build in the long reeds, and in stumps of trees all along; and but for the snakes one might get nests' full of eggs. There also abounds here a kind of duck that builds and hatches in high trees in the wood. The mystery is how they get their young to the water so many score of feet below them.

Dick and Colwah affirm that they have seen them carry the downy ducklings, one by one, in their bills to the creek, "where their pickaninnies learn to swim." "Well done, again, old mother nature," cries my friend. I take the liberty to quote a book which says—"In wisdom hast Thou made them all." Surely, surely, it is reasonable and happy to believe in the care of Him, "Whose tender mercies are over all His works;" and who has not forgotten the commissariat of these poor, ignorant children of His—these blacks. The young duck, leaving its dark life in the shell, bursts into a wider one, through sun and sky, and forest and pool. May not some such thing await Colwah and Dick and ourselves! "Perhaps so," says Ash. Again I quote the book—"Jesus Christ hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel."

The Bridge Cave is under a natural bridge thrown across the hills where they narrow up, at the end of the creek. Over this bridge, of some hundred feet in extent, there is a cattle track; and, strange to say, there rises on it a beautiful spring of water. It soaks down from the hills, till it forms a reservoir in the hard limestone, that only lets as much into the cave as forms the fantastic stalactites below.

We entered and explored the varied and spacious apartments—a palatial suite of rooms built in silence and long ago. Just as we were half-way through, and saw daylight on the other side, Dick's eye caught some object. He beckoned us to be silent and stand still. He crawled over as silently as a snake, and then laughed aloud and called us. There was a large wombat innocently taken in a simple stone trap set for it by the natives. It is the Australian representative of our badger; a harmless creature, plump and fat, and delicious as sucking-pig, when stewed in its skin by the natives. I had seen native hunters smoke it out of its burrow, and, waiting for it at the exit, drop their tomahawk into its skull, and with a turn pull it out. Here was one alive, and which Ash wished to keep alive, to see, as he said, how it would behave in civilized life. Otherwise Dick would have had it for lunch.

We seated ourselves on the bank of the creek, and boiled a pot of tea—blacks and whites equally enjoying lunch after a ramble of some five hours.

Dick's restless eye was ever ranging on all sides even while smoking and chaffing. Suddenly he laid down his pipe and started, beckoning silence. "What's up now with Dick?" said Ash, while the black crossed the creek and crept under the dry bank down to the edge of a water-hole. Suddenly he rose and cast his spear at something in the shadow of a wrinkle in the bank. It rolled over, and Dick appeared not to mind it. Colwah was busy with the wombat, and we ran to Dick. He again beckoned silence; and fetching two stones, he put one of them on the mouth of a hole some eight yards up the bank, and another on a smaller hole within three feet of the water. Dick had transfixed a water-mole, or duck-billed platypus, just as it slept with its nose tucked in and its body rolled up in a coil as soft as a lady's muff.

By this time it was near noon; and Dick, looking up anxiously at the sun, said, "Ha, ha, euroka jump up high, high, above waddy; poor fellow, kangaroo, all tumble down, I b'lieve." If I must interpret for Dick, he said, "The sun has mounted to noon, over the tree; the kangaroos are all killed by this time, I guess." We walked as fast as the broiling heat would permit; and, after six miles over brown detached tufts of kangaroo grass, we came to an outlying waterhole, which was surrounded with great gum-trees. From behind these old Eagle-Hawk and about fifteen black fellows made their appearance. He looked daggers at Dick for being late; but some conciliatory grunts about "boombilly" (tobacco), made all right. They had been delaying the hunt for us. The gins were in a knoll of trees a short way off.

Old Hawk ordered one little fellow, with an enormous mouth full of white teeth, to ascend a tree and look out for the game. He did so; and descried a troop of kangaroos in the distance. These they had tracked from the water, and they were now within reach. Then all advanced to the trees nearest the open feeding-grounds of the game. The gins were beckoned in; and they advanced with long thick branches of gum and mimosa which they gave to the men. They threw out detachments to surround the kangaroos, and each man advanced behind his screen of branches at measured pace. We got up on a tree to see the battue.

All is exciting, but quiet as midnight. Now the kangaroos take long leisurely hops among the tufted grass, and appear disposed to play as they feed. Anon they alternately stoop to eat and rise to look around, the black fellows watching the opportunity to advance, silent as shadows, sometimes standing still as if growing from the ground, but again crawling on. As they receded from us, they became almost undistinguishable from the branches they carried. At last the circle drew close, and the kangaroos rose on end to gaze. Just then the branches were thrown aside; and the blacks rose shouting and yelling, and hurling their spears at the affrighted game, which ran together, and against each other in consternation, one after another falling by the spears. Some eight fell, and as many more probably escaped.

Ash remarked as we were perched on the tree, that as the kangaroos fell within the coil of the blacks, so the blacks are falling within the coils of the civilization they do not comprehend, and that makes them its prey. And I, in answer, said it seemed to me to be the way in which poor human souls were watched by the Satanic hunter, who sought to take them as his prey. But just as I spoke a great flying doe bounded towards us, with the head of her young one protruding from her pouch. I shouted and levelled my gun. She stood still, stupidly gazing round. "Save the young one for me," said Ash. Had he not spoken, pity would have spared the great innocent-eyed maternal creature. The next instant her neck was perforated by a ball I had dropped down the right barrel. We descended and secured the young one; and, really the mother's dying look made me feel for a moment as guilty as if I had killed a fellow-creature. Dick that evening sent the kid, or fawn shall I call it? home, and added it to Ash's menagerie—the finest of all his pets.

Eagle-Hawk now walked about giving orders for dinner. The gins with their connois—long flat sticks which they always carry for digging roots, etc.—dug out four grave-like holes, in the bottom of which they laid flat stones, filled up with dry wood, which they burned till the pit was hot as an oven. Then they cleared it out, and putting in the carcases for dinner, covered them up with hot stones and embers to stew. Roots were dug, grubs taken from the roots of a gum tree, calabashes were filled with water, and by-and-by, the stewed kangaroos produced. And, oh! ye admirers of venison, what a meal was there!

Old Hawk set his young men to amuse us after dinner. One pelted another with stones, which, with his little shield, he turned off in a style that would have saved his head to Goliath. You would hear them crack, and bang, and whirr. Sometimes the assailant would aim low, and then the defendant would leap, perhaps, five feet high. Songs, and dances, and football followed.

THE COMING PRINCE OR ANTICHRIST.

By R. Anderson, LL.D., Barrister-at-Law.

Greatness of the Coming Prince—The Head of a New Principality—The Patron of Religion—Its Relentless and Cruel Persecutor.

A SILENT heaven marks this age of grace. Whirlwind, and earthquake, and fire may awe, yet, as in the days of the old Hebrew prophet,* God is not in these, but in the "still small voice" which tells of mercy and seeks to win lost men from the power of darkness to Himself. But the very silence which betokens that the throne of God is now a throne of grace is appealed to as the crowning proof that God is but a myth; and the coarse blasphemer's favorite trick is to challenge the Almighty to declare Himself by some signal act of judgment. In days to come the impious challenge will be taken up by Satan, and death shall seize on men who refuse to bow before the image of the beast.

The Antichrist will be more than a profane and brutal persecutor like Antiochus Epiphanes and some of the emperors of pagan Rome; more than a vulgar impostor like Barcochab. Miracles alone can silence the scepticism of apostates, and in the exercise of all the dragon's delegated power, the beast will command the homage of a world that has rejected grace. "All that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life" (Revelation 13 : 8). If it were possible, the very elect would be deceived by his mighty "signs and wonders" (Matthew 24 : 24); but faith, divinely given, is a sure, as it is the only, safeguard against credulity and superstition.

But this is what he will become in the zenith of his career. In his origin he is described as a "little horn" (Daniel 7 : 8), like Alexander of Macedon, the king of a petty kingdom. Possibly he will be the head of some new principality to arise in the final dismemberment of Turkey; it may be on the banks of the Euphrates or perhaps upon the Asian shore of the Ægean Sea. The name of Babylon is strangely connected with events to come, and Pergamus, so long the home of serpent-worship in its vilest forms, is the only place on earth which Scripture has identified with Satan's throne (Revelation 2 : 13).

Of the

which must precede his advent, the most conspicuous are the restoration of the Jews to Palestine, and the predicted division of the Roman earth. The former of these events has already been considered in a previous chapter, and as regards the latter there is but little to be said. The attempt to enumerate the ten kingdoms of the future would involve a profitless inquiry. History repeats itself; and if there be any element of periodicity in the political diseases by which nations are afflicted, Europe will inevitably pass through another crisis such as that which darkened the last decade of the eighteenth century. And should another revolution produce another Napoleon, it is impossible to foretell how far kingdoms may become consolidated, and boundaries may be changed.

Moreover, in forecasting the fulfilment of these prophecies, we are dealing with events which, while they may occur within the lifetime of living men, may yet be delayed for centuries. Our part is not to prophesy, but only to interpret; and we may well rest content with the certainty that when the Apocalyptic visions are in fact fulfilled, their fulfilment will be clear, not merely to minds educated in mysticism, but to all who are capable of observing public facts.

Through the gradual unfolding, it may be, of influences even now in operation—or far more probably as the outcome of some great European crisis in the future—this confederation of nations shall be developed, and thus the stage will be prepared on which shall appear that awful being, the great leader of men in the eventful days which are to close the era of Gentile supremacy.

If we are to understand aright the predicted course of the Antichrist's career, certain points connected with it must be clearly kept in view. The first is that up to a certain epoch he will be, notwithstanding his pre-eminence, no more than human. And here we must judge of the future by the past. At two-and-twenty years of age, Alexander crossed the Hellespont the prince of a petty Grecian state. Four years later he had founded an empire and given a new direction to the history of the world.

In the career of Napoleon Bonaparte modern history affords a parallel still more striking and complete. When, now just a hundred years ago, he entered the French military school at Brienne, he was an unknown lad, without even the advantages which rank and wealth afford. So utterly obscure was his position that, not only did he owe his admission to the school to the influence of the Governor of Corsica, but calumny has found it possible to use that trifling act of friendly patronage to the disparagement of his mother's name. If, then, such a man, by the gigantic force of his personal qualities, combined with the accident of favoring circumstances, could attain the place which history has assigned to him, the fact affords the fullest answer to every objection which can be urged against the credibility of the predicted career of the man of prophecy.

Nor will it avail to urge that the last fifty years have so developed the mental activity of civilized races, and have produced such a spirit of independence, that the suggestion of a career like Napoleon's being repeated in days to come involves an anachronism. "In proportion as the general standard of mental cultivation is raised, and man made equal with man, the ordinary power of genius is diminished, but its extraordinary power is increased, its reach deepened, its hold rendered more firm. As men become familiar with the achievements and the exercise of talent, they learn to despise and disregard its daily examples, and to be more independent of mere men of ability; but they only become more completely in the power of gigantic intellect, and the slaves of pre-eminent and unapproachable talent."

By the sheer force of transcendent genius the man of prophecy will gain a place of undisputed pre-eminence in the world; but if the facts of his after career are to be understood, considerations of a wholly different kind must be taken into account.

A STRANGE CRISIS

marks his course. At first the patron of religion, a true "eldest son of the church," he becomes a relentless and profane persecutor. At first no more than a king of men, commanding the allegiance of the Roman earth, he afterwards claims to be divine, and demands the worship of Christendom.

And we have seen how this extraordinary change in his career takes place at that epoch of tremendous import in the history of the future, the beginning of the 1260 days of the latter half of Daniel's seventieth week. Then it is that that mysterious event takes place, described as "war in heaven" between the archangel and the dragon. As the result of that amazing struggle, Satan and his angels are "cast out into the earth," and the seer bewails mankind, because the devil is come down into their midst, "having great wrath because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (Revelation 12 : 7–12).

The next feature in the vision is the rise of the ten-horned beast (Revelation 13 : 1). This is not the event described in the seventh of Daniel. The beast, doubtless, is the same both in Daniel and the Apocalypse, representing the last great empire upon earth; but in the Apocalypse it appears at a later stage of its development. Three periods of its history are marked in Daniel. In the first it has ten horns. In the second it has eleven, for the little horn comes up among the ten. In the third it has but eight, for the eleventh has grown in power, and three of the ten have been torn away by it. Up to this point Daniel's vision represents the beast merely as "the fourth kingdom upon earth," the Roman empire as revived in future times, and here the vision turns away from the history of the beast to describe the action of the little horn as a blasphemer and persecutor.

It is at this epoch that the thirteenth chapter of Revelation opens. The first three stages of the history of the empire are past, and a fourth has been developed. It is no longer a confederacy of nations bound together by treaty with a Napoleon rising up in the midst of them and struggling for supremacy; but who are the lieutenants of one great kaiser, a man whose transcendent greatness has secured to him an undisputed preeminence. And this is the man whom the dragon will single out to administer his awful power on earth in days to come. And from the hour in which he sells himself to Satan he will be so energized by Satan that "all power and signs and lying wonders" shall characterize his after course.

There is a danger lest, in dwelling on these visions as though they were enigmas to be solved, we should forget how appalling are the events of which they speak, and how tremendous the forces which will be in exercise at the time of their accomplishment. During this age of grace Satan's power on earth is so restrained that men forget his very existence. This, indeed, will be the secret of his future triumphs. And yet how unspeakably terrible must be the dragon's power, witness the temptation of our Lord! It is written, "The devil, taking Him up into an high mountain, showed unto Him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time; and the devil said unto Him, All this power will I give Thee, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will give it. If Thou, therefore, wilt worship me, all shall be Thine" (Luke 4 : 5–7).

It is this same awful being who shall give to the beast his throne, his power, and great authority (Revelation 13 : 2), all that Christ refused in the days of His humiliation. The mind that has realized this stupendous fact will not be slow to accept what follows: "And power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations; and all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb" (Revelation 13 : 7, 8).

Of the events which afterwards must follow upon earth, it behoves us to speak with deep solemnity and studied reserve. The phenomenon of sudden and absolute darkness is inconceivably terrible, even when eagerly looked for with full intelligence of the causes which produce it. How unspeakable, then would be its awfulness if unexpected, unaccounted for, and prolonged, it may be, for days together! And such shall be the sign which Holy Writ declares shall mark the advent of earth's last great woe. The signs and wonders of Satanic power shall still command the homage of mankind, while the thunders of a heaven no longer silent will break forth upon the apostate race.

Then will be the time of "the seven last plagues," wherein "is filled up the wrath of God"—the time when "the vials of the wrath of God" shall be poured out upon the earth. And if in this day of grace the heights and depths of God's long-suffering mercy transcend all human thoughts, His wrath will be no less Divine. "The day of vengeance of our God," "the great and terrible day of the Lord." Such are the names Divinely given to describe that time of unexampled horror.

* The Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still small voice (1 Kings 19 : 11, 12).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Adjournment of the Senate Without day, on Friday, May 20th, closes the extraordinary session in which it was convened on March 4th. The session has deserved its name, in its literal as well as in its technical sense. There has been nothing extraordinary in the quantity or quality of the work done, for that might have been easily performed in as many days as the Senate has sat weeks; but in the spirit developed, and the influence exerted on political parties, and in the complications it has evolved, the session has been extraordinary indeed.

It opened with a struggle over organization. Three vacant seats on the Republican side gave the Democrats temporary control. The Republicans filibustered till those seats were filled. Then by the aid of Mahone and the Vice-President's casting vote the committees were organized in the Republican interest. Then came the struggle over the officers, and the country had before it the spectacle of men holding the high and honorable position of Senators of the United States wrangling over such questions as whether the doorkeeper should be a Republican or a Democrat. After those questions were—not settled, but laid aside for future contest, the President's nominations were considered. Then came the split in the Republican party, the victory of the Administration, and the resignation of the two New York Senators, with all that that act portends. Such is a brief summary of the work of a session which will probably be potent in its results on the future of the country.

The Nomination of State Senator W. H. Robertson to be Collector of the Port of New York was confirmed, no one objecting, on May 18th. This result must be considered an Administration triumph, and it has been received by the anti-Stalwarts with unbounded enthusiasm. There is no question about the victory, but there are doubts in many minds whether it is not one of those victories which are more disastrous to the conqueror than a defeat would have been.

The question on the surface must be decided in favor of the Administration. The President has the constitutional right to nominate the Collector, and the Senate has an equally valid right to reject the nomination, if it is one not fit to be made. That is the superficial view. But as we call to mind the history of the past five years, other considerations arise. The President knew the history of the Hayes administration. He was perfectly well aware of the antagonism which counteracted good intentions through four years. He also had excellent reasons for being aware of the schism in his party. He was at Chicago, and saw the compact phalanx of 306 third-termers well organized and firm to the last. In the campaign last fall he saw the Stalwarts, disappointed as they were, fighting shoulder to shoulder with his followers in his cause, and he is seated in the Presidential chair mainly through their exertions. Having won the victory he throws down the gauge of battle to the Stalwarts by the Robertson nomination. The act was a bold one, but from a party point of view was it a wise or prudent one? That question the future will decide.

It may be supposed that the President desires the continued supremacy of his party, and he may believe that in antagonizing the Stalwarts and eliminating them, he purifies the party; and he may believe too that the anti-Stalwart wing is strong enough to dispense with Stalwart support. That, too, remains to be proved. It is certain that the schism in the party has been widened by the President's policy, and if the country witnesses during his term a perpetual conflict between the President and his nominal supporters, in which he is obliged to dicker for opposition aid, the prospect of another four years of Republican rule is of the haziest kind. These and like considerations suggest the doubt whether the bold attitude of the President is a wise one in the interest of his party.

The Resignation of Senator Conkling, Followed by that of Senator Platt, is still the principal topic in political circles. Neither in the verbal utterances of the Senators nor in the letter they sent to Governor Cornell does there appear adequate reason for the act. It is worthy of remark too that the resignations have been generally condemned even by Stalwart journals. Though the fact has not been authoritatively stated, it is believed that both Senators are candidates for re-election. In that case the resignations are more of an enigma than ever. The indorsement of the Albany legislators is not an indorsement by the people, which alone could materially strengthen the position of the Senators if they were re-elected. The public is reluctant to come to the conclusion that the resignations were caused by personal pique and childish pettishness arising from defeat; yet it would appear that if they believed that the President's policy was injurious to the country, the more manly course would have been to stay in the Senate, where alone they had power to oppose it. The other conclusion, that the Senators being unable from conscientious motives to support the President, preferred private life to a public career of opposition, is negatived if they seek re-election. There is undoubtedly some motive actuating the Senators not yet publicly declared, but the many guesses hazarded at that motive are not worth discussing, though some of them are plausible if they are not honorable.

A Disastrous Fire Occurred at Nashville, Tenn., on May 17th. It commenced in a wholesale paint and oil store. It spread rapidly from one building to another, and thirty-four large warehouses were destroyed before it was finally overcome. Happily no lives were lost, though several severe injuries are reported. The total loss of property, it is feared, will aggregate over half a million dollars.

The Death of the Railroad Millionaire, Col. Thomas A. Scott, occurred at Woodburn, Delaware Co., Pa., on Saturday, May 21st. He had been for some time in ill health, but being anxious to attend the wedding of the son of his old friend, Rev. Theodore Cuyler, D.D., of Brooklyn, he was driven to the house, but on his arrival was found to have had a paralytic stroke on the way. He was taken home again, and physicians summoned. He revived under treatment, but last week he suffered a relapse, from which he never rallied. He was born in 1824. His first connection with railroads was when he became the clerk of his brother-in-law, Major James Patton, who was collector of tolls at Columbia, where considerable freight was transferred from the State canals to the Philadelphia and Columbia Railroad. His salary at that time was fifty dollars a month on which sum he married. At the time of his death his fortune was estimated at not less than thirteen million dollars. There is no doubt that his life was materially shortened by his ceaseless activity.

He took an active part in the war, and for some time held the post of Assistant Secretary of War. A thrilling incident is related of him in connection with the battle of Antietam. When the Union soldiers were in great need of ammunition, Colonel Scott took personal charge of a train of cars filled with powder, and hurried it forward to its destination at such a high rate of speed that, to the great alarm of the trainmen, the boxes on the wheels began to smoke. Despite the danger of an explosion, Colonel Scott would not allow the train to be stopped, and to the amazement of the spectators and to the great relief of the men on the train as well as to the soldiers, the cars, with burning wheels, came rolling into the town in time and in safety.

Colonel Scott's liberality throughout his life was shown in many ways. Among his latest gifts were $50,000 to the Jefferson Medical College, $50,000 to the University of Pennsylvania, $50,000 to the Washington and Lee University of Virginia, $30,000 to the Orthopedic Hospital, and $20,000 to the Children's Department of the Episcopal Hospital.

A Quarter of a Million Copies of the Revised Version of the New Testament were sold by one publishing house in New York before three o'clock on Friday afternoon. Allowing for all the influence feelings of curiosity may have exercised, the fact is very suggestive as indicating the intense interest taken in the book. Popular as many books have been, no such record of one day's sales has ever been made in this city before. Colonel Ingersoll and many other infidels have disparaged the New Testament, and have publicly asserted in this city that its influence and authority were rapidly losing their hold on the people; but these unprecedented sales do not confirm that assertion.

The examination of the changes made by the revisers has elicited many widely differing opinions. It is, however, a significant fact that they all turn upon considerations of a literary character. The ordeal through which the book has passed, the searching examination of authorities, and of every passage, has not resulted in undermining the foundation of a single doctrine of Christianity. It is clear that God has exercised His watchful care over His word, and while it has been assailed on all hands through the centuries, it has never been destroyed or corrupted. The revisers compared it with a copy written in the fourth century, and with others of the fifth and sixth centuries, yet they have found no material error, and have not had cause to make a single correction affecting our faith in, or reverence for, the inspired word as we have had it in bygone days.

The Coffee House Movement, which has Become very popular in England, is about to be made the subject of experiment in New York. Dr. J. G. Holland, J. N. Stearns, Charles Watrous and others have decided to organize the Metropolitan Coffee House Company with a capital of $100,000. It is proposed by the company to buy suitable property near Grand Street, and put up a four or five-story building. On the ground floor there will be a spacious coffee-room, where the best quality of food and non-intoxicating drinks will be sold at low prices. With this will be connected a well supplied reading-room, and smoking-room. There will be on the second floor a hall capable of seating a large audience, where lectures, concerts, and exhibitions will be given.

A Way of Brightening the Lot of the Sick and suffering that is within the reach of most people is suggested by a letter sent to the Tribune. It refers to the files of newspapers, magazines, etc., that accumulate in many homes. One who has witnessed the beneficial result of the plan advises the owners to tie the magazines and picture papers and the books that are no longer wanted up into neat bundles and send them to the hospitals and other charitable institutions for the poor inmates. The stories, sketches, and illustrations will be new to most of them, and will help lighten many a weary hour. More especially is the plan commendable in the case of religious periodicals and books. Men stretched on a bed of suffering, some of them face to face with death, might by means of a passage read there be by the blessing of God moved to apply to the Great Physician of souls for spiritual healing.

The Labors of the Society for the Prevention of Crime were described on Friday last at the annual meeting of the Society in New York. The following extract from the speech of Dr. Howard Crosby, the President, shows how comprehensive as well as how beneficial its operations are: "It attacks gambling and policy shops, houses of prostitution, pool selling, concert saloons, abuse of wives by drunken husbands, and of children by drunken parents, physicians for dishonorable practices, pool playing for drinks, policemen for cruelty and misconduct, housekeepers who withhold servants' wages, lottery places and liquor dealers—in short, wherever crime is generated the agents of the society are found." The most important work performed by the society is in initiating and prosecuting proceedings against those who break the laws of the State in reference to what are called places of amusement. That the society has been successful in spite of all the difficulties placed in its way is evident from the fact that the fines paid by the parties prosecuted by the Society last year amounted to $1468.

Mr. J. M. Sutherland, the Converted Actor, who as "Senator Bob Hart" was a well-known favorite of theatre-goers, has been appointed assistant pastor of the Laight Street Baptist Church, New York. The Rev. Halsey W. Knapp, pastor of the church, finds the work has become so arduous of late that the society has determined that it is too great for one man to perform. Mr. Knapp was prostrated during the last winter by a serious attack of sickness, and during his indisposition Mr. Sutherland frequently officiated at the evening services. Evidence of the genuineness of his conversion has been given by church labors of nearly two years, and the congregation of the Laight Street church selected him as the most available man to further the efforts of their pastor. Mr. Sutherland will devote special attention to Gospel Temperance work, in which department he has been the means of doing much good in several localities.

A Woman was Married and Murdered on the same day at Guttenburg, a village near New York, recently. Her remains were found horribly mutilated in a lonely wood on May 14th. An investigation resulted in the discovery that a minister living in the neighborhood had performed the marriage ceremony between her and a man who, it is alleged, brutally murdered her a few hours afterward. An arrest has been made, based on strong circumstantial evidence, and it has also been elicited that both the supposed murderer and his victim were already married, and their respective partners alive at the time this fatal ceremony was performed. We send missionaries to heathen lands, and it is our duty and privilege to do so, but this horrible crime shows what sore need there is for earnest Christian work at our own doors. Disregard for the laws of God characterizes large masses of our population, and though brutality like this is exceptional, the sins men call venial will, unless pardoned through the blood of Christ, issue in endless punishment (Psa. 52 : 5).

A Deplorable Mistake, the Consequences of which are not yet fully ascertained, has been made in the case of an emigrant. About the middle of April two Polish women, name Stanislawa Trudnezka and Agnes Yallas, arrived at this port on board the steamer Victoria as steerage immigrant passengers. When the doctor boarded the ship at Quarantine it was found that the two women, among others, were suffering with smallpox. They were sent to the fever hospital on the Quarantine Island, each patient being ticketed with an order giving her name and the disease with which she was suffering, according to the usual practice. On the 29th of April the Board of Health received a notification that the woman Trudnezka had died, but that the other patient was recovering. Meanwhile Mrs. Trudnezka's husband had been anxiously expecting his wife's arrival. He reached here only to learn that she was dead and buried.

It has now been discovered that a serious mistake has been made. By some accident the orders given to the patients when they were sent to the hospital were exchanged, and as neither woman could speak English the error was not discovered, so that it was not Mrs. Trudnezka who died, but her companion. When released Mrs. Trudnezka appeared at Castle Garden in search of her husband, but he disappeared immediately after being informed of his wife's death and no trace of him can be found. As he was last seen in a despondent frame of mind the fear has been expressed that he made away with himself. We can only hope that the husband did not commit the rash act, but the number of people is increasing, who, when trouble comes upon them are ready to commit the crime of suicide. They are destitute of faith in God or they would show a different spirit (Job 2 : 9 and 10).

Lights that Guide are Advertised by a Hotel proprietor as an advantage guests enjoy at his house. They are red lights, and are placed in the halls. Firemen say that the greatest difficulty guests experience in a burning building is in finding their way to the stairways. The passages are frequently long and tortuous, and even one quite familiar with their windings is apt to go wrong under the influence of any sudden excitement. For this reason the hotel keeper has placed red globes on the gas fixtures in the halls that lead to the staircase, and white lights in those that do not. A stranger can open his door at any hour of the night, and, by running along the row of red lights, reach the stairs in the shortest possible time. The idea is valuable, and might, in the event of a fire occurring in the night, be the means of saving lives, if those in peril understood the significance of the two colors. The impenitent sinner, we are taught, is in danger of everlasting fire, but an escape is provided in that Light "which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (John 1 : 9).

The Narrow Escape of a Party of Tourists from a terrible death is recorded by a San Francisco journal. They engaged a private conveyance at Napa to carry them to the Geysers. The vehicle was not provided with a brake to carry it safely down the steep grades on the way, but the driver said he used a rope, which answered better than an ordinary brake. When within about a mile of the Geysers, with the valley a thousand feet below them at one side of the road, one of the horses suddenly shied and pushed his mate off the road, when both shot down the hill like an arrow, carrying with them the vehicle and its affrighted occupants. A large oak tree happened to be directly in the line of descent, and against this, horses, vehicle, and passengers were projected, the pole striking the trunk and breaking into fragments. Strange to say, neither the driver nor any member of the party was injured. There are many travellers on life's road who have commenced the downward path of a sinful life, trusting for their safety to some equally inefficient safeguard. Those who escape eternal disaster in such cases are often such as are arrested in their mad career by some obstacle that the world erroneously calls a misfortune, but which is really a voice from God calling them to repent and turn to Him.

A Meeting Between two Brothers who had never seen each other before occurred at Cleveland, O., recently. Sixteen years ago a man named Dinkle left his home in Germany and came to America. He settled in Southern Illinois, began farming and butchering. He prospered, married, and has ever since been doing a thriving business. A few weeks after leaving his home in the old country a brother was ushered into the world, who was given the name of Andrew. The latter, a few months ago, expressed a desire to come to this country and labor with his elder brother for a home and a fortune. Arrangements were made for his coming, and the Illinois brother agreed to meet him on a given day at Cleveland. As they had never seen each other, as may be supposed, the brothers were anxious how they were to know each other? The elder one took a stand near the platform of the cars, and as the passengers stepped down, his eyes riveted themselves upon the countenance of each passer by. At length the brother approached, a momentary pause ensued, and then a swift glance of recognition and a hearty embrace testified to the family likeness. A day will come when Christians will similarly recognize each other by the family likeness the sons of God will bear to each other and to their Saviour (1 John 3 : 2).

THE second verse contains my actual text. It is the argument by which faith is led to look for the blessings promised in the third verse.

It is habitual with some persons to spy out the dark side of every question or fact; they fix their eyes upon the "waste places," and they study them till they know every ruin, and are familiar with the dragons and the owls. They sigh most dolorously that the former times were better than these, and that we have fallen upon most degenerate days. They speak of "shooting Niagara," and of all sorts of frightful things. I am afraid that a measure of this tendency to write bitter things dwells in almost all of us at this present season, for certain discouraging facts which cannot be ignored are pressing heavily upon men's spirits. The habit of looking continually towards the wilderness is injurious because it greatly discourages; and any thing that discourages an earnest worker is a serious leakage for his strength.

It is therefore a dreadful thing when the Christian Church begins to be discouraged, and means must be used to stay the evil. Such means we would use this day. Lo, we lift the standard of the divine promise. "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people," sounds out like a silver trumpet in the front of the host. Be encouraged, O ye of the faint heart; there are no more difficulties now than there were of old. The cause is no more in jeopardy than it was a thousand years ago. The result, the end, the consummation of all things is absolutely certain; it is in His hand who cannot fail, therefore be of good courage, and in waiting upon the Lord renew your strength.

O ye whose eyes are quick to discover evil, there are other sights in the world besides waste places and deserts, and hence my text hath near to it twice over the exhortation, "Look"—Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn;" "Look unto Abraham your father." Why should your eyes forever ache over desolations? Probably you have seen as much in the wilderness as you are ever likely to see there. It does not take long to discover all the treasures and comforts of the burning sand; you have probably discovered them all by now. Gaze no longer at the thirsty land; turn your eye where the finger of the Lord points by His word.

I. We shall first

that we may see in him the original of God's ancient people, the foundation stone, as it were, of the dispensation by which God blessed the former ages. In Judah was God known, His name was great in Israel: let us look to the rock whence Judah and Israel were hewn.

We observe, first, that the founder of God's first people was called out of a heathen family. "Your fathers," says Joshua, "dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, even Terah, the father of Abraham, and they served other gods." Abraham, the founder of the great system in which God was pleased to reveal Himself for so long a time, and to whose seed the oracles of God were committed, was a dweller in Ur of the Chaldees, the city of the moon-god. We cannot tell to what extent he was actually engrossed in the superstition of his fathers, but it is certain that the family was years afterward tainted with idolatry; for in Jacob's day the teraph was still venerated, and Rachel stole her father's images.

Abraham, therefore, was called out from the place of his birth, and from the household to which he belonged, that in a separated condition, as a worshipper of the one God, he might keep the truth alive in the world. Recollect, then, that the first man from whom sprang that wondrous nation which God hath not even yet cast away, was originally himself an idolater, and had to be called out of his sinful state by effectual grace. Why, then, might not the Lord, if the cause of truth were this day reduced to its utmost extremity, again raise up a church out of one man? If an almost universal apostasy should hide the divine light, could He not kindle a torch among the heathen, and by its light illuminate the earth again?

Is anything too hard for the Lord? Is He not able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham? As to anything like discouragement, it ought to vanish at the thought that not only out of your Sunday-schools, your colleges, and your pulpits can God raise up leaders for His Church, but He can find them in the very centre of heathenism. Where Satan's seat is, even there can the Lord raise up advocates for His cause.

"Ah," you say, "but men are not called now, as Abraham was, by miraculous calls from Heaven." I reply—The statement may be true; but God's visible means of calling men are now so many that there can seldom be need of miracle. The Lord can by His Spirit make one of the millions of Bibles scattered over the world to be as powerful a means of call as though He had sent an angel from Heaven; yea, a solitary leaf of a printed tract, if wafted by the wind, or carried by the wave, may be borne where God shall bless it to the calling forth of a champion ordained of old to do great exploits. Where ordinary means are so plentiful wisdom resorts not to signs and wonders. The same Spirit who called Abraham by a supernatural voice can call others by the word of truth.

Instead of regarding it as a prodigy that a man should be unexpectedly called out from among the heathen, I look for it, and shall not be surprised to hear that in the remoter provinces of China, or in the centre of Thibet, or in the recesses of Africa men have been raised up to found churches for our Lord Jesus. "Omnipotence hath servants everywhere." Let us never dream that the God of Abraham is short of means for calling out chosen men to build up His Church.

"Ah," say you, "but Abraham was naturally a man of noble mould. Where do you find such a princely spirit as his?" I answer, Who made him? He that made him can make another like him. There is a grace of God which goes before what we are accustomed to call saving grace; I mean a grace of God, which in the creating of the nature, makes it a fit instrument for the grace which is after to be bestowed. The Lord can just as soon make a man after the type of Abraham as after any other type; and doubtless He has such in store even now, to whom His call will yet come. We may expect to see men of strong convictions converted into believers who "stagger not at the promise through unbelief." From among priests and pagans we may hope that the Lord will raise up pillars for His Church. Is not this hope encouraged in your breasts as you "Look unto Abraham your father, and unto Sarah that bare you?"

Look again and observe that Abraham was

BUT ONE MAN.

Do not be startled at the sound which seems to have such terrors for certain brethren. I have heard the cant of those who object to a "one-man ministry," a ministry to which all the while they usually submit in their own meetings; but to my ear there is music, and not terror, in the term "a one-man ministry." I bless God that all my hope of salvation hangs upon the divine ministry of the One Man. Is not Christ, as the servant of God, the very pattern of all ministries which are of God?

We are this day, not one man, but many, and we all desire to live for the glory of God, and for the spread of His Gospel; but if our hosts were so diminished that we could be numbered by a little child upon his fingers, still there would be no excuse for dismay, for the God of Abraham still liveth, even He who created a people to His praise by one man, of whom He says, "I called him alone, and blessed him, and increased him."

Think, my brethren, of the power for good or evil which may be enshrined in a single human life. What mischievous results may come of one man! One sinner destroyeth much good, and if there were but one person left who had knowledge of the ways of vice and the words of blasphemy that one man would suffice to infect the race with his abominations. If evil be so mighty, is not good with God in it quite as powerful. We may rightly measure quantities in reference to many things, but with others it is absurd.

It would be ridiculous to measure the power of fire by the quantity which burns on your hearth. Give us fit materials and a single match, and you shall see what fire can do. If ordinary fire, that may so readily be extinguished, is thus powerful, who shall venture to measure the power of the fire from Heaven, which neither men nor devils can quench, the fire which fell at Pentecost, and burns among us still. Ye carry fire, ye servants of God; ye work with a Heaven-sent force of boundless energy. Why, therefore, should you despair? If all the lights in the world were put out except a solitary lamp, there is enough fire in one wick to kindle all the lamps in the universe. What inch of ground remains for despair to stand upon?

Furthermore, we are bound to notice that this one man was a lone man. He had not only to do the work of God, but he had nobody to help him. "I called him alone." True, he was attended by Lot—a poor miserable lot he was, costing his noble uncle more trouble than he ever brought him profit. How little did he maintain or adorn the righteousness which, nevertheless, had saved him: true type of many a feeble professor in these days. Abraham was not backed by any society when he crossed the Euphrates and afterward traversed the desert to sojourn in Canaan as a pilgrim and a stranger. If ever man was fairly cut adrift and cast upon the Lord it was the great father of the faithful. He certainly found no patronage in his onward course save the all-sufficient patronage of the Lord his God.

And now, my brother, if in the town or district where you live you seem to lose all your helpers; if they die one by one, and it seems as if nobody would be left to you; if even the prayer-meeting fails for want of earnest, pleading men, still persevere, for it is the lone man that God will bless. "He setteth the solitary in families."

Once more, I cannot help asking your attention to the fact that Abraham was not only a man called from heathendom, one man, and a lone man; but he was yet further. The blessing was, "Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee," but the manifest fulfilment of it was not by and by. As we have already seen he must come away from his kindred and his father's house, and he must dwell in Palestine till the promised seed was born. But how long he waited for the expected heir! Twenty, yes, almost thirty years rolled away, and the man Abraham was ninety years old and nine. He is very old; and yet he is to be blessed with a son. He must number the full tale of a hundred years before Isaac can be born. This promised child was to be according to promise, and therefore it could not be born till nature was recognized as spent.

The believing pair had waited on till in an evil hour Sarah suggested a desperate attempt to fulfil the promise, in which she still firmly believed. That artifice broke down; it was a part of the divine plan that it should do so. The covenant promise was not to the seed after the flesh. When that scheme had been set aside, the Lord in His own time fulfilled His word.

Joy! joy! in the house of Abraham and Sarah. What a feast there was that Isaac was born, filling the house with laughter. But he must die! "Get thee up," said God, "and take thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and offer him for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." The grand old man will do it. He will get up early in the morning, and the father and the son will journey together silently; for the aged heart is too full to talk. He believes God, and is sure that even if he should actually slay his son at God's command the promise would somehow be kept. Abraham could not tell how, but it was no business of his to tell how; he was fully persuaded that what God had promised He was able to perform.

Now, if in all these trials Abraham was yet blessed, and God's purposes were accomplished in him, can we not believe that the same God can work by us also, despite our downcastings and humiliations? When we are utterly broken and crushed, may not the Lord's strength be made perfect in our weakness? Let us not question the promise because of our personal deadness and inability, but believe God without wavering, for He hath said, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

Now, brothers and sisters, here is the sum and substance of this first head of my discourse; in looking to the rock whence we are hewn, we have to see the Lord working the greatest results from apparently inadequate causes. This teaches us to means, possibilities, and probabilities, for we have to deal with God, with whom all things are possible. Almighty God can assuredly do whatever He says He will do. Who is to hinder Him? Let the voice ring out over all the earth, and let it be heard in hell itself, Who shall stay the arm of God when He wills to achieve a thing? He fears no opposition, and He needs no help.

If you desire an illustration, look at our own body of Christians. History has hitherto been written by our enemies, who never would have kept a single fact about us upon the record if they could have helped it, and yet it leaks out every now and then that certain poor people called Anabaptists were brought up for condemnation. From the days of Henry II. to those of Elizabeth we hear of certain unhappy heretics who were hated of all men for the truth's sake which was in them. We read of poor men and women with their garments cut short, turned out into the fields to perish in the cold, and anon of others who were burnt at Newington for the crime of Anabaptism. Yet here we are, blessed and multiplied; and Newington sees other scenes from Sabbath to Sabbath.

As I think of your numbers and efforts, I can only say in wonder, What a growth! As I think of the multitudes of our brethren in America, I may well say, What hath God wrought? Our history forbids discouragement. Never cause more hopeless once; none more hopeful to-day! It matters little what may yet happen, the cause is safe. What if all our Baptist organizations expire? What if but one man should be left faithful to the old banner, our Captain would yet triumph gloriously, for He saveth not by many nor by few. Though all else faileth, the Lord shall reign for ever and ever. This is the lesson which, I pray, we may all of us learn, and then, by faith, go forth to act upon it.

II. With great brevity I shall dwell for a moment upon the second point, namely, of this chosen man. The text says, "Look unto Abraham your father, and unto Sarah that bare you," and it must mean, Consider him, and see what he was, that you may learn from him. You perceive at once that his grand characteristic was his faith. In this faith many other most brilliant qualities are comprehended, but his faith lay at the bottom of all. Here is his epitaph: "Abraham believed God." That was a mainspring of all his acts, the glory of his life. "Abraham believed God." The men that God will work by, whatever else they have not, must have faith in God. Though it is to be desired that the believer should have every mental and moral qualification, yet it is astounding how, if there be real faith, a multitude of imperfections are swallowed up, and the man is still a power.

The like faith also dwelt in the breast of Sarah; and as we are told in the text to look to Sarah as well as Abraham, let us not fail to do so. The faith of Sarah was not little when she left home with her husband; forsaking her kith and kin from love to God, and to Him whom she called "lord." Nor did the trial of her faith end with the moving; she had to take up with tent-life and all its inconveniences. It is the woman that knows the discomfort of domestic life under such circumstances. How readily she entertained her husband's guests. Though they might drop in at most unseasonable hours, or call her to bake bread in the heat of the day, she was glad to welcome strangers, for like her husband she was given to hospitality.

I saw you smile, dear friends, when I mentioned domestic matters; but to me it is the solemnity of faith that men and women can not only pray and sing, but can put up with household discomforts out of obedience to God. Certain people look upon faith as a fine, airy, sentimental thing with which to roam among the stars, anticipate millenniums, and enjoy yourself in lofty contemplation. I believe far more in a faith which, whether it eats or drinks, does all to the glory of God; faith which like Sarah dwells in the tent and works there; faith which is cheerful over a scanty meal and drives away the fear of want; faith which can come down in life from the mansion to the cottage, if providence so decrees.

Christian men and Christian women, mark well this fact—that the characteristic of the person whom God will bless is that he believes and acts upon his belief. Without faith it is impossible to please God; but

THE MAN OF FAITH IS GOD'S MAN.

And why is this? Because faith is the only faculty of our spirit which can grasp God's ideal. The greatest man, without faith, cannot tread in the divine footsteps. The ideas of God are as high above us as the heavens are above the earth; and therefore it is not by any fancied vastness of our feeble minds that we can ever rise into fellowship with God. Love alone can rival it, for it embraces the infinite God Himself. With the far-reaching plans and promises of God, faith alone is fit to deal; carnal reason is out of the lists.

Faith, too, has a great power of reception, and therein lies much of her adaptation to the divine purpose. Self-confidence, courage, resolution, cool reasoning, whatever else they are good at, are bad at humbly receiving. Those vessels which are full already are of no use as receivers; but faith presents her emptiness to God, and opens her mouth that God may fill it. Mercy needs not a jewel, but a casket into which to put her gems, and faith is exactly what she wants.

Then, again, faith always uses the strength that God gives her. Pride would vapor with it, and doubt would evaporate it; but faith is practical, and economically uses the talent intrusted to her. Faith has already spent all her own strength, and she so yearns to achieve her purposes that she uses all the power that God will lend her. Faith eats her manna, and leaves not a morsel for worms to breed in.

Faith, too, can wait the Lord's time and place. When faith is weak men are in a dreadful hurry; but strong faith does not judge the Lord to be slack concerning His promise. As God achieves His purpose with infinite leisure, He loves a faith that is patient, and looks not for its reward this day or the next. "He that believeth shall not make haste;" that is to say, he shall not be ashamed or confounded by present trials so as to rush upon unbelieving actions. Faith leaves times and seasons with God, to whom they belong.

God loveth faith, and blesseth it too, because it giveth Him all the glory. The true believer will not allow a trace of self-glory to linger on his hands. "Where is boasting then?" was a question once asked in the house of faith, and the searchers examined every nook and corner in every chamber to find it, but they found it not. Then they said to faith, "Where is boasting?" She answered, "I shut him out." "It is excluded," shut out, and the door fastened in its face. You do not believe God if you boast of what you are doing; least of all do you believe if you pride yourself in your faith, for faith is not mistrustful of her God, but of herself.

Faith looks to God to keep her alive as well as to fulfil the promise that He has made to her. This, then, is the kind of faith which was characteristic of Abraham, and the question is, Have we got it? Have we so much of it that God can largely bless us? The comfort is that, if we have it not, the author of faith can give it to us, and if we have it in scant measure He can increase our faith.

Is not this a solid reason why you and I should take heart? You who do not believe that missions will succeed; you who readily become discouraged and discourage others; I beg you go home and seek more faith. We cannot go down to the battle with such soldiers as you; you do but incumber the host. The men that lapped are the only ones that Gideon will take to war. Send the fearful ones to the rear, and let them take care of the baggage, so that when the battle is won they may have a share of the spoil, according to David's law. For actual service and warfare we must have men of faith.

Cromwell found that when his men came dressed in all sorts of suits and colors they were apt to injure one another in the melee, and so he put them all in uniform. The uniform of the Prince Immanuel is faith; no man may call himself a soldier of the cross who hath it not. This is the victory which overcometh the world, even your faith. Brother ministers, let us take heed lest we be found qualified for our ministry in all respects except this one. You have learning, eloquence, industry, honesty, but do you so believe in God as to expect His word to act divinely on men's hearts. Do you preach believingly? Do you pray believingly? I leave the question with you.

III. I have shown you, dear friends, that God effected His purpose, and raised up a chosen nation out of one man, whose chief characteristic was his faith; and now I want you to notice to that one man. I dwelt upon that while reading the chapter (Romans 4). There is a relation between us and Abraham even as Paul assures us in the epistle to the Galatians, "Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham." Something, surely, is expected of the children of such a man as Abraham. O for shame, thou unbelieving one! Is Abraham thy father? Art thou one of the faithful seed? Great mountains are often succeeded by low valleys. Perhaps that is the case with you; but it should not be so. The natural seed were cut off because they had no faith; let not those who are grafted in, think to do without it. It is by faith that you are a son at all. You disprove your pedigree if you tolerate unbelief.

Brethren, because we are the seed of Abraham, the apostle declares that the blessing of Abraham has come upon us also. I pray that all the friends and laborers in our Missionary Society may grasp the blessing of Abraham. What is it? It is a covenant favor that belongs to all who are the servants of God by faith. Here is the substance of it: "Surely blessing, I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thee," That is the grand old covenant promise, and it belongs to the Church.

Note that the blessing is attended with multiplying. Some friends are afraid of statistics which represent the increase of the churches; I am far more afraid of those statistics which will show that we do not increase as we could wish. The blessing of the Church is the increase of the Church. The two go together: "Blessing, I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thee." How much are Christians to be multiplied in the world? At the present moment we do not seem to be increasing as fast as the population. I am afraid that the number of converted persons relatively to the population is scarcely as great as it was thirty years ago; we long to be multiplied at a very different rate from this—and we shall be if we have faith in our God.

IV. Last of all, consider for a minute before Abraham's God. Do not let anything that I have said about Abraham for a moment take your mind off from the Lord Himself, because the pith of it all lies here—"I called him alone." Look to Abraham, but only as to the rock from which the Lord quarried His people;" your main thought must be Jehovah Himself. "I, I called him alone, and blessed him." "I the Lord do all these things." Look unto the everlasting God, who doeth great wonders, and stay yourselves upon Him.

Let us joyfully recollect that the Lord our God has not changed, nay, not in one jot or tittle. He is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." There is so far a change in the revelation of Him, that it is brighter now in the person of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, than it could have been through seer and vision; but that should be a motive for increased faith. "His arm is not shortened that He cannot save, neither is His ear heavy that He cannot hear." This God of Abraham is still almighty, and still in the midst of the covenanted ones. If the ages that have passed over His awful brow could wrinkle it and His strength could decay, then might we also decline in our confidence; but it is not so. He fainteth not, neither is weary.

Our behavior toward Him, therefore, should resemble that of Abraham; and especially, representing, as we do many of us, the churches of Jesus Christ as ministers or deacons, we must never dishonor the Lord by unbelief. Doubt everything but God. Let God be true and every man a liar. This the everlasting decree which none can change—Christ must reign; he shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied; the kings of the earth must bow before Him. Do not doubt it, for God hath sworn by His own life that all flesh shall see His glory. Here is the grand argument for strong faith.

Notice next that the covenant of God has not changed. God hath not recalled His words, nor taken a pen and struck out His promises from the record. Read the covenant words, and write them upon the door-posts of your mission house, "In blessing, I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." This is the covenant with the one spiritual seed of Abraham; this is the marrow of it, and it has never been revoked.

But there is this also to be added, that this work which we desire the Lord to do is in some respects even less than that which he has done with Abraham. What ask we? Not that He should begin with one man to build up a nation, or create a church? No, but that Zion being builded, He should comfort her, and cause her waste places to rejoice. The field is the world, and the seed is ready for the sowing. The Gospel is in the hands of those who have the best means of spreading it. Everything is ready for its ultimate triumph. The train is laid; we only need the heavenly fire to touch it, and the deed is accomplished. O that the work of the Lord may be speedily done; that the Lord may carry on His work of righteousness and make a short work in the earth.

Brethren, it remains for me only to add

THIS PRACTICAL WORD.

Let us throw ourselves more and more upon our God. If you have any work appointed you of the Lord, and it is within the compass of your strength, shame upon you if you do not perform it at once; but if it be beyond you, herein will God be glorified if you do it by His power. If there remaineth no might, wit, or wisdom in you, if you are deeply conscious of your weakness, you are by this experience made the more fit to be used of the Lord, for when we are weak then are we strong. If you have confidence in God, all things are possible to Him that believeth.

Oh, when will the Church cast herself upon her God as men throw themselves into the stream when they mean to swim? They seek no longer for foothold, their foot leaves the spot whereon it rested, and they throw themselves trustfully upon the wave. The everlasting ocean of love and power is ready to upbear us; we shall swim gallantly to shore if we will but trust this blessed sea of love.

The faith of Abraham is a faith that saith to wayfaring men, "Turn in, and I will get you a little water and wash your feet." It is a practical, active, living, week-day, every-day faith. I will speak very broadly and plainly, and say we need a bread-and-cheese faith—that is to say, a faith which believes that God who feeds the ravens will send us our daily bread; a faith which believes that the Heavenly Father who clothes the lilies will much more clothe His children; the faith that can believe God about the things that are actually around it, and that does not live in the region of fiction. See how God blessed Abraham with flocks and herds, and everything temporal as well as spiritual, because he walked in reference to these things along the line of faith; gave Lot his choice of pasturage, refused the offer of the king of Sodom, and resolutely paid the children of Heth the full price for the cave and the field. If we walk by faith in business life, God may not in every case bless us with abundance of temporal mercies, but assuredly we shall be blessed. He may send us adversity and poverty, but in these things faith is more than conqueror, glorying in tribulations also.

In the Lord's work of evangelizing the world you must have a downright, practical faith; not a faith that will sing when the organ begins to play, and then be so busy fumbling the hymn paper as to forget the collection: not the faith of those who boast of Carey, and Marshman, and Knibb, but whose own names never appear in the subscription list for a single shilling; not a faith which sings,

"Fly abroad thou mighty Gospel," but never lends a bit of down to make a feather for its wings.

Let us hear the Scripture, as it says,

"HEARKEN!"

If you have faith as a grain of mustard seed, "Hearken!" for you may hear the Sabbath bells ringing in the everlasting peace, and angel songs welcoming the reign of grace over all nations.

Then look! till you see the temples of false gods crumbling into dust. See how the shrines are tottering, and the idols breaking as though smitten with a rod of iron. Mohammed's crescent wanes, never to wax again; and she, of the Seven Hills, is hated of the kings, and they burn her with fire. "Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations He hath made in the earth!" Thy right hand, O Lord, hath dashed in pieces the enemy. They fall! They fall! They are as the slain. The day breaketh, and the shadows flee away.

O ye watchers that look for the dawning, fall not asleep through sorrowful weariness. The morning cometh. It shall not tarry. Do you doubt it? Know ye not that the Lord reigneth? Is He not the Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle? "The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." If you doubt it, dissolve your Missionary Society, and do not pretend to do a work in which you have no faith; but if you believe in the triumph of God's work, and that you are called to it, behave worthily to so divine an enterprise. God do so to you as you deal with Him in this matter. Amen.

INCIDENTS OF THE FIVE POINTS MISSION.

Mary's One Wish.

ON the first Sabbath the school opened, a timid-looking girl, about twelve years of age, hovered around the door. She resisted every effort to induce her to enter, generally fleeing as soon as she was spoken to to her home in the Old Brewery, where she lived with a wretched drunken mother. At times the teachers pursued her with words of kindness, but in vain. After some time, of her own accord she entered, and immediately became an attentive and interested scholar. Months rolled away, and her improvement became evident, but being retiring and reserved, we could learn but little of her feelings.

Last winter (this story was written in 1854), it was announced that Mary was ill, and she was visited in her wretched home. We found her in bed, in a corner of a large room, where at least twenty persons were accommodated at night, and where cooking and eating was done for and by all. She did not seem sick, but she would not rise nor eat, nor scarcely speak. It was ascertained that grief for her wretched mother and her own forlorn condition were pressing her to the grave; yet she resisted all wishes to remove her to the hospital and thus separate her from her mother. She was supplied with needful things, was comforted and encouraged, and for a little time seemed to rally, and crept, pale and sad-looking, into the Mission room.

Soon, however, it became apparent that she was failing fast. She had been removed to a comfortable room, and was continually visited by Mr. and Mrs. Tuckey and other friends of the Mission. A friend who visited her one day, after conversing on spiritual things, asked, "Is there anything you would like to have, Mary?" She shook her head and said, "Nay." "Can't you think of anything? I will get you whatever you wish" (thinking perhaps her sickly appetite might be craving some of the luxuries of life). Again a languid negative was given. Her kind friend still lingered, and suddenly the color mounted to the pale face, a look full of animation succeeded the languid glance, the thin lip quivered, and she exclaimed, "Oh, yes; I want one thing" and raising herself in the bed reiterated, "I want one thing." "What is that, Mary? I promise you you shall have it." A moment's pause, and the answer came, "I want you to bring some of the Sunday-school children here, and let them sing for me. Oh, will you?"

The Sunday after the request was granted; and the exquisite enjoyment written on that pale suffering face, the tearful eye, and the unspoken gratitude formed a scene for a painter to witness and portray. "There is a happy land," was the favorite hymn; and many times since then has the only wish she has expressed been thus gratified. She is slowly fading away; she converses but little; but when we speak of the Saviour her color rises and her eyes fill with tears. She says she is trusting in Christ, and those who know her best have full confidence that our God is thus gently preparing her to enter "the happy land." In her home of poverty, amid her many privations, sinking in languor and pain, she utters no complaint, nor breathes one earthly wish. Thank God for the wondrous power of His redeeming grace to strengthen and to satisfy.

THE BUDDING FIG-TREE.—A POST-SCRIPT.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Predicted Millennial Summer—The Project Apart from Prophecy—Assured Prosperity of Palestine—The Restoration as an Encouragement to Faith—A Jewish Alliance.

As regards the

FUTURE PROSPERITY OF PALESTINE,

Mr. Oliphant holds this to be in any case assured. "Under any circumstances," he writes, "it is impossible that the region which comprises within its limits the luxuriant pasture lands of Jaulan, the magnificent forest-clad mountains of Gilead, the rich arable plains of Moab, and the fervid subtropical valley of the Jordan, can remain much longer neglected. Whether we regard it from an archæological, a commercial, or a political point of view, this territory possesses an interest and importance unrivalled by any tract of country of similar extent in Asiatic Turkey. It remains for England to decide whether she will undertake the task of exploring its ruined cities, of developing its vast agricultural resources, by means of the repatriation of that race which first entered into its possession three thousand years ago, and of securing the great political advantages which must accrue from such a policy."

And he adds in another part of his book, "In this anticipation I am borne out by the testimony of all intelligent and unprejudiced travellers. Captain Burton, whose intimate knowledge of the country entitles his opinion to especial weight, says, in his 'Unexplored Syria,' 'The Holy Land, when provided with railways and tramways, will offer the happiest blending of the ancient and modern worlds. It will become another Egypt, with the distinct advantage of a superior climate and far nobler races of men.' And again, 'Syria and Palestine, I may safely prophesy, still awaits the hour when, the home of a free, a striving, and an energetic people, it will again pour forth corn and oil, it will flow with milk and honey, and it will bear, with proper culture, almost all the good things that have been given to man.'"

As he meets with such testimonies as these from able and "practical" men of the world, the Christian may well be led to exclaim, "How marvellous are thy ways, O God!" It is not many years since by such men "the restoration of the Jews" was treated scornfully as the fond dream of those foolish enough to believe "all that the prophets have spoken." Now how differently do they regard it! Long ago Ezekiel prophesied: "Thus saith the Lord God: Behold, I, even I, will both search my sheep and seek them out. As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day. And I will bring them out from the people, and gather them from the countries, and will bring them to their own land, and feed them upon the mountains of Israel by the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country" (Ezekiel 34: 11–13).

And lo! to-day our eyes behold this ancient prophecy touching its fruition. How, then, should this strengthen our faith, not only in Israel's restoration, but in all the blessed promises which are associated with it. For is it not written: "When the Lord shall build up Zion, He shall appear in His glory" (Psalm 102: 16)? And does not our Lord Himself give this as a sign to us, as well as to Israel, when He says: "When ye see these things coming to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand" (Luke 21: 31)?

With one other passage—which casts a most interesting light on the subject of the "seven years covenant" which the personal Antichrist is to make with the Jews—we must close our extracts from this valuable book, the perusal of the whole of which we would recommend to all who are interested in the subject of Jewish restoration. "I would remark," says Mr. Oliphant, "that the advantages of to any power likely to become involved in the impending complications in the East, which may possibly involve a general war, appear to have been altogether overlooked by European statesmen. It is evident that the nation that espoused the cause of the Jews and their restoration to Palestine would be able to rely upon their support in financial operations on the largest scale, upon the powerful influence which they wield in the press of many countries and on their political co-operation in those countries, which would of necessity tend to paralyze the diplomatic and even hostile action of powers antagonistic to the one with which they were allied. Owing to the financial, political, and commercial importance to which the Jews have now attained, there is probably no one power in Europe that would prove so valuable an ally to a nation likely to be engaged in a European war, as this wealthy, powerful, and cosmopolitan race."

"I could multiply quotations to the same effect from the reports of Colonel Warren, Lieutenant Conder, and other officers who have surveyed the country on behalf of the Palestine Exploration Fund, which are fully borne out by the opinions of old residents, and by the experience of those who have already become agriculturists in the country.

"From whatever point of view, then, we regard a project that has for its object the ultimate regeneration of Palestine—whether from one of sentiment, as involving the repatriation of a nationality which surely has its claims upon us equal to if not greater than those of the Slav or the Greek; or from one of practical benevolence—for a considerable resident population would immediately benefit, while the success of the experiment would promote its extension to regions sorely in need of development under a like system, or from one of political expediency—for it is only by means of such development that the Ottoman Empire in Asia can either be preserved and consolidated, or adequate provision made for the contingency of its disruption.

"It holds out inducements which the public of England should be the first to recognize; for as we have special interests, so we have come under special obligations in regard to this quarter of the globe. The population of Palestine in particular, of which twenty-five thousand belong to the Hebrew race, is looking to England for protection and the redress of grievances; and those who see in the relations which our own country now occupies toward the Holy Land the hand of Providence, may fairly consider whether they do not involve responsibilities which cannot lightly be ignored."

THE BACKWOODSMAN'S THRILLING STORY.

SPECIAL services were being conducted in the East of London recently, and at one of the meetings an old man desired that the well-known children's hymn, commencing—might be sung. In compliance with the request the hymn was sung, and the impression made was of a most encouraging character. Many present were touched with the simplicity and tenderness of the words, and most felt that they would like to enter into "the rest that remaineth for the people of God." Among those who remained for prayer was the old man himself, and he was completely broken down. Christian friends present inquired how it was that he was so affected by the hymn, as he had been on the Lord's side for a number of years, and knew that when death came he would "enter in through the gates into the City." He replied—

"Many years ago I was living in the backwoods of America, and, although I was far away from companions, my life was a very happy one. A loving wife and little daughter were the sunshine of my home, and made even bush-life far from monotonous. I was not, however, a Christian, and felt quite unconcerned about my soul's salvation. Death, however, came into my home, and took away my wife. I then began to think seriously about the importance of decision for Christ, and reconciliation to God. But, alas! I did not yield to the strivings of the Spirit, and, in order to deaden my impressions, and to silence my conscience, I gave way to drink, and day after day I became worse and worse

"Thus I was going headlong towards perdition. My little daughter was neglected, and, furthermore, forbidden even to read her Bible or attend the Sunday-school, some three miles distant, and which was presided over by a Christian missionary. In my drunken fits I treated her most cruelly, and threatened that I would shoot her if she crossed the threshold of the Sunday-school any more. With a cry of sorrow she would say, 'Father, I do love Jesus! I do love my teacher! and I do so want to go to heaven when I die! I hope you will let me go to school.' My heart was not in the least affected by her pleadings, but rather hardened, and I resolved that if she would insist upon going I would punish her severely. The following Sunday, however, on my return home, I found that she was absent, and being almost mad with drink, I took down my gun and made for the direction from which she would come.

"On meeting my child I at once levelled the gun, but was stopped from firing by her entreaties. On perceiving that I fully intended to commit this diabolical act, she cried, 'Stop a minute, father, I want to pray;' and after a few words of simple prayer, she sang the following verse—

"I want to be an angel,
And with the angels stand,
With a crown upon my forehead,
A harp within my hand.
There with the blood-bought children,
So glorious and so bright,
I'll make the sweetest music
And praise Him day and night."

No sooner was the verse sung, than I fell to the ground without accomplishing my wicked deed, and for several hours I remained in a state of unconsciousness, but on my recovery I seemed to hear the voice of God, saying, 'The fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers . . . and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone.' For many days and nights I was in a most distressed state of mind lest God's judgment should come upon me, and that I should have my part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone. But I cried unto the Lord for mercy, and He heard my cry and saved my soul, and now I want all present to thank God for His goodness."

"I LIKE TO WEAR MY OWN CLOTHES FIRST."

Temperance Story by the Rev. C. Garrett.

"HALLO! Bill, I declare I thought it was the Squire coming," said a good-natured looking, but poorly dressed working-man, as he met one of his shopmates coming from a place of worship one Sunday morning. "Has somebody died and left thee a fortune?"

"No, Jim," was the kindly reply, "I haven't many friends that can help me; but I have always tried to be my own friend, and to make the best of what God gives me." "Well, but," said Jim, "I never had such a suit as that on my back since I was born, and I don't see how, with my wages, I can ever hope to get one; I've never had a chance of getting on."

"You are wrong," said Bill; "the fault is not in the wages, but in yourself; your wages are much the same as mine; indeed, if there is any difference, I think I could show that the advantage is on your side. The only difference between us is this—that I like to wear my own clothes first, while you pay the publican to wear yours for you, and then you wear them when he's done with them. The suit I have on now cost me four pounds, that is eighty shillings; now you spend from half a crown to ten shillings every week-end. Suppose we say four shillings; in twenty weeks, or about half a year, you will have spent enough to buy a suit like the one I have on. It all depends whether you go to the drink-shop or to the tailor's shop; and what a difference it makes to your family!

"As I came by your house last week I saw your Jane, looking very different from what she looked when you were courting her. You mustn't be vexed at me for what I am going to say, but I couldn't help thinking that the dress she had on when I saw her was very much like one that Mrs. Wilkins, the landlady of the Red Lion, wore two or three years ago."

Poor Jim, who, like many men that are slaves to drink, had a kindly heart, tried to speak, but a choking in his throat made it almost impossible; at last he said, "Bill, thou art right; I have behaved better to the landlady and her family than I have to my own wife and children. Jane has been all that a wife could be to me. When I was laid up through the fight I had with Joe Tomkins, she watched over me like an angel, and never said a wrong word to me about it. And when I was down in the fever, she never had her clothes off for nearly a fortnight, and the doctor said that, but for her nursing, I should never have got over it. And as to dress, I haven't bought her a new one for many a year, and I dare say you are right about the one she wears; we bought it the other day at Skinem's, the pawnshop, for four shillings, and I shouldn't wonder a bit if it were an old one of Mrs. Wilkins's. It's a burning shame that my lass should have to wear her cast-off clothes; and yet how can I help it?"

"Help it?" said Bill, "why, easily; you have but to carry your four or ten shillings home on a Saturday night, instead of carrying it to the Red Lion, and you will soon have a wonderful change. Give your Jane the money, and see if, at the end of the year, there doesn't turn out of your house a mother and children dressed that you will be proud of them."

"That's right enough," said Jim, "but you see I must have something to keep up my strength, and a glass of beer is both victuals and drink too. I don't see that I shall mend matters by committing suicide."

"Suicide!" replied Bill, "that's the very thing you have been doing the last dozen years. I was downright sorry to see you as you came into the shop on Tuesday morning; you were fit for nothing, and you looked as if you were ready to finish your suicide by jumping into the canal. Drink keep your strength up, indeed! Why, it is bringing it down every day.

"Jim, you are a good fellow, and I want to see you doing better. There is, however, but one way, and that is by becoming what I am—a stanch teetotaler. Drink has been your worst enemy. It has kept you poor and made you miserable, and so it will do to the end if you continue to take it. Try teetotalism and there will soon be a happy change. I have tried it for nearly twelve years, and I can say it is good for both body and soul—for this life, and the life to come."

Excited by his own words, Bill held out his hand to his shopmate, and said, "Come, old fellow, be a man, and not a walking beer-barrel. Try total abstinence for one year, and if at the end of one year you are not better in every way, I'll buy Jane a new dress; so any way she will be the better for it." After a moment's hesitation, Jim put his hand into the hand of his friend and said, "God helping me, I will."

That week he had a hard struggle, for habit, appetite, and companions were all against him. Bill, however, cheered him on, and more than once, when he saw by his dejected look that he was in danger of yielding, he whispered, "Don't forget that God will help us if we ask Him."

In a few weeks everything brightened. His companions, seeing his fidelity, ceased to tease or tempt him; the habit which had bound him so long was broken, the appetite subdued. Not many weeks passed before Jane was gladdened by the sight of a new dress for herself, and another for the eldest girl. As the little one sprang on his knee, to thank him, Jim said, with feeling, "Jane, God being my helper, from this day we'll wear our own clothes first."

Reader, have you made this resolution? If not, why not? We talk about trade being bad, but what makes it bad? The true answer is, because there are so many people who don't wear their own clothes first. If you have commenced to drink, stop at once. It will save you from a life of sin and trouble. It will make you happy in this world; it will help fit you for a better world above.

Ask the Saviour to help you,
Comfort, strengthen, and keep you;
He is willing to aid you,
He will carry you through.

Evangelistic Services in Germany are being conducted by Mrs. M. Baxter, who writes:—"The gracious awakening with which the Lord has been visiting Barmen, a German manufacturing town, of between twenty and thirty thousand people, had its rise in the month of June in last year, since which time several small weekly meetings have gradually increased, and a considerable number of conversions have taken place, and thus new life has been infused into a population already much impregnated with the truths of the Gospel. In almost every congregation there has been faithful preaching of the Gospel, and the ground was thus well prepared. In the month of January, 1881, Dr. Somerville, from Glasgow, held meetings in Elberfeld, the streets of which run into Barmen, and he had large and enthusiastic audiences.

"In March, on my arrival with my friends, we took the lesser hall of the Vereinshaus, which holds about three hundred people, but numbers could not get in; and the after-meeting, perhaps the first public after-meeting ever held in Barmen, was large. The following evening our meetings were transferred to the large hall, and some nine hundred women assembled, more than a hundred of whom remained after the address, anxious to be spoken with. The small force of workers we had made it necessary to appoint a time to all anxious souls in our rooms as well as after the meeting. In the course of ten days more than two hundred and fifty came for private interviews, every one seeking spiritual help."

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Etta will not Go to the Ball—Her Self-appointed Work—The Old Shed—A Letter to Lady Isabel—An Invitation—Parental Opposition—A Letter Taken Out of the Bag.

ETTA heard her sisters saying as she wentdown to breakfast, "New dresses for the ball," that was the fact. They were to be chosen and arranged, so that each fair wearer might be attired in the most becoming colors, and exhibited in the most attractive style, to that portion of the outer world which would meet before long at a neighboring house. Etta heard it all; and when, perhaps rather severely, one of the sisters next to her in age, inquired—

"And what are you going to do, Etta? are you coming too?" she noticed the just noticeable smile of satire that flitted infectiously from one lip to another.

"No! I am not coming," she answered very decidedly, "It would not be in my line now."

"Why not?" said more than one; and Etta felt the difficulty of reply.

"I have got something better," she replied. "I should not care to begin again that sort of life."

Her sisters did not care to argue the point. They turned away to their absorbing work, while she turned to hers. Its first phase was household arrangement. In this sphere of self-accepted duty she was getting plenty of practice, to the relief and comfort of her mother. Her next was the quiet Bible-reading hour with the younger ones. This effort, begun with much fear and trembling, had proved so popular in the schoolroom, that now it stood on its own basis, and was daily carried on without interruption.

While Etta was teaching, or rather educating—i.e., drawing out the learning the children already possessed, and at the same time confirming and enhancing it by throwing many a fresh light on the sacred page, she was all the time learning fresh lessons for herself, receiving strength to her heart, increasing her own powers of mind. This short period of Scripture study was certainly a precious one to all engaged in it.

The older ones, who considered themselves above all schoolroom exercises, often lamented Etta's disregard of her former pleasures, and failed as yet to see how much higher was the standard of her new choice. Neither did they perceive the fact that the two objects in life were incompatible! While they acknowledged that they did not care for hers, they wondered she did not care for theirs! thus proving how fundamental was the change that had taken place in her ideas, or rather in her heart; and how deep and real was the difference between them.

When the schoolroom reading was over, Etta considered her time her own, and retired to her little room. There she sat down in front of a writing-table that stood by the window. This window overlooked the laurel walk which led to the town. There she sat for a few moments, her face buried in her hands. She was praying.

"O Lord!" she silently pleaded, "direct me! teach me! . . . Show me Thy ways! lead me in Thy paths! . . . What wilt Thou have me to do? Tell me Thy will. I long to know it better, to understand it!"

She paused, and prayed again—

"I have no wisdom to guide me, and no friend at home to help me. To whom shall I go? Lord! be Thou my friend! Direct, strengthen, and help me. Look upon the unhappiness of our little town; and, if it be Thy will, show me how to do something for the people! . . . Bless those miserable homes. Comfort and satisfy the poor, and show them Thy love!"

Then she took a pen and sheet of note-paper, and she wrote—

"DEAR LADY ISABEL—Will you give me your advice? You have always written to me so frankly and kindly about my little difficulties, that I venture to apply to you again!

"You heard of the old shed that was burnt down in our little town lately, which had been the frequent resort of some of the working men. They used to hold little 'prayer-meetings' in it, and Mrs. Clemence says they miss it very much. So does old Bateman, the old man of whom I told you in one of my former letters.

"Several of the families here interest me very much now; and in visiting them I see that their great trouble is 'drink.' Some drink very much indeed, and neglect their homes altogether; and some only are occasionally the worse for it. But this is altogether the source of most of the misery, i.e., sin and poverty, of the town.

"Mr. and Mrs. Clemence both think that if another shed were put up, and rented, it might be of great use, if it were devoted to the people and used in various ways. They think it might be something like your coffee-room, or managed on the same principles. Do you think that I ought to make an attempt? If you think so, will you kindly tell me, dear Lady Isabel, whether you know of any one who would give me some practical advice on the matter? I shall be most grateful—

"Yours very sincerely,
"ETTA FENNECKER."

The letter was despatched, and an answer eagerly looked for. Put away in some safe investment, there were a few hundred pounds belonging to Etta, for her "sole and separate use," the parting gift of an aged relative. This had not yet been touched; but Etta had quite determined now, that if Lady Isabel's advice should coincide with her own wishes, and if her parents should agree, that she would devote fifty pounds of that sum to the purpose she had considered.

Though very short, the answer was direct, and altogether better than her wishes. It was—

"DEAR MISS FENNECKER—Can you come here on Friday, and stay for a few days? You can then see the coffee-house, and I will secure you an opportunity of consulting my right-hand man here, the builder's son, about the more practical points of your proposal.

"Come by the three o'clock train, and I will meet you at the station. I shall be alone that afternoon.—Yours very truly,

"ISABEL HAMILTON."

The reception of this epistle necessitated an immediate interview with both parents, who at first gladly agreed that the invitation should be accepted; but when they heard the object of the visit, looked grave, and advised that the answer should be delayed. While many a cheque had gone into various jewelry, millinery, and drapers' houses without a demur beyond the words, "Young people must have their pleasures!" this unexpected suggestion of outlay, and for such a purpose, provoked at first a decided refusal.

In vain Etta protested that her ball days were done; she never wanted "to look stylish" again; no more money should be spent on amusements for her; she wanted to help the poor in the little town. It was apparently breath wasted. Little did she know how the sweet submission, and gentle usefulness of her new life, was being marked and noticed. While her parents might think her mistaken in some of her recently adopted "ideas," they could not but acknowledge to themselves her loving thoughtfulness and constant readiness to help and serve each one—from the oldest to the youngest—in her home. Though now she yielded to the denial of her request, she prudently determined to delay her answer to the note, hoping that possibly some change might occur.

But, no! the clouds did not seem to break. The note of refusal must be sent.

"Bob! will you put this letter in the hall for the post?" she said, as her youngest brother passed her door on the following morning.

"I say, Etta, what is the matter?" inquired the boy; adding, "you look awfully glummy!"

"Take it down, Bob, or it won't be in time," was Etta's reply, as she vanished into her room again.

"Mamma!" he said, as his mother passed him on the landing, "what's up with Etta. She's in the blues to-day;" and he darted down the stairs, letter in hand, to place it in the general postal repository that stood on the hall table.

When he had stood on tiptoe to reach his cap and whistled himself out of the hall, shutting the door securely behind, Mrs. Fennecker followed his line of retreat down the stairs, though in a rather more leisurely and dignified manner. Taking the letter in her hand, she turned it over to read the address. This she found to be—

"THE LADY ISABEL HAMILTON,
LIONEL COURT, THORNHAM."

It was quite evident that inclosed in this envelope was Etta's reply to the invitation; her mother conveyed it into the library, where Mr. Fennecker was taking a last hurried, standing glance at the Times newspaper.

"I am afraid Etta has been writing to Lady Isabel," she said, "to refuse her invitation. I do not know what else she could have written about. Here is the letter!"

"That's evident," said Mr. Fennecker; "and a very good thing, I think."

"I am not quite sure of that," said the lady. "Lady Isabel is a very nice person; and I should rather like Etta to go there. It is a very good opening for her; and she will not go into society like her sisters."

"I have no patience with that sort of thing," Mr. Fennecker answered abruptly. "The girl is so full of 'notions.' She won't go to balls, and she will do this, that, and the other. She ought not to be encouraged in such nonsense. Besides, I don't like Lady Isabel's way of doing things. Such a fuss about nothing, and quite stepping out of her place. Having coffee-rooms and meetings. I don't like it." This he said very impatiently, as he turned away.

Mrs. Fennecker was too shrewd to return the letter to the post-box; she put it in her pocket.

In the meantime Etta was putting on her hat and jacket, and had slipped out of the side glass door, that led her directly to the avenue, which again led her into the town. Going direct to the house of the young man who had been so ill, but who had now recovered and was at work again, she knocked at the door, and received a smiling welcome from the poor woman. She certainly looked very different. A neat shawl, a clean cap, and a dark wincey skirt, protected by a tidy apron, were only a portion of the external change.

In her face, already worn into seams, and furrows, and wrinkles, that told too plainly of many a past sorrow and many a present anxiety, there had dawned a look of hope; a smile of love played about her careworn features; in fact, the woman looked as though she knew she was cared for. If that were all, it was surely a point gained, in the happiness of at least one life. But it was not all. The blessing had gone further than this. You can discover it by her first sentence:

"O Miss Etta!" she was already saying, "my Bill do look for you so! That he do! He was sore about that he comed home just too late for your call o' Tuesday. Better, thank you," she continued in response to an inquiry after his health; "ever so much. But, miss," and here poor Mrs. Archer lowered her voice to a profound whisper, "I do feel afraid that he'll go back to them 'bominable public houses. Whatever shall I do?"

"Do you think he wants to go back to them?" asked Etta.

"Well, miss, I'm sure I don't know," said the woman. "He don't say much about nothin' o' that sort; but you see his father keeps on a-goin' to 'em. So, in coorse, the young'uns goes. That's how it is. They don't know no different. There wasn't any money comin' in to Bill, not for a long time, when he couldn't go to work, and then it war a good thing, for he had to keep hisself to hisself. But now, see, it's different. He gets his wages again."

"What could be done?" said Etta. "It would be a great pity if he were to begin going back to them again."

"Well, that's what I was goin' to say," responded Mrs. Archer. "If any one could stop him, you could, miss. He'd do anything for you. That he would," she continued more earnestly, as she saw an incredulous look pass over her visitor's face. "I was thinking, perhaps, as how, if you was to come in to-morrow evening, after he's in from his work, he would be pleased to see you; and then, perhaps you'd say a word to him; and then maybe the father'd be in too."

This was by no means the first time that Etta had been asked to "say a word" to the men of this cottage; but the task offered to her was by no means an easy one. The "word" was the most difficult thing to say, and she generally shirked it by every means in her power. To-day she felt as though the duty were greater than it had been before, and as if something must be tried.

"Pray about it, Mrs. Archer," she said. "Ask God, in the name of His Son Jesus Christ, to keep your husband and sons from going to the public-house, and I am sure He will answer you. He answers my prayers, and I am sure He will answer yours."

"Your prayers is very different," responded the woman. "You're a young lady, and you know how to speak. I know very little about it, and I don't go to church nor nothing."

"Why don't you go?" said Etta; "you ought to go, I should think; and you might if you liked."

"Bless you, my dear!" said Mrs. Archer, forgetting all her manners. "I'd as soon go inside the Queen's palace, and a deal sooner! Why, them stiff pews—and then you're poked away right under the orgin gall'ry, or whatever they call it—and just a dinning, humming noise in your head the whole time. And you can't hear nothing the parson says—or not above half, anyways—and you can't understand half o' that. Leastways we can't."

"I am sorry for that," said Etta; "but I cannot stay any longer. I will just give you one text before I go;" and then she repeated in a clear soft voice, that had long ago won its way to this aching heart, "Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you."

Twice she said these words, reminding her listener that they were the Lord Jesus Christ's words, which could not be broken. And then she went on her way, leaving the poor mother with an eased heart, and a burden lightened by sympathy.

THE SAVIOUR LIFTED UP.

S. S. Lesson for June 5, Luke 23 : 32-46. Golden Text John 12 : 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR theme for to-day is the Saviour lifted up, and we cannot but think of His own words, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life" (John 3 : 14, 15). The brazen serpent was made in the likeness of the destroying serpents which wrought such pain and death in the camp of Israel, and so "God, sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh: that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" (Rom. 8 : 3, 4). We who believe "have borne the image of the earthy," and "we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (1 Cor. 15 : 49); but Christ for our sakes bore the image of the earthy, and more still, bore the imputation of all our sins that He might make it possible for us to bear the image of the heavenly. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them" (2 Cor. 5 : 19), "because the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all."

Who among us can form any conception of what it was for Him "who knew no sin" (2 Cor. 5 : 21) when He, for our sakes, came in contact with, and adopted as His own, all the awful guilt of our sin; when He so incorporated Himself with us that His soul and body were given over to the consequences of sin, when disease set in upon His body, and He took our infirmities and bore our sicknesses (comp. Isa. 53 : 4; Matt. 8 : 17); when every form of iniquity, hypocrisy, impurity, pride, came pouring in upon His pure soul, and He must bear "our sins in His own body on the tree" (1 Pet. 2 : 24); surely here is a mystery of suffering and of shame which no words or thoughts can fathom, and it becomes us better to preserve silence.

The Son of Man was lifted up that He might draw all men unto Him. But O how different are the degrees in which men are drawn from sin, from the world, and from self to Him. Around the cross of our beloved Lord, as He hung there under the veiled heavens bearing our sins, there were many friends and foes. We read, "Now there stood by the cross of Jesus His mother, his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene" (John 19 : 25). These three women, Mary His pure virgin mother; the other Mary, the family woman, but yet the disciple of Jesus, and Mary Magdalene, the reclaimed sinner, stood, with the disciple whom Jesus loved, in the most conspicuous place among the multitude, not afraid to be known as belonging to Him. The raillery and mockery which was directed against Him must have fallen with almost equal force on them. The whole world was crucified to them, and they unto the world, by the cross of Jesus, where they stood. They had already left all to follow Him; they had turned their backs upon the world, and all which the world had to give, and in their eyes there was nothing else but Jesus. They had chosen Him, and in doing so their choice was exhausted, they had choice for nothing else, they had accepted Him, and in life or death, time or eternity, earth or Heaven, they wanted nothing else; they seem to have had neither fear nor shame. Surely these are the virgin souls who "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth" (Rev. 14 : 4)!

But in the 49th verse of our chapter we read that "all His acquaintance and the women that followed Him from Galilee stood afar off, beholding these things." Within sight, and yet afar off, looking on, but yet not running the risk of sharing in His suffering! Alas! this is the condition of many believers, many of Christ's acquaintance in our own day. They are not ashamed to receive from His hand the pardon of their sins, but nothing will induce them to do that which they think will make them singular; they would rather stand among the multitude who do not believe in Him, undistinguishable from them, than take such a position of unworldliness and self-renunciation as to be looked upon as peculiar for His sake. They have yet to learn the true self-renunciation which was the distinguishing mark of Christ Himself, and which is that of His true followers. How many among those who have found peace with God are afraid to dress simply, to live in a simple way, and to travel second or third class, because they are afraid of losing their position in society, and thus they have no money for the work of God, no time for Him, although He has done so much for them.

O how many must have been in this company; many eyes were there to which the touch of Jesus had given sight; many cleansed lepers perhaps were there; Simon of Bethany, in whose very house He had been staying, Martha, Lazarus, Bartimæus were probably there; the very disciples themselves were there, it was the credited company of believers among themselves. But only four were in that little unpopular inner circle who stood by the cross of Jesus. Had it been in our day, perhaps some of the best known Christians and even ministers would have been found standing afar off, i.e., afar in comparison with the little group of four.

There were present also bitter enemies, "and, sitting down, they watched Him there." Men could sit down to see Him in His dying agony who had been known as the bringer of health, joy, sight, hearing, peace, love, and comfort. What made them so furious? The most awful battle was raging which the universe ever witnessed, and those who did not take their part on His side, who through death was destroying "Him that hath the power of death, even the devil," were obliged to take their part with and be impelled by the wicked one. In their demoniac enmity to Jesus, "They wagged their heads, saying, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself. If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross. Likewise also the chief priests mocking Him, with the scribes and elders, said, He saved others; Himself He cannot save. If He be the King of Israel, let Him now come down from the cross, and we will believe Him" (Matt. 27 : 39-42). O it was true, "He saved others, Himself He cannot save." Himself He would not save; for He came to give Himself, that He might teach us to give ourselves. His enemies could not understand how He could possess the power to save others and fail to use that power to save Himself; it was beyond the range of their conceptions, there was nothing in their hearts to answer to it. The Lord teach us the great lesson of Christ-likeness to save others but not to save ourselves! What if He had accepted the blasphemous challenge of His enemies? what if He had taken them at their word? Then the whole work of man's salvation would have been at an end, and would have come to naught. But He bore with these blasphemers, for "knowing all things that should come upon Him," He had said, "If any man speak a word against the Son of Man it shall be forgiven him" (Matt. 12 : 32).

Besides these open enemies there were present the mercenaries who executed the sentence of the chief priests. With them gain was the great object, they were paid to do it; and these were they who parted His garments among them before He who wore them had breathed His last. Such are they whose only thought is for their own fleshly needs and desires, who do not think enough of Jesus to be personally against Him, but are ready for the sake of gain to go to any length of persecution against Christ and His people. No better than these were they of whom it is written, And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts and returned." Ready they were for any excitement. One day they were crying "Hosannah to the Son of David!" another day "Crucify Him!" Now they smite their breasts, and soon they will be helping in the stoning of Stephen. These are such as are swayed by every popular movement, do as every one else does, but never come to personal contact with God, and thus lose their own souls.

Finally, we come to the two malefactors, "who were crucified with Him." In the first instance both reviled Him, and both of them "cast in His teeth" what the chief priests had said (Matt. 27 : 44). But afterward Jesus said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." It was probably these words of intercession, His unhindered saving of others which came with convincing power upon the dying thief. "One of the malefactors which were hanged railed on Him, saying, If thou be Christ, save thyself and us. But the other answering rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss." It is a marvellous thing that among the multitudes who had heard Jesus, and been healed by Him; that among the twelve and the seventy who had been sent forth by Him to preach and to heal; that even among the faithful women who had followed Him from Galilee, not one spoke in the defence of Jesus in His dying hour, but this malefactor. He then made a personal appeal to Him; he alone in that hour called Jesus Lord. "Lord," he said, "remember me when thou comest into Thy kingdom." It may be that this man had stood some time in the outskirts of the crowd when Jesus was preaching, or it may be that the earnest cry of the seventy had reached his ears, "the Kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." Anyway now he knew that Jesus was a King, and that He had a kingdom which was not from hence, and the poor sinner was willing to cast in his lot with Jesus. This was mighty faith, for, with the exception of the four who looked, perhaps utterly helpless in their grief, there stood no man by Jesus, and yet the thief had faith to believe in Him. His own twelve had forsaken Him and fled, but the thief clung to Him. "To-day," said the Master, "shalt thou be with me in Paradise." One other, an unbeliever till now, stood there, the centurion, a Roman, and when he saw that Jesus with His last breath commended His Spirit to His Father, "He glorified God, saying, Certainly this was a righteous man."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Second Reading of the Irish Land Bill was agreed to in the British House of Commons on May 20th, by a vote of 352 to 176. This vote, according to the doctrines of British Parliamentary usage, is an expression of approval of the principle of the bill. It often happens that members vote for a second reading of a measure which they think defective or impracticable in its details, and these defects they have an opportunity of correcting in its later stages. Thus it is possible that the organization of the arbitration courts, the length of the leases, and other details may undergo alteration before the Land Bill finally passes the House of Commons.

The second reading was energetically opposed by the Conservatives, one of whom expressed his conviction that portions of the bill were revolutionary. He said the proposal to take away the landlords' rights without compensation was confiscation, and concluded by expressing hostility to what he characterized as the greatest and most unhallowed act of public confiscation ever attempted by any statesman in a civilized country. In spite of this opposition the bill was approved by a vote of two to one in a full house.

How Much Sincerity there is in Mr. Parnell's pretensions as a patriot may be learned by the fact that he refused to aid the Government in passing the measure. He has been posing as the friend of the Irish people for a long time, yet when Mr. Gladstone devised a scheme for their benefit which was so thorough as to be denounced as revolutionary, he and eighteen of his friends walked ostentatiously out of the House instead of remaining to vote for it. The spectacle excited derisive laughter in the generally grave and decorous assembly. This act of Mr. Parnell's may be advantageously considered by the confiding people in this country who are sending him so much money. His excuse for not voting for the bill was that it was not sufficiently sweeping in its provisions; but even he would probably admit that it grants all and perhaps more than all there is any possibility of the Parliament conceding. What Mr. Parnell desires may be learned from his speech in Parliament. He urged the Government to "transplant the surplus population to land capable of improvement, find employment for the people and create an increased supply of food, instead of getting out of the difficulty by promoting emigration." He said one of the great reasons why Irish enterprise was so kept down was that Ireland is under the curse of foreign rule, and until the English rulers are cleared out, bag and baggage, there would be little hope for the Irish people. Such a scheme is Utopian. It is the idea of paternal government reduced to an absurdity. The man who advocates such a scheme is a visionary, not a statesman.

The Proposal of Russia and Germany to Hold an International Council with a view to devising methods of putting down Nihilism and Socialism has not been favorably received. One of the methods suggested was to facilitate the extradition of political offenders, and thus do away with what is known as the "right of asylum," at the request of the power against which the offence had been committed. The Government of France declined to unite in the council, and Earl Granville, the British Foreign Secretary, stated in Parliament that from no sympathy with Nihilism, her Majesty's Government declined to participate in a conference, believing it would have no practical result, and that for the Government to join it, would not be agreeable to either Parliament or the country. He believed that the powers the English Government possessed under existing laws were adequate to punish persons guilty of inciting to murder.

Serious Danger Exists of an Armed Outbreak in Ireland, as the result of the many evictions now taking place. A desperate fight occurred on Saturday last at New Pallas, where 400 soldiers and 100 police were dispatched to aid a sheriff in making seizures and serving processes of eviction. On their arrival it was discovered that the people had left their homes and had taken possession of a large castle upon the estate, which they had loopholed and put into a state of defence and rendered impregnable except against artillery. The military and police were fired upon from the castle, and volleys of stones were thrown. Several soldiers were severely wounded. They had their guns loaded, but they received no order to fire. They, however, used their sword-bayonets, batons, and rifle butts, and several desperate, and, it is supposed, fatal wounds were inflicted. The force returned to Limerick without having accomplished anything. The whole district is almost in a state of insurrection. Orders have been given to the Scots Guards in Dublin to hold themselves in readiness to go south at an hour's notice.

A Roman Catholic priest named Sheehy has been arrested under the Coercion Act. He has taken a leading part in inciting the people to acts of violence, and was extremely popular with the lower classes. His arrest has caused intense excitement. It is believed that he was instigated by the League to provoke his own arrest, in order to arouse the religious feelings of the peasants against the Government.

The Plague in Mesopotamia is still Raging. Reports from the Sanitary Commission say the mortality in Nedjef was 56 per day for the week ending May 2d. Four thousand inhabitants are dispersed in camps completely isolated. These camps are now free from plague, as are also the localities of Elzayad and Djara, whence the disease was originally propagated. The remaining inhabtiants of Nedjef will leave shortly, when the officials hope to completely destroy all the latent germs of the epidemic.

Turkey Obstinately Refuses to Yield the Ceded territory to Greece, or rather the Sultan attaches so many onerous conditions to the cession that Greece is justified in rejecting them. The ambassadors have at last lost patience with the Sultan, and blandly informed him that he must either cease to obstruct the process of surrender or be prepared to take the consequences. This step was taken on the advice of Mr. Goschen, the British minister, and it may prove effective, as the Sultan knows he has nothing to hope from the British Government while Mr. Gladstone is in power.

The Attack of France upon Tunis Continues to cause anxiety to European statesmen. The treaty the Bey of Tunis signed under compulsion does not so much provide for the preponderance of French influence at Tunis as for the exclusion of the influence of all other powers. It provides that French occupation will cease when the Bey has shown that he can insure the security of his frontier, but the phrase is so vague that it is generally considered equivalent to annexation. Both Turkey and Italy protest against the conduct of France, and if either power were strong enough would probably declare war. As it is, there is a strained feeling prevalent which in the present condition of Europe is ominous of future trouble.

It seems probable that France, influenced by a desire to allay the unfavorable impressions produced in England by the conclusion of the Tunisian treaty, and to show the price she sets on the maintenance of friendly relations with England, is disposed to make concessions in the question of the commercial treaty.

The Young Czar of Russia is Apparently Opposed to granting a constitution. An impression prevailed that the concession had been definitely agreed upon, and the fact that General Loris Melikoff was appointed President of the Council confirmed the impression. Last week the cable announced the resignation, for unknown reasons, of General Melikoff and the appointment of General Ignatieff to succeed him. The change creates great uneasiness in political circles, being direct evidence of the Czar's intention to continue absolutism. General Ignatieff has addressed a circular to the governors of the provinces announcing the views of the Government on the internal condition of the country. The circular refers to the irreligious education of the youth, the inactivity of the authorities, the indifference of many holders of public offices to the general welfare, and their avaricious management of the public property. "Herein," says the note, "is to be found the explanation of the painful fact that the great reforms introduced by the last Government did not yield the full benefit the deceased emperor had a right to expect. The first task to be accomplished is the extirpation of the spirit of rebellion, which society must counteract of its own initiative. The second task is to strengthen faith and morals.

There is no hint that the Government of Russia will be anything other than a despotism, and the Nihilists have in consequence announced their resolve to continue their plots.

The Persecution of Russian Jews Continues. Some Hebrew families have already fled from Russia, and others are depositing their valuables in the banks. Numerous Hebrew fugitives are arriving at Warsaw from all parts of Russia. Many of them will emigrate to America. The Vienna Presse says the Galician corn merchants have received an urgent warning to withdraw the grain stored in Russia, as there is danger of general plunder and destruction. A newspaper correspondent at St. Petersburg writes of the outrages: At Podwalyska several peasants were killed. Four grain warehouses and nearly all the buildings around the railway station were burned. At all the stations along the Southeastern Railway houses were plundered and burned. The Austrian frontier towns are crowded with fugitives. At Odessa the plundering is continued. The rich Jews have fled, and the poor ones are in a pitiable condition. The Jewish quarter of the town looks as if it had been sacked by Tartars.

Two Strong Shocks of Earthquake Occurred at Chios, the scene of the terrible disaster of April 3d, on Friday last, and several houses were thrown down. The correspondent who telegraphs the intelligence gives no further details, but adds that the suffering among the people is very great.

A Puzzled Cardinal.—In the New Report of the Chiesa Libera, or Free Church of Italy, is related a fact from Bologna which truly depicts the existing division of opinion on religious questions in Italian families. A lad of thirteen who had been long unwell fell seriously ill. The father is an unbeliever, but a bigot for the sake of gain. He ran and called the priest, but the boy, educated in the Evangelical Sunday-school, would neither look at priest nor crucifix. The mother, who is an Evangelical, called her minister, and from that time there was a constant going and coming of minister and priest, without the two ever meeting. At last the boy died, and the husband, angry at the Protestant minister having been called in, summoned his wife before the Archbishop Cardinal Parocchi. Alas! for the poor Cardinal. Exhorting the mother to abjure the Gospel and to return to the bosom of the Church, he had to listen to such replies from that courageous woman as to make him glad to dismiss her without her signature to any document which might be used against her in a civil court. She obtained a complete victory, and is now permitted to worship in accordance with her Protestant convictions.

"LET the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon." Such is the message which the man familiarly known in London as Ned Wright, carries into the haunts of sin in the British metropolis. God has, he believes, committed to his charge those Ishmaelites of society whose hand is against every man and every man's against them. It is to the burglar, the pickpocket, the jail-birds of all kinds that Ned Wright directs his message. There is evidence in his success that the mission enjoys the favor of God. It is manifest that he was selected as a special instrument for the work. Violent, passionate, desperate, well acquainted, by sad experience, with the temptation and sorrow of a criminal's life, Wright, in speaking to a man in jail, or just released, knows exactly how to address him. He can recall his own sensations at a like period of his own life, and can remember how he was affected at the time. The message of God is many-sided, though its end is one; it has words for every season, and he best serves his Master, who, taught by the Spirit, selects at the fit season the word of entreaty and of love or the word of stern warning and reproof. Thus the quick perception and sympathy experience gives has aided the ex-burglar and he wins his way to hearts which would be closed to more eloquent but less judicious appeals.

He was born in that depraved region of London called Lambeth, on July 28th, 1836, and is now nearly forty-five years of age. His father was a journeyman barge-builder, and until his conversion was occasionally intemperate. This momentous event was effected in the following manner:

CONVERSION OF NED WRIGHT'S FATHER.

The banks of the Thames being much lower than at present, the high tides caused considerable inconvenience and dismay. On one occasion the tide was very high, and, with the exception of a female lodger, Mrs. Wright and Ned, then little more than an infant, were in their house in Pitt's Place alone. The water began to run in by the doorway, and soon covered the floor, when Mrs. Wright cried for assistance to a man who came in a boat down the court. He, however, rowed on to the rescue of his own family, and Mrs. Wright was compelled to entreat the services of the lodger upstairs, and offered to forego all claims for rent if she would rescue her and her child. This was done, although the water in the room reached above her knees, and rose yet higher before the tide began to fall.

Ned's father had endeavored to make his way home by holding on to the railings outside New Park Street Chapel (subsequently the scene of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's early ministry in London), and walking along the brickwork. Suddenly, however, the top of the railings gave way, and he, falling into the water, had to wade through it to reach home. Soon after this incident, impelled by motives of curiosity, he ventured with his wife into the chapel, where the late Rev. James Smith, the well-known author of several devotional publications, was preaching. Both were that evening converted to God, the father ceased from his drunken habits, the Bible was daily read as a message from God, and at every meal a blessing was sought upon the provision of the table.

JUVENILE ESCAPADES AND PERILS.

As a boy Ned was noted for insensibility to danger, and on one occasion he was nearly drowned while playing at the edge of the river. He was taken home insensible, and appeared to be dying. But God spared his life. Having shortly afterward recovered from a severe attack of whooping-cough, his daring seemed to grow with his growing strength. He soon showed a propensity for fighting, and on one occasion, when quarrelling with a neighbor's child, recollects striking her. That same child grew up to be the wife of her youthful assailant.

From fighting he proceeded to other feats of juvenile irregularity. Though he was taken to chapel, admitted into the Sunday-school, accompanied his father on his rounds as a tract-distributer, and often heard his father pray at the meetings held in his house, yet his disposition to evil increased. He could not be kept at school; whatever school he entered he was repeatedly reprimanded for bad conduct, and ultimately expelled. Having once spent his school fees with his companions upon curds and whey and cake, he was chastised by his father, and while he was being punished a woman expressed her satisfaction therewith. This aroused his ire, and vowing vengeance against her, he resolved to throw a large knife at her. In attempting to carry out his malevolent design, he fell with his head against a brick wall, making a deep gash, the scar of which remains to this day. About this time, too, young Ned was suffering from what was thought to be an incurable liver disease, and the doctors believed that even if he reached the age of fourteen, he would never see the year of his majority.

Ned's father finding employment in the neighborhood of London, the family removed thither, and Ned was sent to school. But he was found to be as hardened and incorrigible as before, and proved to be a source of deepening anxiety to his father. With the view to deliver his son from his bad companions, the father found work and removed to Rotherhithe. Here Ned was sent to a Wesleyan Sunday-school, and was so impressed by witnessing the death of a scholar that hopes were entertained of a favorable change in the lad's feelings. The impression did not last long, and one evening he took one of his mother's brass candlesticks, hid it in the yard, struck it with a hammer against a stone, which doubled it up, then took it to a ragshop and sold it as old brass.

THE EVIL INFLUENCE OF "JACK SHEPPARD."

Ned now only required a little stimulus to make him a skilful and habitual thief, and this he found one evening at a theatre where the play of Jack Sheppard was being performed. It was his first visit to a theatre, and his vitiated tastes were aroused to enthusiasm. "I was not a little startled at the glaring gas and scenery," says Ned; "and as I watched the performance, I well remember how often I fancied I could have got over the top of the walls of that house as well as Jack Sheppard did, and I am sure I was taught that night a way to thieve, and escape without being caught, that I was not acquainted with before."

SENT TO SEA.

His father now thought that a little rough sea-life would do him good, and prevailed upon a pilot to get his unruly Ned into a ship in the coal trade. As the boy had learned to row with some skill, the captain consented, and so he proceeded on board the "Ann of Hartlepool," which place was to be her destination.

The voyage promised to be pleasant and satisfactory, as it was a beautiful day when he first stepped upon the vessel's deck. Up to the time of reaching Gravesend Ned had been running about the rigging liked a wild cat, when a breeze suddenly setting in, the ship rolled heavily, and the young sailor fell very sick, and thought it was his fate to die. Added to the pangs of a troubled conscience, he had to bear the reproaches of the captain and the men, who likened him to Jonah, and offered to make some whale a present of him. This, as may be imagined, greatly disturbed him, for he clearly remembered the story of Jonah, which he had heard in the Sabbath-school at Rotherhithe.

The captain and the men left the ship with a broom at her mast-head, signifying that she was for sale, Ned remaining on board, eating the remains of tough "salt junk" and biscuits. "At the end of a week," he says, "having visited several ships, whose men very kindly gave me a little to eat, I was compelled from destitution to beg my way from door to door in the town of Hartlepool. This lasted for about ten days, when I at length persuaded the captain of a vessel, called the "Stokesley of Stockton," to give me a passage to London; but we had only just fairly got out to sea when I again fell a victim to sea-sickness."

The lad was put ashore at Woolwich, and having picked up a small sailor's chest, he resolved to sell it. At the Arsenal gates he was stopped by several policemen, who demanded to know what he had inside the chest upon his shoulder; but ultimately he was allowed to pass, and after selling the box in the town he walked on to London and reached his home. Work was procured him by his father, and for a few weeks he conducted himself with propriety, bringing home the money he earned, and resolving to labor honestly and with diligence, but his good resolutions were soon forgotten.

Unhappily, he was surrounded by evil companions, who rejoiced in his daring spirit, and urged him to attempt bolder deeds of wrong than he had yet committed. He again lost his employment, and so was thrown more hopelessly into the path of ruin. The restrictions of home became increasingly irksome; his father's admonitions and prayers made him wretched, and he longed to get away from those who sought so earnestly and persistently to restrain him in his evil courses.

SEIZED WITH AN ATTACK OF CHOLERA.

During one of his adventures he was seized with cholera, and though he felt himself to be an outcast and a vagabond, and unworthy to enter his mother's house, yet where could he go but to that home which he should never have left? But to his surprise his father had removed to Bankside. The distance from Rotherhithe was considerable, but it must be walked, and that quickly, for fear the police, who knew him well, might arrest him upon some charge. Never did he feel his loneliness more than at that hour. His anguish was so great that he felt like a maniac, and presently reaching his mother's door, he fell helplessly on the step. His groans awakened his mother, and he was soon inside the house. He received the kindest treatment, without one word of reproach, and he resolved for the future that he would act differently. But his old habits had a stronger hold upon him than his mother's affection.

A DROWNING COMPANION.

One summer's day, shortly after his recovery, while he was attending to some pitch that was being boiled on the shore of the river, several of his companions came down to bathe. The tide was fast ebbing, and the shore was getting dry; however, fearing the police, they got into a coal-barge and undressed themselves. One lad, more venturesome than the rest, named Larney, made for the stern, where the water was deep, and where a rope hung over the side of the barge. Larney was one of those fierce young spirits whom no discipline could tame, and had gained an unenviable notoriety in Rotherhithe as an incorrigible thief, liar, and blackguard; even his own associates both feared and disliked him, although he was regarded as their leader.

Knowing that he could not swim, they warned him of his danger, but with a volley of oaths he requested to be let alone. Again they warned him, but his only reply was, "I'll chance it." He was holding on to the rope, when suddenly it slipped, and he fell into the water and sank to the bottom. Immediately the cry was raised, "A lad overboard!" The cry for help aroused the watermen who were lounging about, including Ned, who, leaving his pitch-pot, ran hurriedly to the scene. When he arrived there he found that Larney had sunk a second time. Ned, without taking off any of his clothes, plunged into the river, and diving beneath seized the drowning lad as he was again sinking.

The moment Larney felt the touch of his rescuer's hand he laid hold of him, placing his arms and legs around Ned's, leaving him powerless either to help himself or Larney. It was a critical moment, requiring great self-possession, determination, and skill, and a desperate effort which only a strong man could make. But Ned was equal to it. Having successfully struggled to get his legs free, he made another effort to disengage himself from the lad's death-hug, and as he was losing his consciousness, his body was seen to rise to the surface. Some watermen seized him by the hair, and dragged him in an insensible state to a boat; but Larney was drowned.

ENLISTS AS A SOLDIER.

Having spent twenty-one days on the treadmill of old Brixton Prison for some offence, he determined to become a soldier, and enlisted under an assumed name; but the new kind of life and treatment he received soon disgusted the raw recruit, and he seized the first opportunity to desert. For a time he settled down quietly, but the old spirit of lawless rebellion remained within him, and once again he sought his former companions. The irresistible charms of a bonfire on the 5th of November won him fairly into the enchanted circle he had for a time forsaken; and it was while in the old society, witnessing the commemoration of "Guy Fawkes' Day" that a quarrel arose between him and a young man, which it was decided should be fought out between them. The fight continued for an hour, and at the close Wright was pronounced the victor.

A FIGHT IN THE PRIZE-RING.

This victory led him to take an interest in pugilism, and after a time he entered the prize-ring as a regular pugilist. His fight with Harry Cooper, which in many of his addresses to the lowest classes, Ned has described as lasting for two hours and a quarter, has left upon him, in the shape of a broken nose, a memento that he will carry to his grave. He was, however, proclaimed the conqueror. He was taken to a public-house, and at first it was feared he would lose his sight; "my head being like a pumpkin, it was so very much swollen." He had hardly arrived at the house when his poor mother, fearful lest he should be hurried from such a dreadful scene into eternity, took him home and continued to keep him until he got better.

Shortly after he was committed to Newgate, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labor at the Wandsworth New Model Prison.

Ned Wright says of this circumstance, "On arriving at Newgate I proceeded up the stairs into

THE DOCK.

This being my first appearance at the Central Criminal Court, I seemed for a moment confused, and as one witness after another appeared to give evidence against me, the chain of which was so firmly linked together that, when their testimony was complete, the jury returned a verdict of 'guilty,' without leaving their box." The three months having expired he issued forth from the huge iron gates, with so awful a feeling of isolation in the midst of life, that it made him wretched and despairing. He had not taken many steps before he espied an aged, gray-headed man, with a bundle under his arm, walking steadily toward the prison. Ned's heart sank within him as he saw it was his own father, who was carrying the best robe he could afford to his prodigal son.

Those were quick steps that the ragged prodigal son took to go to his father and ask for his forgiveness. "Yes, I forgive you," he tearfully exclaimed, "but don't do it again, or you will send me and your poor mother with our gray hairs sorrowing to the grave." And so they walked, silent and sorrowful, to a neighboring coach-house yard, where Ned speedily exchanged his old rags for the brand-new clothes provided by a father's love.

Various interesting incidents we have not space to describe took place in Ned Wright's history between the event just recorded and his conversion. We now proceed to narrate the circumstances which happily culminated in Ned's becoming "a new creature in Christ Jesus."

CONVERTED AT A THEATRE.

He was under an engagement to fight a well-known pugilist named Jack Connelly when Easter Day—the most memorable day in his life—arrived. After tea he informed his wife of the projected prize-fight, and invited her to accompany him to Pimlico, so that if any of his companions should call that night, with a view of persuading him to drink, he might escape a temptation that would materially interfere with his training and prospects of success in the approaching encounter. The children were put to bed, and the parents commenced their walk.

Husband and wife had not proceeded far toward Westminster Bridge when they were accosted by a boy, who, handing them a small bill, informed them that a working-man was announced to speak at Astley's Theatre that evening, the particulars of which he could read for himself. "But," said Ned, "though I can read a little, I can't manage such small type as that." The lad, therefore, read aloud the bill, and when he got to the words, "All seats free; no collection," Ned, nudging his wife, whispered, "That will do for us, there's nothing to pay."

The address was an impassioned appeal, full of references to the sublimities of heaven, the terrors of hell, the nearness of death, and the certainty of a judgment day. To Ned it was but an idle tale, and, rather wearied by the sermon, he was about to leave the building, when his attention was suddenly arrested by the preacher falling upon his knees, and praying so earnestly that Ned was constrained to listen.

"While praying," he says, "for all runaway children, I could not help believing that he meant me; and here came an urgent appeal that God would save the young men who were sending their fathers' and mothers' gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. After this prayer he cried with a loud voice, 'Young man, where will you spend eternity?' All my past history rose up before my mind, even from my very boyhood. Then came the thought that I was unprepared to die, and I remembered the preacher's words, 'The wicked shall be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God.' This all tended to harrow my feelings, until at last I swooned."

It was while in this partly unconscious state that a vision seemed to bring to him all the lessons of truth he had heard during his life. When he came back to consciousness he was standing against a column, the perspiration streaming from his brow, and tears were channelling his cheeks. The service was over, the preacher had left the stage, and was speaking to those who accepted his call to remain for religious conversation. Ned was about to leave the building, when he was accosted by a young man, who read and explained to him John 3:16, and endeavored to make plain to him the way of salvation. The Holy Spirit was moving in his heart and in that of his wife, and that night both of them gave themselves to God.

Since that day sixteen years have passed, but Wright looks back to it as his spiritual birthday. It was not possible with his temperament to hold his peace about the great change God had worked in his soul. He diligently sought further knowledge of the gospel, and as he learned he resolved to impart to others. Gradually, as he was led by God, he commenced the work which is at present actually in progress and which is very extensive and generally interesting. It divides itself into three leading branches, each of which is very valuable. First a private work among thieves; second, the work which centres around the Christian Workers' Hall, and, third, the outside evangelistic work.

The first is a branch most difficult to describe, and even Ned speaks guardedly on the subject lest his means of usefulness should be abridged by his being regarded as an informer. From the time of his conversion Ned Wright felt that he must get at his old companions, men with whom he had spent so much time in prison. The bonâ fide criminals were not to be reached by gospel services, however rough the class attracted. Hence suppers were given, at which the invited guests were solely convicted thieves. Considerable success attended these efforts, and arrangements were made whereby lodgings would be given to those desirous of earning an honest livelihood. Christian men of business kindly co-operated, and thus hundreds have been drafted from the actual criminal classes, placed in situations, and are now quietly and steadily at work, giving satisfaction to their employers, and gradually gaining for themselves a good character. Of course there have been failures among these men; but many of them are devoted followers of the Lord Jesus Christ.

In many ways Mr. Wright is at work among the thieves, establishing an influence over them, gaining their confidence, and ever holding before them the fact that he seeks their highest good, the salvation of their immortal souls. His own quaint but forcible words to a man who had been sentenced illustrate the character of his testimony to such: "Now, old fellow, you'll have to work while you're away (i.e. in the convict prison); better work outside honestly. And mind you, there's One that died because He loved you."

The middle section of the lower portion of our frontispiece gives a representation of

held in the Hall, George Street, Camberwell, which is the centre of Mr. Wright's Christian enterprises; and the right hand corner of the lower portion of our front picture indicates the

ROUGH TREATMENT IN BILLINGSGATE FISH MARKET

he once received at the hands of some carriers and laborers. Early one morning he took his stand there in a conspicuous position, and began to tell the good news of salvation. Missiles of all kinds had been thrown at him for some time while he was speaking, but he continued unmoved. At length a fish-carrier from behind placed amidst the uproarious laughter of the bystanders, and the service was brought to an abrupt conclusion, not, however, before evidence was given in the anxious looks of many that their attention had been successfully directed to the things of God.

His sale of Bibles and other religious publications, the mission-rooms he has opened in several localities in London, his teas, thieves' suppers, and mothers' meetings, and a variety of other Christian agencies he has set on foot, have produced and are still producing results which cannot be too highly estimated, and which will be known in their full extent only on the great day of account.

Gavazzi's Church and the Friar.—At the bridge of St. Angelo, in Rome, is the church in which Signor Gavazzi preaches Christ to his fellow-countrymen. Signor Conti, the accomplished assistant of Gavazzi at this church, last year accepted the challenge of a friar who had denounced the Protestants, and had printed the leading points of his accusation in a Papal organ. Placards were issued, and crowds gathered, but the friar was absent. An open door was then accorded to Conti, who carried on a series of conferences amid crowded audiences; of one of these we have to relate the immediate success. A Roman Catholic, who was a listener, had declared to an inquirer his indifference to all religion. Shortly after he was taken ill and carried to the hospital, where he was visited by the priest and a friar. To these he said, "I want neither priest nor friar, nor what they administer. I trust in the love of Christ and His death for sinners. Call the Evangelical minister at the bridge of St. Angelo, or otherwise let me die in peace."

A Conversion at Dundee, Scotland, is Reported in connection with the meetings of Major Whittle and Mr. McGranahan. One man who was looking inward to his own faith, and expecting a feeling of belief, instead of simply accepting as true the bare testimony of the Word about sin put away, was suddenly recalled from his introspection by the Christian worker who was dealing with him remarking, "There is a ribbon-marker in my Bible," at the same moment covering the end of it with his hand. "Is there?" said the man. "Yes. Shall I show it you, or will you take my word for it?" "Oh, I believe your word," said the inquirer. "What! without seeing it or feeling it?" "Yes." "Well," said the worker, raising his hand, and letting the ribbon be seen, "there it is. If you hadn't believed my bare word, it would have been there just the same, and you, believing me, did not make its presence there any more sure. The ribbon was there, whether you believed my word or whether you did not." The man grasped at the application, believed God's word and rejoiced in the assurance of sin forgiven.

THE DECORATION OF GRAVES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Delivered Last Sunday Morning, May 29, 1881.

"The tower of David builded for an armory, whereon there hang a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men."—SOLOMON'S SONG 4 : 4.

THE Church is here compared to an armory, the walls hung with trophies of dead heroes. Walk all about this tower of David and see the dented shields and the twisted swords and the rusted helmets of terrible battle. So we turn our church to-day into an armory adorned with memories of our departed braves. Blossom and bloom, O walls, with stories of self-sacrifice, the shadows gathered into this drapery typical of our grief for the dead, and the light clustered into these constellations symbolical of our national deliverance. You see it is not the blackness of darkness, but night with stellar illumination.

By unanimous decree of the people of the United States of America, the graves of all the Northern and Southern dead are every year decorated. All acerbity and bitterness have gone out of the national solemnity, and as the men and women of the South one month ago floralized the cemeteries and graveyards, so to-morrow we the men and women of the North shall put upon the tombs of our dead the kiss of patriotic affection. Bravery always appreciates bravery, though it fight on the other side; and if a soldier of the Federal army had been a month ago at Savannah he would not have been ashamed to march in the floral processions to the cemetery. And if to-morrow there be a Confederate soldier walking in Greenwood, he will be glad to put a sprig of heart's-ease on the silent heart of our dead.

In a battle during our last war, the Confederates were driving back the Federals, who were in swift retreat, when a Federal officer dropped wounded. One of his men stopped at the risk of his life, and put his arms around the officer to carry him from the field. Fifty Confederate muskets were aimed at the young man who was picking up the officer. But the Confederate captain shouted,

"HOLD! DON'T FIRE!

That fellow is too brave to shoot." And as the Federal officer, held up by his private soldier, went limping slowly, off the field, the Confederates gave three cheers for the brave private; and just before the two disappeared behind a barn, both the wounded officer and the brave private lifted their caps in gratitude to the Confederate captain.

Shall the Gospel be less generous than the world? We stack arms, the bayonet of our Northern gun facing this way, the bayonet of the Southern gun facing the other way, and as the gray of the morning melts into the blue of noon, so the typical gray and blue of old war times have blended at last, and they quote in the language of King James' translation without any revision: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." That you may act intelligently in this matter, I shall make this an ordination service to the beautiful ceremonies of to-morrow.

WHAT DO WE MEAN BY THIS GREAT OBSERVANCE?

I. First, we mean instruction to one whole generation. Subtract 1864, when the war ended, from our 1881 and you will realize what a vast number of people were born since the war, or were so young as to have no vivid appreciation. No one under twenty-six years of age has any adequate memory of that prolonged horror. Young man do you remember it? "Well," you say, "I only remember that mother swooned away while she was reading the newspaper, and that they brought my father home wrapped in the flag, and that a good many people came in the house to pray, and that mother faded away after that until again there were many people in the house, and they told me she was dead."

There are others who cannot remember the roll of a drum or the tramp of a regiment, or a sigh or a tear of that tornado of woe that swept the nation again and again until there was one dead in each house. Now it is the religious duty of those who do remember it to tell those who do not. My young friends, there were such partings at rail-car windows and steamboat wharves, and at front doors of comfortable homes as I pray God you may never witness. Oh, what a time it was, when fathers and mothers gave up their sons, never expecting to see them again, and never did see them again until they came back mutilated, and crushed, and dead!

FOUR YEARS OF BLOOD.

Four years of hostile experiences. Four years of ghastliness. Four years of grave-digging. Four years of funerals, coffins, shrouds, hearses, dirges. Mourning! mourning! mourning! It was hell let loose. What a time of waiting for news! Morning paper and evening paper scrutinized for intelligence from the boys at the front. First, announcement that the battle must occur the next day. Then the news of the battle's going on. On the following day still going on. Then news of 30,000 slain, and of the names of the great generals who had fallen, but no news about the private soldiers. Waiting for news! After many days a load of wounded going through the town or city, but no news from our boy. Then a long list of wounded and a long list of the dead, and a long list of the missing. And among the last list, our boy.

When missing? How missing? Who saw him last? Missing! Missing! Was he in the woods or by the stream? How was he hurt? Missing! missing! What burning prayers that he may yet be heard from. In that awful waiting for news many a life perished. The strain of anxiety was too great. That wife's brain gave way that first week after the battle, and ever and anon she walks the floor of the asylum or looks out of the window as though she expected some one to come along the path and up the steps, as she soliloquizes, "Missing! missing!"

What made matters worse, all this might have been avoided. There was no more need of that war than that this moment I should plunge a dagger through your heart. There were a few Christian philanthropists in those days, scoffed at both by North and South, who had the right of it. If they had been heard on both sides we should have had no war and no slavery. It was advised by those Christian philanthropists, "Let the North pay in money for the slaves as property, and set them free." The North said, "We cannot afford to pay." The South said, "We will not sell the slaves anyhow." But the North did pay in war expenses enough to purchase the slaves, and the South was compelled to give up slavery anyhow. Might not the North better have paid the money and saved the lives of 500,000 brave men, and might not the South better have sold out slavery and saved her 500,000 brave men? I swear you by the graves of your fathers and brothers, and sons to a new hatred for war! O Lord God, with the hottest bolt of thine omnipotent indignation, strike that monster down forever and ever. Imprison it in the deepest dungeon of the eternal penitentiary. Bolt it in with all the iron ever forged in cannon or moulded into howitzers. Cleave it with all the sabres that ever glittered in battle, and wring its soul with all the pangs which it ever caused. Let it feel all the conflagration of the homesteads it ever destroyed. Deeper down let it fall, and in fiercer flame let it burn, till it has gathered into its heart all the suffering of eternity as well as time. In the name of the millions of graves of its victims, I curse it! The nations need more the spirit of treaty and less of the spirit of war, less of the Disraelian and more of the Gladstonian.

II. Again, by this national ceremony we mean to honor courage. Many of these departed soldiers were volunteers, not conscripts, and many of those who were drafted might have provided a substitute or got off on furlough or have deserted. The fact that they lie in their graves is proof of their bravery. Brave at the front, brave at cannon's mouth, brave on lonely picket duty, brave in cavalry charge, brave before the surgeon, brave in the dying message to the home circle. We to-morrow put a garland on the brow of courage. The world wants more of it.

The Church of God is in woeful need of men who can stand under fire. The lion of worldly derision roars and the sheep tremble. In great reformatory movements at the first shot how many fall back! The great obstacle to the Church's advancement is the inanity, the vacuity, the soft prettiness, the namby-pambyism of professed Christians. Great on a parade, cowards in battle. Afraid of getting their plumes ruffled, they carry a parasol over their helmet. They go into battle not with warriors' gauntlet but with kid gloves, not clutching the sword-hilt too tight lest the glove split at the back. Deliver us from a womanish man, his hair done up with curling tongs, and his feet going with girlish steps, nothing wanting but pantalets.

In all our reformatory and Christian work the great want is more backbone, more mettle, more daring, more prowess. We would in all our churches like to trade off a hundred do-nothings for one do-everything. "Quit yourselves like men: be strong."

"Thy saints in all this glorious war
Shall conquer, though they die;
They see the triumph from afar,
And seize it with their eye.

III. Again, we mean by this national observance to for others. To all these departed men home and kindred were as dear as our home and kindred are to us. Do you know how they felt? Just as you and I would feel starting out to-morrow morning with nine chances out of ten against our returning alive; for the intelligent soldier sees not only battle ahead but malarial sickness and exhaustion. Had these men chosen, they could have spent last night in their homes, and to-day have been seated where you are. They chose the camp, not because they liked it better than their own house, and followed the drum and fife, not because they were better music than the voices of the domestic circle. South Mountain and Murfreesboro, and the swamps of Chickahominy were not play-grounds.

These heroes risked and lost all for others. There is no higher sublimity than that. To keep three quarters for ourselves and give one quarter to others is honorable. To divide even with others is generous. To keep nothing for ourselves and give all for others is magnanimity Christ-like. Put a girdle around your body and then measure the girdle and see if you are fifty or sixty inches round. And is that the circle of your sympathies—the size of yourself? Or, to measure you around the heart would it take a girdle large enough to encircle the land and encircle the world? You want to know what we dry theologians mean when we talk of vicarious suffering. Look at the soldiers' graves to-morrow and find out. Vicarious! pangs for others, wounds for others, homesickness for others, blood for others, sepulchre for others.

Those who visit the national cemeteries to-morrow at Arlington Heights and at Richmond and Gettysburg will see one inscription on soldiers' tombs oftener repeated than any other—Unknown. When, six or seven years ago, I was called to deliver the oration at Arlington Heights, Washington, I was not as much impressed with the minute guns that shook the earth, or with the attendance of President and Cabinet and foreign ministers and generals of the army and commodores of the navy as with the pathetic and overwhelming suggestiveness of that epitaph on so many graves at my feet. Unknown! Unknown! It seems to me that the time must come when the Government of the United States shall take off that epitaph. They are no more unknown! We have found them out at last. They are the beloved sons of the Republic.

Would it not be well to take the statue of the heathen goddess off the top of the Capitol at Washington (for I have no faith in the morals of a heathen goddess) and put one great statue in all our national cemeteries—a statue of liberty in the form of a Christian woman with her hand on an open Bible and her foot on the Rock of Ages, with the other hand pointing down to the graves of the unknown, saying, "These are my sons who died that I might live." Take off the misnomer. Everybody knows them. It is of comparatively little importance what was the name given them in baptism of water. In the holier and mightier baptism of blood we know them, and to-morrow the nation puts both arms around them and hugs them to her, crying, "Mine forever!"

IV. Again, by this national ceremony we mean the FUTURE DEFENCE OF THIS NATION.

By every wreath of flowers on the soldiers' graves we say, "Those who die for the country shall not be forgotten," and that will give enthusiasm to our young men in case our nation should in the future need to defend itself in battle. We shall never have another war between North and South. The old decayed bone of contention, American slavery, has been cast out, although here and there a depraved politician takes it up to see if he can't gnaw something off it.

We are floating off farther and farther from the possibility of sectional strife. Rutherford B. Hayes wrought four years toward pacification, and President Garfield has no better man in his Cabinet than Secretary Hunt, of New Orleans, Louisiana. The great sectional contests which raged from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific for many years, has dwindled down and dwindled down till there is so little of it that a bear-garden at Albany to-day attracts the attention of all the nation.

No possibility of civil war. But about foreign invasion I am not so certain. When I spoke against war I said nothing against self-defence. An inventor told me the other day at Washington that he had invented a style of weapon which could be used in self-defence but not in aggressive warfare. I said, "When you get the nations to adopt that weapon you have introduced the millennium." I have no right to go on my neighbor's premises and assault him, but if some ruffian break into my house for the assassination of my family, and I can borrow a gun and load it in time and aim it straight enough, I will shoot him.

There is no room on this continent for any other nation—except Canada, and a better neighbor no one ever had. If you don't think so, go to Montreal and Toronto, and see how well they will treat you. Other than that there is absolutely no room for any other nation. I have been across the continent again and again, and know that we have not a half inch of ground for the gouty foot of foreign despotism to stand on. But I am not so sure that some of the arrogant nations of Europe may not some day challenge us. I do not know that those forts around New York Bay are to sleep all through the next century. I do not know that Barnegat lighthouse will not yet look off upon a hostile navy. I do not know but that a half dozen nations, envious of our prosperity, may want to give us a wrestle. During our civil war there were two or three nations that could hardly keep their hands off us. It is very easy to pick national quarrels, and if our nation escapes much longer it will be the exception.

IF FOREIGN FOE SHOULD COME,

we want men like those of 1812 and like those of 1862 to meet them. We want them all up and down the coast, Pulaski and Fort Sumter in the same chorus of thunder as Fort Lafayette and Fort Hamilton. Men who will not only know how to fight, but how to die. When such a time comes, if it ever does come, the generations on the stage of action will say, "My country will care for my family as they did in the soldiers' asylums for the orphans in the civil war, and my country will honor my dust as it honored those who preceded me in patriotic sacrifice, and once a year at any rate, on Decoration Day, I shall be resurrected into the remembrance of those for whom I died. Here I go for God and my country! Hurrah!"

If foreign foe should come, her old sectional animosities would have no power. Here go our regiments into the battle-field: Fifteenth New York volunteers, Tenth Alabama cavalry, Fourteenth Pennsylvania riflemen, Tenth Massachusetts artillery, Seventh South Carolina sharpshooters. And such a strong conjunction of officers: Blaine and Conkling and Garfield and Grant and Mahone and Cornell and Sherman, and all the stalwarts and half-breeds and full-bloods. I do not know but it may require the attack of some foreign foe to make us forget our absurd sectional wrangling. I have no faith in the cry, "No North, no South, no East, no West." Let all four sections keep their peculiarities and their preferences, each doing its own work and not interfering with each other, each of the four carrying its part in the great harmony—the bass, the alto, the tenor, the soprano—in the grand march of Union.

V. Once more, this great national ceremony means whether of those who fell in battle or accident, or who have expired in their beds or in our arms or on our laps. I suppose you have noticed that many of the families take this season as the time for the adornment of their family plots. This national observance has secured the arboriculture and floriculture of the cemeteries, the straightening up of many a slab planted thirty or forty years ago, and has swung the scythe through the long grass and has brought the stonecutter to call out the half-obliterated epitaph. This day is the benediction of the resting-place of father, mother, son, daughter, brother, sister.

It is all that we can do for them now. Make their resting-places attractive, not absurd with costly outlay, but in quiet remembrance. You know how. If you can afford only one flower, that will do. It shows what you would do if you could. One blossom from you may mean more than the Duke of Wellington's catafalque. Oh, we cannot afford to forget them. They were so lovely to us. We miss them so much. We will never get over it. Blessed Lord Jesus, comfort our broken hearts. From every bank of flowers breathes promise of resurrection.

In olden times the Hebrews, returning from their burial place, used to pluck the grass from the field three or four times, then throw it over their heads, suggestive of the resurrection. We pick not the grass, but the flowers, and instead of throwing them over our heads we place them before our eyes, right down over the silent heart that once beat with warmest love toward us, or over the still feet that ran to service, or over the lips from which we took the kiss at the anguish of the last parting. O my glorified father! O my sainted mother! O my beloved brothers and sisters! O my son!

MY SON! MY SON!

If you pass to-morrow near the new entrance of Greenwood, you who knew him will find his new-made grave. If you go that way, drop a flower on that mound. Your grief is mine, and my grief is yours. But stop! We are not infidels. Our bodies will soon join the bodies of our departed in the tomb, and our spirits shall join their spirits in the land of the rising sun. We cannot long be separated. Instead of crying with Jacob for Joseph, "I will go down into the grave unto my son, mourning," let us cry with David, "I shall go to him."

On one of the gates of Greenwood is the quaint inscription, "A night's lodging on the way to the city of the New Jerusalem." Comfort one another with these words. May the hand of Him who shall wipe away all tears from all eyes wipe your cheek with its softest tenderness. The Christ of Mary and Martha and Lazarus will enfold you in his arms. The white-robed angels who sat at the tomb of Jesus will yet roll the stone from the door of your dead in radiant resurrection. The Lord Himself shall descend from Heaven with a shout and the voice of the archangel. So the Dead March in Saul shall become the Hallelujah Chorus.

SAVED BY A FEW DROPS OF WATER.

By the Rev. F. Wagstaff.

WE who belong to the Band of Hope are often laughed at for drinking water. "I'd drink something better than water!" is often the cry; and it may do us good to remember how useful a thing water is. I could tell you a thousand purposes that water serves, for which nothing else would do as well; but to-day I want to tell you a simple story of how a few drops of water saved no less than five lives.

It was in a coal mine, of which there are several near where I live. One day, while the men were at work in one of these they heard a noise like thunder, in a moment every lamp was out, and all were in total darkness. Part of the mine had fallen in, and the stones, and coal, and rubbish had made several of them prisoners. This was on a Tuesday morning. The men who were at the pit's mouth came and collected all that were safe, and when they counted they found five were missing—four men and one little boy.

The men resolved to do their best to save them, and getting lights they made their way as far as they could till they came to the mass of stones and rubbish that had fallen. Were the five poor fellows killed underneath the mass, or were they shut in to die of starvation? They could not tell; but they were resolved to get them out if possible. They called and shouted, but there was no answer. Up go pickaxes and shovels to clear the way. It is a great labor and great risk.

After many hours' hard work, at night time, they heard something—every one stood still to listen. It was not a voice; only a tapping. It could just be heard; clink, clink, clink, clink, clink! Five times, as if a pickaxe had been struck against the stones; and then it stopped. Then they heard five more strokes, and then a stop. Five more and then another pause. What did it mean? One man guessed. There were five missing, and the five strokes were a signal that all five were alive and waiting for deliverance. The brave workmen went on at it with fresh courage, resolved to dig their comrades out.

Meanwhile, how did it fare with the prisoners? They were shut up in the dark—buried alive—and could do nothing but wait. They had a little food with them; but what should they do for water? They feared they must perish of hunger and thirst.

At first, in their excitement, they wandered about in the dark passages, quite hopeless; and after many hours had passed they sat down, too full of despair even to talk.

Presently amid the silence one of them heard a faint trickling sound It was water dripping from the rock. "It seems to me," said one, "as if this water was sent on purpose to put us in mind that God won't forsake us." They could only catch a few drops at a time in their hands; but these few drops gave them courage, and they sat down again to wait.

A little while after they could hear the sound of their friends at work for their deliverance, and feeling about in the dark they found some tools and began to work themselves. It was then that one of them thought of giving the signal of the five strokes hoping it would be understood. This was late on Tuesday night. Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and no rescue. The brave men outside worked hard, relieving each other in turns, but the space was narrow, and only a few could work at once.

The imprisoned men had exhausted all their food, and had nothing but the few drops of water to sustain them. They were too faint and feeble to work themselves, and as those outside heard no further signals, they feared they were dead. So Saturday came, and late in the afternoon the task was ended, and the prisoners were brought out faint and weak, but still alive, The few drops of water had saved five lives. Who shall say that water is a thing to be despised!

Picnicing with Savages—An "Odd-looking" Mortal—Native Vanity and Adornments—Jet Black Forest "Fops"—A Canoe Ride—The "Corrobora," or Young Men Coming of Age.

IT was a strange situation, that in which we then were—picnicing with savages in their own native wilds, and looking on at their pranks, and interpreting to ourselves, as well as we could, their post-prandial jokes. It was a variation certainly on dinners, and dining-rooms, and toasts, and speeches in either England or Ireland. Our dining-room was the forest, our dinner such as I lately described, old Eagle Hawk was our host, and did the honors, and his ladies gave us music by beating on opossum rugs stretched over their knees or rolled up between them, and by droning and howling their hideous songs, which had a kind of hoarse rhythm in them.

But let us do the savages justice. They were most hospitable to us, and maintained a degree of dignity in their bearing to each other; and, I can assure you, their jokes were some of them really witty; and altogether it was less savage than I have often seen at a feast among baptized heathens in Britain after a couple of quarts of potheen. It was interesting to mark the variety of height, features, temperaments, and dispositions among these natives. Man for man, I defy you to take at a venture out of any fair in Ireland, among "the finest peasantry in the world," fifteen straighter, taller, better chested, or better shouldered men. They were remarkably wiry and fleet of limb. The foreheads of some retreated sharply, their noses were flat, and nostrils wide; but some had heads as well formed as those of many white men. Some, like Jackey Wallangoon, were sullen and taciturn; some, like our friend Dick, merry as larks and talkative as parrots.

Once let the elevating and purifying influences of the Gospel of Christ be experienced by them, and they will show themselves to be a noble race of men, indeed, every way worthy of Him in whose image they and all of us were made.

One of the oddest-looking mortals I ever beheld was "Chinless Joey," or as the blacks much more significantly called him, "Coro"—the crow. His upper jaw and nose were enormous, his lower jaw appeared almost wanting, and his eyes were very large and white, and his voice like that of his native namesake. If you saw a real portrait of him you would say it was an ogre to frighten children. Even his own people looked upon him as ugly, and only one poor gin in the tribe would have him as her husband. I have no right, however, to say that his disposition was as repulsive as his looks. Indeed, I think that, like some rugged dark whites, Joey was rather kind-hearted and gentle, and much belied his looks. Very frequently a princely spirit inhabits a homely-looking body, even the matchless splendor of the Deity was once enshrined in mortal clay.

I observed some of the natives taking out with great care the small bone of the kangaroo's hind leg. This they polish with exquisite skill, and stick through a hole pierced for it in the partition of the nostrils. It is worn on state occasions, and gives a formidable appearance to the face, like a large second row of upper teeth. But manifestations of a similar kind of vanity are often made among civilized Christian people at home, therefore I must say nothing more about it.

Dick Nimagauley got a dozen kangaroos' teeth to take home as a present, to make a bracelet for the young woman—or child rather—to whom he was affianced; for blacks get betrothed to mere children, whom they treat with all the liberality their circumstances afford, thus winning their hearts against their wedding day, when the father or chief—generally the latter—gives the bride away to her future lord and master. I regret to add that this gallantry often ends with the setting of the honeymoon; and a blow of the waddy, or a wale with a stick, often reminds the weaker vessel of her lord's superiority.

Of course there must be jealousy among wives where there is more than one, but generally the first wife is chief of the seraglio, and the others obey. Some one always stands first in her husband's esteem and rules the rest. Many blacks, however, are so poor as only to have one wife all their days. They wonder that "white fellow hab many tousand sheep, and hundret dog, none gin only one—what for white fellow hab but one gin?" Of the dignity, sacredness, and equality of the one wife which the pure religion of our Redeemer has taught us, the poor black is too sunken to comprehend. Yet I believe there are, on the whole, fewer wife-murders or divorces among them than among much more polished folks.

I find myself, in the meantime, getting lost in a jungle of generalities. I must back to our sporting expedition with the natives. Old Eagle Hawk talked in pure Warragera with the two Wallagundery blacks. We soon saw it was resolved that but three of the Baroo clan should go to the corrobora. A few words from the old Hawk made the gins cut junks of bark, and on them, as trays, take up the remains of the feast and the dissected joints of the kangaroos. It is perfectly astonishing how much a gin can carry on a sheet of bark on her head, while she carries her picaninny in her narrabung on her shoulders, and smokes her pipe, if she has one.

I suppose old Eagle Hawk wished to show off a bit before us, for he equipped himself in triumphant hunter's trim. He stuck some brass spears in the fillet round his head, his kangaroo bone through his nose, and a couple of kangaroo tails in his belt. He also slung three opossum skins from his left shoulder; and as, holding his wammerah in one hand, and some three or four long spears in the other, he marched off, the men followed him in Indian file, and the gins in a mob brought up the rear.

The women, too, each had any bit of forest finery they could parade. One had a red handkerchief round her neck; another some tatters of a blue bed-gown round her waist, in a style the most grotesque. I do avow that such sights—and I often saw them afterward on a larger scale—are among the most picturesque and laughable I ever saw. I am always inclined to stand and look and laugh at that thing you call a fop; but no denizen dandies I ever saw surpassed the pomp and strut of these jet-black forest fops. They were shining with grease, which to them is a real luxury, as it lubricates the skin, keeping it from dryness and the brain from sunstroke, and making them as slippery and as hard to hold as an eel. They generally mix red earth with the melted fat. Our old Eagle Hawk was anointed with fresh oil and earth; and he returned home as vain as a peacock, and, in his way, as fine as the pink of the Sydney swell mob.

Dick Nimagauley, Tommy Narang, and a powerful fellow, fameus for throwing the spear, Miall Willy, accompanied us, together with the two strangers. When evening came we had passed over some fifteen or twenty miles of a thinly wooded and ill-grassed country; and we rested on the bank of the Macquarie till morning. Many splendid trees grew on the banks of this river, which, like nearly all rivers in Australia, has two sets of banks—one for summer and another for winter. As it was the middle of summer we camped within the winter banks, under a knot of flooded gums. Never, as at this time, surrounded as I was by so many proofs of the handiwork of God, did I comprehend the significance of the Psalmist's statement, "The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord."

Never did I see before, and seldom since, so many opossums as came out to feed on the trees and on the ground. They are nocturnal in their habits, and were most agile and playful, and came nibbling and squeaking quite close to us. The blacks, standing under the trees, "jobbed" a lot of them for their skins; and Ash succeeded in capturing a young flying squirrel, which lost its hold and fell stunned beside us. It was a beautiful little creature. The old ones can leap, or rather fly, forty or fifty feet at a downward bound from branch to branch or from tree to tree. They are formed on the principle of the bat. When they stretch themselves for a leap the skin between the fore and hind legs expands and catches the air, and breaks the fall. They have a certain motion like the flapping of a bird in leaping, which helps to keep them up; and they can steer themselves by the tail. Ash carried the little creature nearly the whole of the following day.

You remember that various creature, Bill Arnell—who was often called the "God-fearing tailor," and the "drunken tailor," and was, from the peculiar motion of those legs, broken in his country's service, called the "flying tailor." Had his skin been so loose that, when he stretched out his arms and legs, it would have extended from his little finger to his little toe, straight down along each side, and had he but a long and suitable tail to hang or steer by, he would have been a great human flying squirrel. When I told this to Ash he said there once had been such creatures, called pterodactyles—the flying reptiles (not tailors) of the earth before Adam.

Next morning we were awakened by a chorus of our friends the laughing jackasses, who made the woods and banks echo with their grotesque imitations of all sorts of sounds. This place, so near the river, was evidently a favorite resort of theirs, and they were vexed with our intrusion.

We found the blacks in high preparation to "catch munge"—fish. Dick had been acting, with dancing and grimace, the pantomime of the opossum fastening on Ash's head. They were on the bank beneath a great stringy bark tree, not mending, but making, their net. This is always done by the gins when they are present. We were interested in the process. When finished, it was put on a hoop of sapling, and formed a crescent drag-net. This again was tied on a long pole of currywang wattle, and with it they dragged several little bays and nooks in the river, and pulled out lots of small fresh-water cod, or Peel's perch, for breakfast. They also got a kind of fresh-water mussel which they eat; but we did not fancy it.

When we had breakfasted on fresh opossum and fish, with damper, we thought of our journey; but Dick said, "You first-rate black fellow. You bell jerran yan along canoe." ("You are first-rate black fellows. You are not afraid to go on the river in a canoe.") "Certainly not afraid, Dick; I swim like a duck; but where is the canoe?" "Buggerie canoe along a waddy" ("Beautiful canoe on that tree"), said Dick. A great tree was leaning over the river, with a bend in its trunk. They set to work with tomahawks, and marked out on the bark a canoe of about twenty feet long. In less than half an hour they had raised it up with their spear ends; and, all letting it down gently, we launched a ready-made canoe that carried the seven of us for twenty miles down the stream.

I afterward, with five weighty men, rode forty miles down the Lachlan in one similarly constructed, only, as it had less of a bend in it, we stopped its ends with grass, bitumen, and bark. We put seats across it, and the natives made it spin along with paddles where the water was sufficiently smooth and deep. Never in my life did I enjoy a wilder or more joyous excursion than with Dick and his company down the Macquarie to the Wallangundery corrobora. The weather was lovely. The banks of the river curved and wound through varied scenery. Flocks of water-fowl, ducks, teal, and swans rose from the river; and glittering clouds of parrots, of all hues and screams, rose from the trees by the banks. If it had not been for sin, the work of God's ancient enemy, the devil, which has so dishonored the human race and disfigured the fair earth with a curse, how beautiful the world would be. In a region like this one can imagine what the "New Earth" will be like, "wherein dwelleth righteousness," of which St. Peter speaks, and which will one day succeed the present earth, when conflict with evil shall close for ever in abiding triumph and holy peace.

At a bend in the river I shot a large swan. Our strange blacks could not have been much accustomed to see firearms; for though they sat steady, their eyes showed a larger margin of white, and they jabbered in excited tones, and looked at my double-barrel as if it were the dreaded Devil-devil's own implement—or even that black and fiery personage himself. The swan could not have been less than twenty pounds weight. He had jet-black outer feathers, and beautiful white and azure down beneath. Ash kept his skin for stuffing; and as he was full of fat, the blacks got that as a rare delicacy to anoint themselves with for the ball that night. His flesh was more relished by the blacks than by us, as it tasted rather fishy.

We drew up our canoe on the bank; and after a walk of about four miles we came to the scene of the intended corrobora. Before night the gins with their connois dug a circle in the ground, like what a horse might move in while turning a mill. In the centre they raised a pile of dry wood and bark. As it grew dark they took their seats at some distance around, and about twenty young men—natives of course—seated themselves in the circle. Two old men went into the circle and fastened a cat gut-like cord of kangaroo sinew round the cutting-tooth, next they eye-tooth, on the right side of the upper jaw, in each of them. The cords were tied together. The gins began slowly beating time on the opossum rugs, and the crowd began to gather. They were evidently waiting for something to come. When it grew quite dark there was a dead hush.

Suddenly a booming and a whirring burst on the ear, and a sensation thrilled through all. This was the magic man, or crajee, coming from the forest, with a broad thin lath, nicked in the edges, tied to a kangaroo thong, and swung round his head to make this deep mysterious sound. When he drew near the dry pile of sticks blazed up, and it revealed such a scene as none can see but at the grand solemn corrobora that makes young men—the high mass, the grand masonic ceremony, of the Australian blacks.

As the fire blazed the gins began their beating time and singing in low rhythmic chant. The crajee came forward, tall and stately, daubed all over with gum, and covered with the down and feathers of the eagle-hawk.

A LAST CHAPTER OF SATANIC HISTORY.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Earth Originally Satan's Kingdom—Passages Misunderstood—Recognition of his Position—The Temptation—An Astronomical Aspect—Saul's Enmity to David a Type—Satan's Place in the Air—His Eviction from the Air.

THE connection of that great evil intelligence whom the Scriptures speak of as "the dragon, the old serpent, which is the devil and Satan," with our world and our race, since the day when by his successful temptation of our unfallen progenitors he "brought death into the world and all our woe," is a subject full of mysterious and terrible interest. The secret of his intense and unrelenting enmity to man is one of those which it has not pleased God clearly to reveal in His inspired Word; but, inferentially at least, there is much to favor the opinion entertained by the late Rev. George Stanley Faber, Mr. G. H. Pember, and other writers, that, previous to the creation of Adam's race, and before it fell into the chaotic state so graphically described in the second verse of the first chapter of the Book of Genesis, this earth was the kingdom over which Satan exercised a Divinely-delegated rule: and from which, in consequence of transgression, he was afterward deposed; man being elected in the Divine sovereignty to fill the vacant throne.

It may, perhaps, appear to be a somewhat serious objection to this supposition, that the fall of Lucifer, or Satan, is generally understood to have taken place in heaven, not on earth. This is, no doubt, the rabbinical and Miltonic account, but the Sciptures nowhere assert it. There are, it is true, a few passages which seem to lend it some countenance, but these need only to be examined in order to show how unstable a basis they afford. These passages are the following:

Isaiah 14:12: "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cast down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations!"

Luke 10:18: "And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven."

Revelation 12:7; "And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him."

"Whatever may be the general impression," observes an able writer, "which the reading of such passages may produce upon an unthinking mind, a very slight examination of each is sufficient to satisfy us that not the slightest indication is afforded in any of them of Satan having ever been really a prince in heaven.

"The first passage has no reference to Satan whatever, but applies to the king of Babylon whose power and dignity are represented as exalting him to heaven; and when that power and dignity were overthrown, he is represented as being cast down to the ground. It need scarcely be remarked that the king of Babylon never was in heaven. Even if the passage, therefore, had referred to Satan, the figure which is employed would not have been sufficient to prove that he was in heaven; but it has palpably no reference to him whatever.

"The second passage is not more conclusive than the first. It is true indeed that it is Satan who is spoken of as falling from heaven; but our Lord was speaking of the effect which the mission of the seventy disciples had produced when they went forth healing diseases, and casting out devils wherever they went; and the heaven from which he fell was the very same heaven from which the king of Babylon fell. It was the heaven of power and influence upon earth, not the heaven which is inhabited by angels. A few verses before the same figurative language is applied to Capernaum. This passage, therefore, as well as the other, refuses to countenance the idea of Satan having been expelled from heaven."

As for Revelation 12:7, it is even less available than either of the others, inasmuch as it refers to events which are still future. Of this we shall have to speak presently.

But while there is thus no evidence of a positive kind to be found in Scripture in proof of Satan having ever been a prince in heaven, there are, at the same time, suggestive though indirect indications that this world of ours was his original principality. Few things, I apprehend, must have struck the thoughtful and careful student of Scripture as more remarkable than the apparent recognition, not only by prophets and apostles, but even by our Lord Himself, of in relation to this world. Thus he is spoken of as "the prince of this world," and "the god of this age" (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11; Ephesians 2:2). And our Lord, in one of His minor parables, represents him as "the strong man armed," and this world as "his palace," in which "his goods are in peace" (Luke 11:21). And even when, face to face with the God of glory, he confidently claimed, as his undisputed right, "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them," saying, "All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them; for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will I give it. If thou, therefore, wilt worship me, all shall be thine" (Luke 4:5-7). The amazing claim was not denied.

Now, how are we to account for this? If the rabbinical and Miltonian account of the fall of Satan from heaven be accepted—if Satan was originally one of the angels of the third heaven—then he is plainly a mere audacious intruder in the affairs of our world; nay, his very presence within this earthly sphere is a mystery. "Let us suppose," says the writer I have already quoted, "for a moment, that Satan was once in heaven, wherever that may be; we might well inquire, What should bring him to this particular planet of the solar system if he did not originally belong to it? Formerly, when heaven and earth were considered a fair and exhaustive division of the universe, nothing could be more natural than to suppose that if Satan was cast out from heaven, there was no other place than the earth to receive him.

"But looking at the world in an astronomical point of view, and supposing that Satan was cast out of heaven, it seems hard to believe that he and his angels should have been able to make the journey to our planet. Or, supposing them to have been able to make the journey, it is difficult to understand what would make them think of coming here, and remaining so long. So that if Satan be the prince of this planet, and of this planet only, it seems quite unaccountable how he and his subordinate hosts should have come into the possession and lordship of this earth on any other supposition than that of its having been the place of their nativity."

If, then, this theory may be accepted, the secret of Satan's undying enmity against man is at once revealed. "The Lord hath rent the kingdom from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbor of thine that is better than thou" (1 Samuel 15:28). So spake Samuel to King Saul at Gilgal, after the Lord had rejected him from being king over Israel. And these solemn words seem susceptible of a higher application. Though Saul still continued to rule for a time de facto, he had ceased to be king de jure; for the sentence of deposition had been passed upon him, and David was the Lord's anointed, destined in due time to occupy the throne which Saul, by his disobedience and rebellion, had forfeited. And as it was between Saul and David, so also would it be between Satan and Adam.

After Satan's fall man was, in the Divine sovereignty, made the inheritor of his forfeited kingdom, the crown fallen from the head of the latter being placed on that of the former. The human nature was exalted and crowned with glory and honor, while the angelic nature was cast down and cast out. How cruel a blow must this have been to Satan's pride! How awful a provocation to his murderous cruelty and revenge! Can we wonder, if this was actually the case, that it created a very hell in Satan's soul, and inspired the unceasing hatred with which he has pursued the race of Adam to this hour?

Unable to brook the presence of a rival throne, or more probably driven out by the tremendous convulsions which reduced the earth to the chaotic condition which we find described in Genesis 1:2, Satan had forsaken the earth ere Adam appeared upon it invested with dominion over all the works of God's hands. Henceforth he became "the prince of the powers of the air" (Ephesians 2:2); the king and leader of the "wicked spirits in the aerial regions" (Ephesians 6:12). In the place of thunder and tempest, the vast arsenal of the most potent forces of nature—with which, by popular instinct, he is so generally associated—he built his unstable throne, and organized his great confederation against our race.

"The angels that fell," says Athenagorus, "have their present station in the atmosphere, and around the earth." And this certainly seems to be taught us in the title bestowed by the apostle on Satan. Why call him "the prince of the powers of the air," unless, in truth, he has some special connection with the atmospheric heavens? On Ephesians 6:12, the Rev. G. S. Faber writes: "Our translators somewhat vaguely render the original 'against spiritual wickedness in high places.' Its proper rendering is 'Against spiritual wickedness in the higher region of the heavens;' not, of course, those heavens which are the regions of holiness and happiness, but simply and exclusively the relatively higher region of the atmospheric heavens."

Such, then, is Satan's present position in relation to man and his world. Though free to "go to and fro in the earth, and walk up and down in it"—sometimes "as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour," and sometimes "transformed into an angel of light"—his special abode and seat of government is in the aerial heavens, and his lawful style and title, "the prince of the powers of the air." But the things concerning him have not yet an end; there is still one dark and terrible chapter of his history to be written, and the light of prophecy falls on it so fully and clearly that its main incidents can be indicated without doubt or hesitation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Exciting Senatorial Struggle at Albany has during the past week engrossed the attention of all who take an interest in political affairs. Not only are ex-Senators Conkling and Platt candidates for re-election, but they are so anxious about the result that they have visited the State capital to conduct the campaign in person. Protracted conferences in their hotel have been frequent, and personal overtures have been made to such of the State Senators and Assemblymen as are supposed to belong to the anti-Stalwart wing of the party. The Vice-President has assisted in the campaign, and even General Grant has written a letter urging the re-election of Messrs. Conkling and Platt. Every conceivable effort appears to have been made by the ex-Senators and their friends to secure their re-election, but that issue is not as yet regarded as certain.

The situation is perplexing to all who are sufficiently disinterested to take a calm view of the subject. All the reasons urged in justification of the resignation seem inconsistent with this active candidature. If the former was intended as a display of dignity, the latter is certainly an act of humiliation of a more decided character. If the Senators resigned as a matter of principle, the indorsement of their act ought to have been spontaneous and unsolicited. If they sought to have their position in the United States Senate strengthened, the difficulty they experience in securing a re-election renders them weaker than they were before. These and like considerations suggest an explanation all who admire Mr. Conkling's brilliant abilities are reluctant to accept—namely, that the resignation was a political blunder, and the candidature is an effort to retrieve it.

The most vexatious aspect of the affair is that the whole question is so utterly sordid on both sides. The conflict is not on a question of national policy, like the tariff, or the currency, or the Indian question ; it is simply a vulgar quarrel over the distribution of the spoils. The character of all who have engaged in it—the President, the Secretary of State, and the two Senators—has been lowered in public esteem by the dispute.

A Bill to Regulate the Cleaning of the Streets of New York City has at length been agreed upon by the Conference Committee at Albany. While it is pretended that it is based on the Citizens' bill it contains provisions which nullify the principle of that bill. Under its operation the Mayor can neither appoint nor remove an officer without the concurrence of the three members of the Board of Health, one of whom is largely responsible for the present disgraceful condition of our thoroughfares. The mutilated bill is, however, accepted by the citizens with resignation. It cannot make things worse than they are without rendering the streets wholly impassable, and there is a possibility of the Mayor and the Board of Health agreeing upon some efficient superintendent. It is understood that the Mayor will nominate Commander Gorringe, who proved his ability by transporting the obelisk from Alexandria to New York. Should he be appointed to this more formidable task of removing the filth from our streets and succeed in performing it, he may yet be the means of saving the city from a pestilence, which if it visited this centre of trade would inevitably spread throughout the land.

One of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South lately stated that he had entered into conversation, in the railroad cars, with a gentlemen of Carroll County, Ga., regarding the measure adopted by the inhabitants forbidding the sale of intoxicating beverages ; and that the gentleman had given him a fact in his own experience as city marshal of Carrollton in that county. It appeared that he used to draw an income of from $1200 to $1500 a year in fees and dues in connection with the city prison, but that the first year after the sale of intoxicants was stopped his income from that source fell to $500, and the second year was nothing at all. The gentleman also informed the bishop that several leading citizens of Carrollton had opposed the measure on the ground that it would keep away business men from the town, but that in fact the trade exactly doubled itself in twelve months after the wholesome law was enacted.

Fifty-one Thousand Sunday-school Children in line was the interesting spectacle witnessed in Brooklyn on May 25th, when all the Sunday-schools of the city celebrated anniversary day. This was the fifty-second anniversary celebration, and the large number of children and teachers present testified that the interest in Sunday-schools is not declining. There were seven divisions, subdivided into 127 sections, each representing one Sunday-school. The Mayor, the President of the Sunday-school Union, and other friends reviewed the procession from the stand in Prospect Park.

A Ceremony of Cheering Significance was witnessed at Richmond, Va., on May 26th, when the Boston Commandery of Knights Templars, marched to Capitol Square, and, forming around the statue of Stonewall Jackson, stood with heads uncovered, and while their band played a memorial overture the knight in command moved forward and placed at the base of the monument a beautiful wreath of evergreens and rare flowers. This tribute from brave New Englanders to the great Confederate general, occurring, as it did, on Memorial Day," was deeply affecting, and moved some of the spectators to tears. The Commandery then marched to the Washington Monument, within the same grounds, and decorated it also.

An Appalling Steamboat Disaster which Occurred at London, Ont., on May 24, surpasses in its fatal results all the catastrophes of last summer. No less than two hundred and forty dead bodies have already been recovered from the wreck, and it is feared that many more are buried in the bed of the river under portions of the steamer. The narratives of surviving passengers and of the captain and officers of the boat differ as to the details of the disaster. It appears, however, that the Victoria was on its return trip to London from Spring Bank, laden with excursionists who had been celebrating Queen Victoria's birthday by a pleasure trip. Their number is variously estimated from 450 to 700. The steamer was licensed to carry 400, and the excessive weight brought her main deck to the level with the water's edge. She listed heavily to starboard, and as the people moved from side to side the oscillation of the vessel alarmed the captain, who called to the passengers to go to the port side. A rush was made, and the steamer lurched so heavily to port that the decks were in an almost perpendicular position, and many passengers slid off. Then the boiler which was placed on the lower deck, and was not properly supported, rolled over, carrying with it the supports of the upper decks. Then an indescribable scene of horror ensued ; the upper decks with their passengers fell on those beneath, killing some and burying others in the ruin, while the water surged over all. The steamer Princess Louise promptly came to the rescue, and several boats were dispatched from the shore, but it was impossible to extricate the drowning people from the timbers which held them under water in time to save their lives. Those who witnessed the scene describe it as heart-rending in the extreme.

The Revised New Testament.—An Erroneous impression prevails as to the suggestions of the American Company. The Appendix contains a large number of suggestions which the English Company did not approve, but those constitute but a small portion of the whole number made by the American Company. The bulk of them were accepted by the English Company, and are incorporated in the text.

A Solemn Question was Addressed to the citizens of Boston recently from the pulpit by Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D. After referring to the sin of Sabbath-breaking, which, he asserted, is now brooding over New England like an eclipse, he spoke of the liquor traffic, and said that in 1879 Massachusetts had derived from it $500,000. She not only gave her sanction to the business, but thus made herself a direct partner in it. It is a question for Christians to consider, Shall Massachusetts give her legal sanction to a business that is the source of more sin and crime and wretchedness than all other causes combined? The time is fast approaching when that question will be the most prominent one in all our State capitals and political conventions.

A Narrow Escape from a Living Tomb is reported from Colorado. The recent earthquake shock, which was felt in many places in the West, was most severe in the vicinity of the Twin Lakes, where it caused great consternation and alarm among the miners. Some men were engaged in blasting in a tunnel connected with the Steadfast lode, when the rumbling began. A dull roar like distant thunder was succeeded by a shock which dislodged a considerable mass of ore. When the vibration ceased, the men found that the entrance to the tunnel had been nearly closed by the falling rocks, and that two miners, named Adams and Sedgwick, had been seriously injured. The orifice through which they escaped was barely large enough to admit the passage of a man's body.

A Lawsuit over Three Cents is being Tried, according to the Republican, of Scranton, Pa. One of the suitors, it was alleged, had neglected to give the other three cents due him in change, and after a considerable lapse of time, being irritated by some act of apparent injustice, he sued for the three cents in the courts. The case was unusually vexatious and frivolous, but there are many other lawsuits which indicate a disregard of the divine command (Matt. 5 : 40, 41).

A Jewish Mayor is Enforcing the Sunday Observance laws in Florida. The mayor of Jacksonville, Fla., who is a Jew, but as an honest man and a good citizen, having sworn to see that the laws are executed, is enforcing the laws which require the closing of stores and shops on Sunday. This is much more than nominally Christian mayors in some cities have the disposition or courage to do.

A Warning to Lawless Anti-Chinese Agitators has been pronounced by Recorder Smyth of New York, in sentencing to thirty months one of a gang of young roughs who broke into the laundry of a Chinaman, on Eighth Avenue, assaulted the laundryman and his assistant, and carried off $50. The Recorder said : " It has become the custom in other cities to look on the Chinese laundrymen with disfavor. Roughs like you, who spend most of their time in idleness and debauchery, while the Chinese are acquiring an honest livelihood, fancy they have full license to beat, rob, and even kill them. However successful this mob rule may have been in other cities, I desire to announce officially that its course here, so far as this court has power to prevent it, shall be short-lived and unpleasant. The severe punishment I impose upon you may be expected by all those who disturb the peace and dignity of the community by outrageous attacks upon those who, to all appearances, are inoffensive."

A Scene of Dissipation was Suddenly Changed into one of terror and death at St. Joseph, Mo., on May 24th. A travelling minstrel combination were rehearsing in the basement of a saloon about nine in the evening, when an explosion suddenly occurred, and the whole building collapsed like a house of cards. The basement was divided, the front portion being used for storage purposes for Danforth's fluid, and the latter for a rehearsal-room, where large crowds of colored folks have been wont to gather nightly. It is presumed that when the rear room was lighted the fluid in the front room was accidentally ignited, causing the explosion. The floor over the cellar was occupied as a liquor store and billiard-room, and was kept by a colored man. A number of negroes were in the place at the time, several of whom lost their lives. The concussion blew the walls of the building outward, and several who were blown out with the walls found themselves in the debris, from which they were rescued more or less bruised.

The Governor of Pennsylvania and his Catechism.—When a child, Governor Hoyt of Pennsylvania learned the Shorter Catechism, and the other day he said: "If anybody wants to ask me any of the one hundred and seven questions, I am ready to give him the answer. I don't live up to the Catechism, perhaps, as well as I ought, but it is one of the things I claim to know." Knowledge of the Catechism is not generally considered one of the essential qualifications for aspirants to political office, but we may be sure that the Governor of a great State is no less efficient for being possessed of such knowledge. This would be a new kind of Civil Service Reform, if we put every candidate for office through a course of questioning in the Shorter Catechism.

"The American Hebrew," a Jewish Journal published in New York, publishes a letter from a prominent member of the Jewish community referring to Mr. Laurence Oliphant's project of colonizing the Holy Land with Jews. It shows that the hope of returning to the Land of Promise is not abandoned, as some would have us believe. The following is an extract from the letter:

"Reformers in this country only abandon the doctrine of the re-establishment of our state. Orthodox Jews do not; and while they declare that it does not necessarily imply that all the Jews in the world shall be caged up between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean, any more than all Americans are in America, or all Frenchmen in France, they say, and with justice, that the geographical position and extreme fertility of Palestine point to a grand future for it as soon as it is rescued from the incapable government of the Sublime Porte, sublime only in its indifference to progress in all parts of its unhappy empire. Now, as an attentive reader of the Bible, I cannot but be struck with the fact that the realization of Mr. Oliphant's plan would be a wonderful coincidence when compared with the announcement of the sacred volume. A colonization of Palestine by the Jews, with the sanction and assistance of the various kings and potentates, would be in strict accordance with such passages as Isaiah 49: 22, 23; 50: 3, 4, 5, etc."

A Cunning Plot to Obtain a Copy of the Revised Version of the New Testament before the day fixed for its issue, was devised and tried upon Dr. Philip Schaff, chairman of the American Revision Committee. A letter was presented to him, dated from the steamer Brittanic, purporting to be written by Mr. Frowde, the London agent of the Oxford University Press. In the letter the writer said: "I have some friends who came out with me, and who are en route to Japan, on work connected with the Church, and I much desire to explain to them some points in connection with the Revised Testament. I can't get at my box—in which I have a number of copies, and where I placed them for safety—until to-morrow some time. These gentlemen go away on the evening train, West, and I desire a copy for a few hours only. Were it Monday, I could secure a copy with ease. If you will kindly permit the bearer to bring me a copy to my hotel, the Fifth Avenue, I will esteem it a great favor, and will return the book this evening or to-morrow forenoon, just as you desire, and I will protect it in every particular." Dr. Schaff was too cautious for the schemers, and the copy was not sent. The unprincipled plotter was not prompted to the act by anxiety to read God's word, but by the fact that if he had succeeded he could have sold the book to a publisher for two thousand dollars. The plot failed, and its author was probably grievously disappointed; but if he were prayerfully to read the New Testament he might find an eternal prize which even a much larger sum would not tempt him to surrender (Psa. 119: 72).

Prohibition by Purchase Appears to be growing in favor. Since the Town Meeting at Clayden, N. J., mentioned two weeks ago, where all the intoxicating liquor in the town was cast on a bonfire, an arrangement has been made whereby another town, that of Berwick, Pa., will be free from the traffic for a year. The arrangement was made by the Jackson & Woodin Company, who employ more than a thousand men in their mills and car shops. They called the saloon and hotel keepers together and offered to pay them what profit would accrue on their liquor sales for the coming year if they would abstain from selling; it was estimated at $6000. The liquor dealers finally agreed to do this, and the money was paid over. The managers of the company believe that the purchase will prove remunerative in the improved morals and industrial capacity of the workpeople, although higher motives prompted the act.

The Prospects of the South form the Subject of a report written by a special correspondent of the New York Tribune, who is now on a tour in the Southern States. In the course of a long and detailed narrative of the scenes through which he passed he makes two remarks which have especial significance as evidence of the revival of a spirit pregnant with hope for the future. He says: "I have attended several temperance conventions and meetings for the promotion of education in different Southern States, in which white and black men have participated without any discoverable manifestation of prejudice against color or race, and I think there is not now any serious difficulty about the people of the two races working together for any such practical interest."

In another part of his letter he adds: "Lincoln's portrait is seen even more frequently than Davis's, while the likenesses of Generals Grant and Sherman are very common. Southern men everywhere speak with much animation of the great kindness and magnanimity of Grant and Sherman to the Southern soldiers at the close of the war."

A Roman Catholic Priest at Philadelphia has issued an appeal to his co-religionists in the city, urging them to remove their children from the public schools, and 375 children have been withdrawn in consequence. The alleged cause is, that one of the teachers has been honorably acquitted of a charge brought against her by the priest. It was asserted that in explaining to the children the historical facts of the Reformation she had imparted denominational instruction. The priest is said to have made no provision for the education of the children, who are now idling about the streets. It would appear that he prefers them to remain uneducated rather than they should acquire a knowledge of facts, which must, if taught at all, be taught in their integrity.

A Lawsuit which has been Thirty Years Before the courts in different forms reached another stage in its progress a few days ago. It is the suit of the Liverpool, New York and Philadelphia Steamship Company, to recover $1,093,000, paid as head-money on immigrants brought by the vessels of the company. Chief Justice Taney of the United States Supreme Court, and all the Associate Judges except Judge Nelson, wrote opinions as to the constitutionality of the law requiring a payment of $1 for each immigrant. In 1878 Congress passed a law making valid the collection of head-money already made, and declaring that no suit should be maintained to recover the money. Judge Shipman decided in favor of the Commissioners of Emigration, that the act of Congress was constitutional, and dismissed the company's complaint. The company will appeal to the United States Supreme Court, so that it is possible that all the original parties may die before the end is reached.

THE PRIEST ORDAINED BY THE OATH OF GOD.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And inasmuch as not without an oath he was made priest: (for those priests were made without an oath; but this with an oath by him that said unto him, The Lord sware and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec:) by so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament."—HEB. 7: 20–22.

A Key-word—The Betterness of Christ—I. His Special Ordination to the Priesthood—Why Confirmed with an Oath—His Greater Dignity—Eternal Character of His Work—A Larger Lie Than Ordinary—God's Ultimatum—The Reality of His Priesthood—The Oath Strengthens Faith—II. The Covenant Superior—The "If" in the Covenant—IV. His Relationship to the Covenant—How Jesus is a Surety—On God's Part—On our Behalf—Rejection, Eternal Suicide.

THOSE of you who read Scripture carefully will have noticed that the word "better" is one of the key-words of the Epistle to the Hebrews. You are constantly meeting with it. In the opening chapter we read that our Lord Jesus Christ is "made so much better than the angels, as He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they." Look a little further and you are taught that He is better than Moses, inasmuch as Moses was faithful as a servant in the Lord's house, but Christ as a Son over His own house. Further on we find our blessed Lord described as better than Aaron, while His blood is mentioned as speaking better things than that of Abel; and He is declared in our text to be the surety of a better covenant, of which it is said that it is established upon better promises.

It would be a very delightful subject to work out the betterness of Christ, and of His blood, and of His covenant, and to show that however good other things may be, they must all yield in excellence to Him. It is implied in the use of the word "better" that the ordinances of the ceremonial law were good in their place, but Jesus is better than the best of all visible things; the eternal Christ is better than the best of all the temporal arrangements which God has made for the good of man. How much better what heart shall conceive? "If the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory. For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious."

It behooves us, my dear brothers and sisters, to have a firmer faith than Old Testament saints, because we see more clearly our ground of trust. Those who lived in the comparative darkness of the previous dispensation were saved by faith, and among them there were not a few eminent believers; surely we also ought to excel in our confidence in God. Let the eleventh of Hebrews stand as a triumphal arch with the names of ancient believers recorded thereon; these all died in faith, and they were no mean men; but inasmuch as we enjoy a brighter light, and are living under a better economy, we are called upon to be their superiors in faith.

My object at this time will not be so much to enter into details of doctrine concerning our Saviour's priesthood as to utter practical truths, and press them on the heart. I shall not attempt to exhaust so wonderful a subject as the parallel between Melchisedec and Christ, but I shall try to strengthen the faith of believers, and also to leave unbelievers without excuse if they will not believe in Jesus Christ, whom God hath sent, confirming His mission by an oath. We want practical results this morning, and no practical result will content us but this, that ye believe on Jesus Christ, whom God hath sent.

To our text, then, and may the Spirit of God graciously be with us in speaking upon it.

I. Men should believe in Jesus Christ with their whole heart and rely upon Him with unstaggering confidence; first, because of

to the priesthood. The Lord Jesus Christ was ordained to the priesthood, according to the hundred and tenth Psalm, in a manner distinct from all others. His ordination was unique, for neither Aaron, nor his sons, nor any of the priests of the tribe of Levi, were ever ordained by an oath. Ceremonies most important, imposing, instructive, and impressive were performed, but there was no oath.

God gave promises to the house of Levi, but He expressly stopped short of anything like an oath to them, not because His promise can be broken, but because that promise was conditional, and must not be confirmed by an oath, as though it constituted a perpetual engagement. But our Saviour is made a priest by an oath, and it is written as if to make it exceeding sure, "The Lord hath sworn and will not repent;" not because God ever can or doth repent, or run back from His oath in any case, but for the confirmation of our faith in the immutability of His word it is expressly added "He will not repent." By an oath which standeth fast for evermore Christ is made a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec. But and none for other priests? First, because of the greater dignity of Christ above all other priests that ever were, for He is the Son of the Highest, as they were not. They were men that had infirmity, but He is sinless; they lived and died, and so were changed, but "thy throne, O God, is forever and ever." They were ordained to be types and emblems, serving for the time of Israel's infancy, but He came as the "I am," the substance of the whole. They were mere men and nothing more, but Jesus counted it not robbery to be equal with God, though for our sakes He assumed our nature. It seemed becoming that God should settle Him in the priesthood by an oath, seeing He is above all, and infinitely superior to all others that have ever exercised the priesthood.

I tremble while I speak of the oath of God; for God's lifting His hand to Heaven and swearing by Himself, because He can swear by no greater, is something so solemn that one scarcely dares to think of it. The Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain. The devout soul is full of awe at the bare thought of God in His most fatherly and ordinary acts, but how shall we think of the Lord girt with solemnity, resolute in purpose, stern in truth, as lifting His hand and taking an oath? Surely this is the innermost sanctuary of mystery, the holy of holies.

This oath was for the honor of His dear Son as He assumed the sacred priesthood on behalf of the sons of men. The glory of His character, the dignity of His work, the certainty of its accomplishment, and the supreme excellence of His motive in entering upon it, all lift up the priesthood of Christ out of the category of all human priesthoods, and therefore the eternal Father signalizes it by a special mark of distinction, and Himself makes oath that His only-begotten Son is a priest forever after the order of Melcheisedec.

Another reason is found in the eternal character of His work. The priesthood of Aaron and his successors was intended to be temporary. God did not confirm the priests of old in their offices, because He held in reserve the right to set them aside when He pleased, and He from the first intended that their functions should be abolished when the fulness of time should come for another and better priest to take their place. They were candles for the darkness, but the sun was to rise, and then they would not be needed; they were pictorial representations, but when the substance was come they would not be required. He allowed their priesthood to be one of imperfect men, because He intended by and by to supersede it by a perfect and enduring priesthood; hence no oath of God attended the ordination of the sons of Aaron.

But our Lord Jesus Christ's priesthood, and all the economy which He has ushered in, was intended by God to be perpetual, therefore doth He confirm it with an oath. No end of days will ever happen to our High Priest, nor shall the economy of grace be supplanted by another and clearer revelation. It shall be developed from strength to strength, and we shall see greater things than these in the days of the personal reign and the millennial glory, but no new economy of grace shall overthrow the present. Think not, O ye ungodly, if ye reject Christ that there will yet come a Saviour better than He; for you there remaineth no other sacrifice for sin.

I have heard men talk of "a larger hope;" I believe it to be a larger lie than ordinary if it supposes more mercy than is revealed in Christ Jesus. There is no larger hope than that which Christ has revealed; if it had been so He would have told us. Stars can be excelled by other stars, but what shall outshine the sun? One human Gospel can be eclipsed by another, but how can there be a more loving, tender, gracious gospel than that which is embodied in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ? "God so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasing life"—is that message of grace to be exceeded, and is greater love yet to be revealed?

No; the gospel is

GOD'S ULTIMATUM;

He will go no further; we have the last proclamation of mercy to men, the last Saviour, the last foundation for hopes to be built upon, the last fountain in which sin can be washed away, the last door of hope by which men shall escape from the guilt and punishment of sin. I beseech you, avail yourselves of it, for God has confirmed it with an oath that it may stand forever; it is your one and only hope for eternity; lay hold upon it while you may. The oath of God sets forth the dignity of our Lord's person and the eternity of His office; see that ye despise not one who is thus great and abiding.

By an oath also was our Lord set apart, because of the reality of his priesthood, and the substance that dwelt in His sacrifice. As we have already said, the Levitical priesthood dealt only with the shadows of good things to come, and not with the very substance of the things. In Christ is the actual putting away of sin, the effectual atonement, the real and efficacious substitution for guilty men, the redemption which actually redeems, the sacrifice which reconciles. In Him dwells the truth of the matter; He is not prediction, but fact, not promise, but fulfilment. Oh, never listen for a moment to those who would spiritualize Christ Himself, and make out even His person and work to be a shadow.

Certain teachers have arisen who seem to look upon our Redeemer's life as a sort of allegory, an instructive parable, or a myth, out of which eclectic minds like theirs may spell out mystic truth. It cannot be so; Christ Jesus is a fact; God was on earth in human flesh; that mysterious person, the Son of God, the Son of Mary, lived and loved and died and rose again; His sacrifice once offered has forever put away sin, and it has bestowed upon Him the power by His intercession to save unto the uttermost them that come unto God by Him.

But perhaps to usward the main reason of Christ's being installed in the priesthood by an oath of God is this, for the strengthening of our faith. Brethren, an oath for confirmation among men is the end of all strife; when an honest man has sworn to it, the testimony stands in evidence, and may not be questioned. When God not only gives His promise and His word, but swears to His declaration, who shall dare to doubt? Shall blasphemy go the length of accusing Him of perjury, or shall profanity give Him the lie in the teeth of His oath?

There was no need for God to swear if there had not been in us a fearful lack of faith, but "by two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie" He hath given us strong consolation by swearing by Himself that it shall be so. I do beseech you, since God's design is the confirmation of your faith, pray that your faith may be confirmed by it. No measure of faith in Christ can ever be too great. If we trust Him blindly, implicitly, immeasurably, with every interest for time and for eternity, we cannot have ventured too far. He that is ordained with an oath may be rested on without fear; He cannot fail; it is not possible while God's own truth is staked upon His mission, and guarantees its success.

Beloved, ought not this great truth to bring many tremblers to believe in Jesus Christ? The Christ we preach is not an enthusiastic amateur who has come among men with high purpose but without commission, with good intentions but without authority; but God Himself hath appointed Him to His office and settled Him in it, in the most solemn manner, swearing, "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Will you not trust Him with your soul since God entrusts Him with His honor?

I know not how else to express the sureness of that to which God hath set no less a seal than His own oath. Right joyfully do we see the whole nature of the infinite God guaranteeing the office of our glorious High Priest, for by swearing by Himself the great Jehovah hath made his very being a hostage for the performance of the covenant of which Jesus is the surety, and put forward His own character for truth as the pledge of Christ's eternal priesthood. May no soul among us dare to refuse a priest so surely ordained to His office, and settled in it by Jehovah Himself.

II. Secondly, we ought to believe on the Lord Jesus because of

of His priesthood. This is seen in the tenor of the divine oath, which runs thus: "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Very briefly let me mention some of the respects in which our Lord Jesus is a priest after the order of Melchisedec. These ought all to be reasons for our faith, and I pray the Holy Spirit to use them for that purpose.

First, our Lord is of the order of Melchisedec as surpassing and superseding all other priests. As surpassing—for Melchisedec comes before human view as priest of the Most High God, blessing Abraham, "and without doubt the less is blessed of the greater." Abraham, and Levi in his loins, pay Melchisedec homage. Now, whatever may be said about the priesthood of other men, there can be no doubt about the superior priesthood of Melchisedec. Abraham acknowledged it at once, so that before there were any Aaronic priests there was a greater priest.

Even while the law was in its palmy days, and the priest wore the Urim and the Thummim, there was a note struck in the Psalms of David which intimated the ending of it all, because there was another priest, not of the house of Aaron, who surpassed all of them, being made a priest by oath, even while they were priests without an oath.

It was a priesthood which united with itself the dignity of kingship. This Melchisedec, priest of the Most High God, was king even as Jesus Christ is King of kings, as well as High Priest over the house of God. He is, first, Melek Zadok, king of righteousness, setting up a kingdom of righteousness, and fulfilling all righteousness Himself; and then is He King of Salem, or of peace, bringing peace to those that believe in Him and follow after righteousness. Now, it is a main ground of trust in Jesus that He is King as well as Priest, with power in His arm as well as merit in His blood; with power to rule and govern and protect us, as well as with an efficacious sacrifice to purge our sins.

Our faith should also rest on the fact that our Lord was, like Melchisedec, "without father, without mother." We find no father or mother mentioned in the case of Melchisedec, because he did not come to the priesthood by natural descent as did the sons of Aaron; and in this he is the great type of Jesus, who is not one of a line, but the sole and only priest of His order. As a priest he is "without beginning of days or end of years," neither taking the priesthood from a predecessor, nor passing it on to a successor, nor laying it down because of old age.

This great priest of ours is Master of all, for as Melchisedec received homage from Abraham in the form of tithes, so doth our blessed Lord receive the reverence of all who believe. The day cometh when every knee shall bow to Him, and every tongue shall confess that He is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Therefore come and trust Him; trust the Lord of all. O ye guilty ones, who desire salvation, I beseech you repose upon Him, for He must reign, and you must either kiss Him with the homage of your heart, or else He will break you as with a rod of iron in the day of His power.

Perhaps one of the main points about Melchisedec is that he is represented as bestowing blessing. When he came to meet Abraham the chief thing he did was to bless the patriarch. The apostle does not refer to the bringing forth of bread and wine by Melchisedec, because he regarded it as a temporal blessing included in the greater spiritual one. Our Lord Jesus blesses all that trust Him; blesses them with the riches of heaven and earth, with the eternal word which sustains their souls, and with supplies for this mortal life, so that they live and praise Him.

Once again, Christ is never to be changed or superseded. He is a priest forever. As we read nothing of Melchisedec's having given up the priesthood, so depend upon it Christ never will lay down His office while there remains a single man to be saved. "Once a priest always a priest" is true of the Lord Jesus Christ, though true of nobody else. Once was He ordained, and none can put Him from His priesthood; as once the Father set Him upon the hill of Zion as King, and the kings of the earth cannot dash Him from His throne. O ye who pine for certainty and seek everlasting life, come and rest your everlasting hopes on His everlasting priesthood. That is my point all the way through. You have not to trust a mere man; you have not to rely upon one who will die, or leave his office to another who may not know you or care for you; but you are to trust One who cannot change or die.

If I were called upon to be the advocate of human priests this morning, if I were ordained to tell you to trust to the shavelings of Rome, my tongue would cleave to the roof of my mouth for lack of arguments; for what can there be in them that we should trust them? O sirs, the most brutish delusion in the world is to rely upon any priest of our own sinful race. I would as soon trust my salvation with the Norwood gypsy as with a Cardinal Archbishop. Her imposture is not so daring as his.

What can priests do for us? "They can give absolution." The Lord absolve them from the blasphemy of such a pretence. There is one pardoning Priest, and there is none other under heaven. He hath made all His people in another sense to be priests unto Himself; but as atoning priests, or as men that offer a propitiatory sacrifice, He hath ordained none, and all who pretend to such power must answer for it before the bar of God. Think ye of Roman and Anglican priests as of priests of Baal, and have no fellowship with such deceivers. Pray God to open their eyes that they may themselves be delivered from the delusion. As for you and for me, let us keep to the one Melchisedec priest, and yield subjection to none other. In Jesus we are complete; to look elsewhere would be to dishonor His perfection.

III. I beg you next to notice that our text speaks of under which our Lord officiates, in which also we shall find abundant argument for believing in Jesus. It says, "By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament." Learned men have fought each other very earnestly over the word translated "testament." Some say that it means "testament;" others answer that in the Septuagint Greek it is used as the interpretation of the Hebrew word which signifies "covenant." I feel quite sure that the combatants are both right. I am always glad when I can conscientiously take both sides in a battle, and I do so in this instance, because it matters nothing which of the two conquers, though it would be a loss for either side to be defeated.

The old covenant was on this wise: if the Israelitish people kept to God as their God, and if the priests obeyed His law and offered sacrifice according to divine rule, God would accept and bless them. Thus there was an "if" in the covenant. It was conditional, and therefore liable to failure. The people said, "All that thou hast spoken we will do." Eagerly, with all hands up, they cried, "We will do it. We will do it all." Within forty days they had broken the law, and to pieces went the covenant. A man's covenant is sure to be broken if it promises holiness on the part of the sinful, and perseverance on the part of the fickle-minded. Man cannot bear the burden of the needful requirements of a covenant with God. Our great High Priest represents another and surer covenant. There is no "if" in the covenant of grace. It runs thus: "I will," and "You shall." That is the tenor of it. Its essence lies in the supreme word, "I will." Therefore, because the conditions of the covenant of grace have been fulfilled it is in no danger of abrogation, and Christ Jesus has become the surety of a better covenant.

IV. Now of such a covenant or testament has Jesus Christ become the priest and surety, and with that we shall close, dwelling upon in which He stands to that covenant. This is our fourth point. I am sure we did not expect as we were reading this passage that we should come upon the word "surety." The apostle was speaking of our Lord as a priest, and he puts it thus, "By so much"—that is, by reason of His being inducted into His office by an oath—"was Christ made a surety of a better testament." However, there is the word "surety," and doubtless there is excellent reason for the unexpected turn in the sense. Testaments do not need sureties, therefore the passage should be read "covenant." But why did He turn from the idea of priesthood to that of suretyship? How is our Lord Jesus a surety?

He is so, first, because we are absolutely certain that the covenant of grace will stand because the Redeemer has come into the world and has died for us. Brethren, the gift of Christ is a pledge that the covenant, of which He is the substance, cannot be dissolved. Christ has been born into the world, God Himself has become incarnate; that is done and can never be undone; how can the Lord draw back after going so far? More, Christ has died; He beareth in His flesh to-day the scars of His crucifixion; that also is done and can never be undone. If God had ever meant that this covenant should be temporary He would never have given His Son to die as the substance of that covenant. It cannot be that so vast an expense should be laid out upon a transient business.

Moreover, Jesus lives, and as long as He lives the covenant must be regarded as a reality. It cannot possibly be that a work should be regarded as a fiction when it has been wrought out by such an one as He is. The ever-living Son of God did not die to perform a mere representation: the abiding essence of the matter is in His work, and He lives to prove that it is so. The priests of the house of Aaron were poor sureties of the former covenant, for they could not keep it themselves, but Christ has kept the covenant of grace; He has fulfilled all that was conditional in it, and carried out all that was demanded on man's part.

But next, Christ is a surety on God's part. I know that divines say that God does not need any surety, that He is to be trusted without it. This is true, and He is to be relied upon without an oath, but even as He takes an oath for our sake, so He provides a surety for our sake, that we may believe with stronger confidence. Christ is the bondsman of God on the Father's behalf, that the covenant shall be fulfilled.

But then mainly He is a surety of the new covenant on our behalf. Adam entered into a covenant with God for us, but that covenant went to pieces in a very short time. Then the second Adam became our covenant head and surety, and represented us before God. "Lo, I come," saith He—this is the brief of it—"to stand in their stead, to roll away the reproach of thy law, and so to save that which is lost." Now, the sinner is not saved in a way which casts a slight on justice, for Jesus has honored the law, and borne its penalty on the behalf of the men whom the Father gave Him.

It was a wonderful act of grace on Christ's part thus to become our surety before the throne of justice, but He did it, and smarted for it, and fulfilled all that it involved. Beloved, I would not like to have gone to heaven over a broken law; no right-minded man could be eternally happy and yet know that the law of God had to be dishonored before he could be rescued from hell. What would the universe say but that God was unrighteous, for He had saved the ungodly, and tarnished the honor of His justice by allowing sin to go unpunished, thus proving that the law was needless, and the punishment superfluous?

But now they cannot thus speak concerning any one of us who are saved in Christ Jesus. The saved one's sins have been punished; every believer has borne the punishment of his guilt in the person of his great Substitute. The law is satisfied; we owe it nothing, for we have obeyed it actively and passively in the person of our Surety. Even the infinite holiness of God can demand nothing of any believer but what the Lord beholds and accepts on the believer's behalf in Christ Jesus our representative.

It comes to this, that

and take Him to be our priest, or be out of the covenant of grace. God will not deal with us without a Mediator, and "there is one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." Will you have Him? Will you have Him, or forever be excluded from the covenant of grace, and consequently condemned under the covenant of works, and cast away forever and ever? Will you, O unbelievers, will you despise the oath of God? I spoke of it with trembling just now, feeling a solemn awe at the very mention of the oath of God. Will you give the lie to that oath? Will you say, "Thou has sworn to Christ that He shall be priest, but He shall never be mine"? This would be the honest expression of what your heart feels if you refuse Jesus; will you venture so to speak? Will you reject Heaven's own appointed Saviour, and deny the witness of the Lord? See that ye do not this, for the Lord your God is a jealous God; and if you touch His dignity so far as to strike at His oath, what more atrocious crime can you commit? "He that believeth not hath made God a liar, because he hath not believed on the Son of God." Will you refuse the ever-living Saviour? Is there one here so foolish as to be trusting to another priest? Oh, can it be that you are so far gone as to look to a man instead of looking to the Son of God?

Dear friends, if Christ deigns to be priest for us we ought gladly to accept Him; there ought to be a rush at Him. We are bound to cry, "Great Priest, intercede for me; let Thy sacrifice avail for me; wash me in the cleansing blood." It ought to be a joy to all mankind to accept this Heaven-sent Priest and Surety. Will you refuse Him? Will you neglect His salvation? If you do so, remember you shut yourselves out from the better hope, and the better covenant, and the better promises; you are barring the door of heaven against yourselves.

He who rejects the Saviour commits eternal suicide; his blood shall be upon his own head. This shall be the hell of his hell, the very centre of its fire, the worm that never dieth, that he himself put from him everlasting life, and counted himself unworthy of the kingdom, and would not have Christ whom with an oath God had set up, that whosoever believeth in Him might live. God bless these all-important truths to every heart for Christ's sake. Amen.

ANECDOTES.

Related at the May Meetings in London.

THE Baptist Missionary Society held its twenty-ninth anniversary in Exeter Hall, when the report read by the Secretary showed that the past year had been the most successful from a financial point of view in the history of the Society. The income for the year was equivalent to $257,295.

THE OFFICER AND THE LEOPARDS.

The Rev. E. C. B. Hallam, of Allahabad, said: "There are those who come home from India who try very hard to make you believe that we missionaries are deceivers, and that our work is all humbug. I remember an instance of this not very long ago, which occurred on board one of our ships coming home from Ceylon. There was a man there who was a government officer, a civilian. He did not know much about the missions, and he cared less; but when he saw a Wesleyan missionary a fellow-passenger, he thought he must have a sly slap at him, and he took the opportunity of saying in his presence to his fellow-passengers, that all these flaming missionary reports that came out of the offices in London were nonsense, and that the missionary speeches in Exeter Hall and elsewhere were all moonshine—there was nothing in them. 'Why, sirs,' he said, 'believe me, I have been in India over twenty years, and I never saw a native Christian.' The missionary did not attempt any reply.

"Only a day or two after he heard this same man boasting of the great things he had done as a sportsman. He was telling of the number of tigers he had bagged, the leopards he had shot, and the bears he had killed, and he had done most wonderful exploits as a sportsman. The missionary went up to him, and with a happy smile, said, 'Sir, I have been in India twenty-five years, and I never saw a leopard there.' 'Well, sir,' he said, 'you surprise me; you astonish me!' 'Oh, you need not express any surprise whatever. I can tell you why I never saw one.' 'Why?' he asked, 'Because I never went where they were, and for that same reason, sir, you never saw a native Christian.'"

BRAHMA WORSHIP DECLINING.

"We have the evidence of the Brahmins themselves that idol worship is declining, and that Brahma worship is declining also. When I first went to Orissa it was nothing at all unusual to see a man of the lower caste put his forefinger to his tongue, then dip it in the dust, put it to his mouth, and eat it, as an act of adoration to a Brahmin who was passing. They used to wash the Brahmin's feet, and then drink the dirty water. It exists now; but there is less of it than there used to be in those districts where the gospel has long been preached. The Brahmin in charge of the Temple of Middenpore came to us and ventured the statement that we were taking the food out of his mouth. 'How is that?' said one of our number. 'Why, since you came here preaching Jesus Christ every day, the receipts at my temple have been reduced 50 per cent.'"

"Some years ago, our General Baptist brethren in Southern Orissa wanted to send a company of preachers to a district where they had never preached, and had never distributed books. Some of the preachers were called out, and were sent to the district. They moored their little boat to the shore, and went to the nearest village to preach. It was not very long before a respectable Hindoo came up, a young man, and said, 'Sirs, can you give me a copy of "The Jewel Mine of Salvation"? That is the title of the gospel paraphrased, and put into metre in a beautiful tract; and I myself know of a dozen conversions which I can trace to the reading of that alone.

"The native preacher started and said, 'How did you know that we had such a book, we have never given away our books here before?' 'Oh! I know it well; you are the men who preach about Jesus Christ and this new religion, and that is what this new book tells about. I have seen a copy of it, and for months I have been trying to get a copy of it; will you give me one?' 'No, we will not give you one till you tell us all about it, and where you saw it.' 'My name,' said he, 'is' so-and so; 'but I have not time to tell you about it to-night. Come to-morrow early, and I will tell you all about it.' They went, and he told them the story.

EXTRAORDINARY CONVERSION OF A HINDOO.

"'About two years ago my father put a quantity of merchandise upon his bullocks' backs, and went on a three days' journey into the district, to attend a market; while there he met a friend of his from another village from the opposite direction. This friend said to him, "I have three little books teaching a new religion." He showed them to my father and my father asked him to give him one, and he did, and that was the book—"The Jewel Mine of Salvation." When he got home he put away his bullocks, and washed his feet, and sat down to read his book, and that book perfectly bewitched my father.

"'In a few days he had lost his appetite, and as he read the book we noticed great big tears trickling down his cheeks, and he became altogether a changed man, his face looking so sorrowful and sad. As we thought father was bewitched by that book, we decided to burn the book and mix the ashes in water and give it to him to drink, to take the witches out of him; but he guarded the book, and we could not get at it. As he read, a still more wonderful change came over him; his tears dried up, his face became happy, and his appetite returned, and he took food as usual. But he would not go to the idol temple any more, and he would not have anything more to do with Hindooism or the Hindoo religion.

"'Well, that father died a year ago; but when he was dying the Brahmins came and stood about the door, and wanted to come in and get their presents; but father waved them away with his hand and said, "No Brahmins are needed here. I need not your help;" and he would not allow a Brahmin to set foot inside his house. Then, when we saw the end was approaching, my mother, my brothers, and myself gathered round and said, "Father, you are dying, you are dying; do call on Krishnu, for you are dying." He looked up with a pleasant smile, and said, "My boy, I have a better name than that—the name of Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of the world, of whom I read in my little book; that is a better name than Krishnu." And my father died with the name of Jesus Christ on his lips.'"

NATIVE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS.

"I landed in India just three months before the fearful mutiny broke out. I was not in the disturbed districts, though I was exposed more or less to danger, and had to go from my station to another place for safety; but during that mutiny there were both white and black Christians who sealed their testimony for Christ with their blood. We lost brother Mackie, of Delhi, who fell into the hands of the mutineers. Then there were crowds of Hindoo and Mohammedan Sepoys going through the place, looking for Christians, black or white, and demanding that they should either deny Jesus or die. They found one of our men on the highway in Delhi—whether preaching or not I do not know—and with drawn swords held over his head, they said: 'Now, then, we have got you; deny Christ or die!' With hand upraised to heaven he said, 'Strike! my Jesus I never will deny.' They did strike, and hacked him in pieces then and there. He sealed his testimony for Christ with his blood. God forbid that your faith and mine should ever have so sore a trial as that; who knows whether or not our faith would have the strength of his?"

AT THE WESLEYAN MEETINGS,

the Rev. Charles Garrett, speaking on the subject of special providences, related the following illustrative incidents:

"NO FOOD, BUT THE TABLE READY.

"I recently called at a beautiful home, in which the young lady told me of a singular event that had happened on the previous day. She rose deeply impressed that she ought to take a basket of provisions to an old lady living some distance off. She was not acquainted with her and did not know her circumstances. She consulted her mother about it, and they made up a basket of provisions, which she took to the house. She knocked at the door, which was opened by the old lady herself; and when she had explained her errand, the old lady exclaimed, 'Oh, what a covenant-keeping God I have! I ate my last bit last night, but, as you see, I have laid the cloth for my breakfast, for I knew it would come.'

"'I HAVE ONLY TO TELL GOD ABOUT IT.'

"During the cotton famine in Lancashire, I met a class-leader and local preacher, who had not had work for two years, and who, notwithstanding that he had a large family, had been assisting the members of his class, until he acknowledged, on pressing him, that he had only a shilling left, 'But,' the man exclaimed, 'don't trouble about me. I have only to tell God about it.' What happened? On the following morning I received a letter offering to give twelve shillings weekly to a leader until the end of the famine, and I at once concluded that my friend had been telling God about it, and that this letter was the answer.

"A BILL PAID.

"On another occasion, as I was going to the home of my dear friend, the Rev. David Hay, I met a class-leader, a shopkeeper, who said he was not taking a shilling a day, that he had two children to keep, and that he had to meet on the following Monday morning a bill for £50, toward which he had not been able to raise fifty pence. I went on to Mr. Hay's, and there on the mantelpiece was a letter from Mr. Gurney, the shorthand writer, asking if they had a local preacher in want of money. I wrote to him the same evening, and by the next day's post there came another letter from Mr. Gurney, saying that a good Quaker lady wished to give £50—the very sum required—to some struggling local preacher."

A SUCCESSFUL TRACT.

The Rev. D. Hill said in his speech at the Missionary breakfast, that during the government examinations in literary subjects held every third year at Wuchang, Hoopeh, at which there are usually 10,000 or 12,000 candidates, the young men frequent the chapels to hear the gospel preached. On the last occasion a special effort was made by the missionaries residing in that centre to reach these literary gentlemen, and Mr. John, of the London Mission, prepared a special tract, entitled "The Gate of Wisdom," for circulation among them. Some 10,000 copies were struck off and distributed at the gates of the examination hall. These were, for the most part, received in a friendly spirit, and would be conveyed by these gentlemen to every county in the province, where they are now circulating among the 27,000,000 of the people.

"One most pleasing instance of conversion in connection with the effort I may mention. A gentleman of private means from a district about eighty or one hundred miles from Hankow, who was up for examination after he had received and read the tract, was led to seek further instruction, was baptized, invited Mr. John to his house, gathered his friends together, and actively set about doing Christian work. And when I left Hankow a few months ago he was residing in the London Mission Hospital, and trying to pick up a little medical knowledge, with a view to doing good among his own countrymen. This is but one case—one tract, one out of the 10,000 which have been sown broadcast o'er the land, and shall they return unto Him void?"

A CHINAMAN'S PRESENT OF PEACHES.

Referring to the advantages arising from medical missionary effort, Mr. Hill said: "On one of my recent boat journeys on the Yangtzee I put in about dusk at the market town of Hwang Sz Kang, and I had no sooner finished preaching on shore than a man rushed after me on to the boat, with his hands full of peaches, and pressed me to take them. 'You are from Hankow, are you not?' said he. 'Yes,' I replied. 'Well, a few years ago I went up to your hospital there, very ill indeed, and had it not been for Dr. Mackenzie I certainly should not have lived. And when all my money was exhausted he supported me for a whole month, and both he and the native assistants treated me with so much kindness that, when I saw you here, knowing as I did that you must be connected with the mission, I thought the least that I could do was to give you some slight acknowledgment of the kindness shown me in Hankow. I am but a poor huckster, but I shall be only too glad if you will accept these peaches ;' and feeling hardly satisfied with his expression of gratitude he brought me later on in the evening a further present of peaches and sweetmeats. And thus it is throughout the province."

CHRIST'S PROPHECY ON THE MOUNT.

MATTHEW 24.

By Rev. Richard Chester, A.B.

Prediction of the Destruction of Jerusalem—And of the Second Advent—A Double Signification—A Double Fulfilment, Partial in the Destruction of Jerusalem—Total in Second Advent—False Christs—Wars and Rumors of Wars—Abounding of Iniquity—Preaching of the Gospel—The Abomination of Desolation.

THIS memorable prophecy, spoken by Him who "spake as never man spake"—who is Himself the source and sum of all prophecy, to whom "give all the prophets witness"—cannot be otherwise than specially interesting and instructive ; more so, we may well believe, than any other which the sure Prophetic Word contains.

I shall take it for granted, rather than attempt to prove, that this prophecy comprises predictions such as He alone "who knows the end from the beginning" could utter, both concerning the then future, but now long since accomplished, destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman army under Titus, with preceding and attendant events ; and that it also contains predictions most explicit and emphatic concerning the yet future Second Advent of the Lord Jesus Christ. This, as most of our readers are probably aware, has been denied. I have read, some years ago, a work by M. Pressensé, the well-known French Evangelical pasteur, in which the writer labors with much ingenuity to prove that not only this prophecy, but the entire of the predictive judgments of the Book of Revelation refer only to the destruction of Jerusalem, and have received their complete fulfilment therein.

In order to refute this theory, it is only needful to advert to one passage in the prophecy (verses 30, 31) : "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven ; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn ; and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory ; and He shall send His angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather His elect together from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." To affirm that in any event which happened at, or in connection with, the destruction of Jerusalem there was a fulfilment of these words ; or to affirm that any event other than the actual coming of the Lord from heaven could possibly fulfil them, is to invest this prophecy in particular, and all prophecy in general, and all the words, prophetic or otherwise, which the Lord Jesus Christ, the utterer of these words, has spoken, with a character of exaggeration, and of a consequent vagueness and uncertainty belonging rather to the fabled oracles of the heathen Sibyl than to the Holy Oracles of the God of truth.

While thus maintaining the comprehensive and of this memorable series of predictions—features in which they resemble a large portion of Old Testament prophecy, and furnish us, as I believe, with a key to the right interpretation of the Book of Revelation as being also double in its signification and fulfilment—I would desire altogether to disclaim the possibility of making anything like an exact division in it, and affirming, as some commentators have done, that so much belongs exclusively to the destruction of Jerusalem, and that the remainder belongs altogether to the Second Advent of our Lord. I have met with many attempts to establish such a division, and they each and all have seemed to me to be utterly unsuccessful.

The true, and therefore by far the easiest and simplest mode of interpreting the strictly prophetic portion of Matthew 24 I believe to be this—that it refers in its entireness to the one of which is the type, the other the antitype ; and that while there are several particulars which belong, some only to the one, and some only to the other of these events, the general scope and tenor of the prophecy includes both and refers to both, although in some instances more immediately to the one than to the other. The strictly prophetic portion of the chapter to which these remarks apply terminates, it will be observed, at verse 35. The sequel of the chapter, with the entire of chapter 25, belongs to the hortatory and practical, rather than to the exclusively prophetical, portion of the teaching of our Lord.

Having, in the first instance, affirmed (verses 1, 2) concerning "the buildings of the Temple," that there should not be "one stone left upon another that should not be thrown down," the Great Teacher's object manifestly appears to be to give an answer sufficiently definite, and yet not too definite to be pre-eminently practical, to the twofold question of the disciples (verse 3) : "When shall these things be? And what shall be the sign of thy coming (Greek, presence), and of the end of the age?" They evidently expected—probably from their knowledge of the prophecy of Zechariah (chapter 14), that "the coming," and "the end" would be coincident with the overthrow of the Temple. The answer was accordingly so shaped as sufficiently to distinguish between these events, so that they should not be in anywise confounded with, or mistaken for, each other, and yet to leave the disciples in intended ignorance of the protracted interval which should elapse between the destruction of Jerusalem and the Second Advent. For always, when speaking upon the subject of the Advent—and never more clearly than in the latter part of this and in the parables of the succeeding chapter—did our blessed Lord put that event before His hearers as one which might occur during their own lifetime, and for which, therefore, they were, each of them personally, to be always watchful and expectant. This special object of our Lord in this discourse, as also the relationship of type and antitype which exists between them, is, it seems to me, amply sufficient for any apparent intermingling of the two events, which we now know to be so widely separate, both as to time and character, from each other.

THE FIRST SERIES OF EVENTS,

accordingly, which the Lord, in answer to their questions, put before His disciples in connection with the overthrow of the Temple, and with His coming at the end of "the age," or dispensation, is that of the rise of false Christs, and false teachers or prophets, and the occurrence of "wars and rumors of wars," which He warns them should be but "the beginning of sorrows," or "birth-pangs" (verses 4–11). It is remarkable, however, that while there were false Christs and false teachers in the period of the world's history shortly prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, that period is conspicuous upon the page of history for the total absence of war, the frequently-open temple of Janus having been at that time closed. Consequently the rising of "nation against nation, and kingdom against kingdom" (verse 7), here so distinctly foretold, is altogether inadmissible as an event connected with, or a sign preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, and must necessarily be referred altogether to the period prior to the Second Advent. That this latter period is also to be specially distinguished by the rise of, at all events, ONE false Christ, several other prophecies very fully affirm.

Thus the character of this prophecy would seem to be established as referring primarily to the destruction of Jerusalem, in which some of its particulars have been partially, and so far remarkably fulfilled ; but referring especially to the Second Advent, in which awaits the entire wonderful prediction of Christ, from its commencement to its close.

The "abounding of iniquity," and the consequent "waxing cold of the love of many" (verse 12), would seem, in like manner, to belong especially to the period prior to the Advent, and are in exact accordance, as every student of prophecy must be aware, with numerous predictions, both of the Old and New Testaments, which undeniably refer to that event.

The "preaching of the gospel for a witness among all nations" (verse 14) is also, without question, to be regarded, not as a sign preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, but—as the emphatic words, "and then shall the end come," are sufficient to determine—as a marked and specially noteworthy token that the Lord is, indeed, at hand.

The "setting up of the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, in the holy place" (verse 15) would seem evidently to have received some fulfilment at the destruction of Jerusalem, from the historically recorded fact that the seeing what they regarded as such did cause many Christians at the time to comply with the warning of the immediately succeeding portion of the prophecy, and to escape to Pella, by which means their lives were preserved. That it cannot have then received—and that it therefore still awaits—its complete fulfilment in events connected with the Second Advent, a reference to the three passages in Daniel (to which our Lord's own words direct us for its import) seems to me most conclusively to establish.

The first occurs in Daniel 8 : 11–14. The preceding context proves it either to refer (as I believe it does primarily) to Antiochus Epiphanes ; or else (as I believe it does chiefly) to the future personal Antichrist. It cannot possibly have received its complete fulfilment in anything that was done by the soldiers of Titus. The second passage occurs in chapter 9 : 27. It describes the event referred to as taking place in the middle of the last of the seventy weeks of Daniel, where any reference to Titus and his army as agents in the matter is simply out of the question.

The third passage occurs in chapter 11 : 31. Here the setter-up of "the abomination" is affirmed, in exact accordance with chapter 9 : 27, to be also the taker away of the daily sacrifice. Both these acts are further ascribed to the "wilful king," whom no one asserts or believes to be Titus. But neither is he Antiochus, only or chiefly, inasmuch as our Lord's words affirm "the setting up of the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet," to have been, when He uttered His prophecy, a yet future event.

In verses 21–28 of Matthew 24 we read of "a great tribulation," which a reference to the parallel passage, Luke 21 : 23, 24, proves to refer especially—although other portions of the Prophetic Word teach us not exclusively—to the land and the people of Israel ; and which both passages, as also the parallel one, Mark 13 : 19–24, set forth, so far as these are connected with it, as commencing with the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, and lasting until, and terminating only with, the close of "the times of the Gentiles," and "the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

That this tribulation will, so far as the Jewish people are concerned, be fearfully intensified during the time of the last Antichrist, and will embrace at that period Christendom as well as Israel, we find foretold explicitly in many portions of the Prophetic Word. With this correspond exactly the words of our Lord (verses 21, 22) : "For there shall be great tribulation, &c.

It can scarcely be needful to remind my readers how exactly the prophecy before them, viewed in this twofold aspect, accords with very many of the Old Testament prophecies, especially with several passages in the Books of Isaiah and Jeremiah, in which the dispersion of the Jewish people, their captivity among the nations, and their restoration to their own rebuilt city and re-fertilized land, are foretold ; and which, while only being partially fulfilled in their return from captivity in Babylon, await their complete fulfilment in a yet future restoration and conversion of the entire nation of Israel.

Thus far this prophecy, if only the possession of this twofold character be allowed to it, is by no means difficult of interpretation. It is remarkably free from any observation by means of either symbol or metaphor. It is, moreover, most distinct in its utterance. We can take it in one hand, and the history of the destruction of Jerusalem in the other, and, comparing the two together, we can gain from this as fully as from any other portion of God's Prophetic Word the substantial evidence of the inspiration of the sacred volume.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Old Michael's Reception of Etta—The Old Shed Uppermost—The Very Far Distances—Another Call Needed—The Drunken Fly-Driver—A Cause of Preoccupation—A Scheme Pronounced Nonsensical.

ETTA'S next visit was to Michael. She knew well now where he lived, and that, when she entered his territory, she was on friendly ground.

He gave her a characteristic reception.

"I was just tellin' the Lord about ye," he said, "and I was a-sayin', 'Lord! she's a dear young lady, she is. 'Courage her heart, now do 'ee. An' help her on i' the right way. An' bring her right down 'mongst us of a evenin'.' I'm only a simple, homely old man," he continued, "but I knows one thing. I knows as how you aire a-doing a good work here. And perhaps you'll do ever so much more."

"That is just what I can't do," said Etta, "and for reasons that I can't explain. You wouldn't understand if I could explain them. But I came to ask you to-day"—and here she paused, and looked at the old wife and sundry grandchildren who seemed to be everywhere in the cottage.

"Missus!" ejaculated Mike, "you look arter the young 'uns, will ye? Take 'em to see the chick-a-biddies a' the back yard." And so saying, he suited the action to the word, and began to clear the front premises of his very lively belongings.

"I have been wondering whether anything could be done again about that old shed," said Etta, "whether it could be rebuilt; and a great many other things too; but, as I said before, life is not so easy to me as you would think. I can't do all I should like; and sometimes I get greatly puzzled."

All this time old Mike was leaning up against the window-sill, and resting the small of his back against the old deal table; but now he drew himself up, and sat upon the table, his arms folded across his chest, and his legs hanging down. With his usual politeness he was striving to repress a fervent desire to speak. When at last his mouth was opened, he said:

"Well, I never! If that old shed ain't always bein' brought uppermost! There I was up at the rectory the t'other day, a-seein' o' that 'ere blessed child—the rector's young lady"—he explained, "and what should she say first thing, but summat 'bout the old shed! I war surprised. However the child come to hear about it, I couldn't think. But Mr. Hutton, he told me how it was."

"I wish we could have the shed rebuilt," said Etta. "Then you could use it for your meetings again, and we might make it very comfortable, and get in some of the other men too. You see they did not like it before, because it was so dark, and it let the rain in, and there was nothing for them to do or to look at."

"We used to look at the King!" said Michael, in a reverie. "It was all beautiful to us. You know, miss, we don't want nothing grand, or painted glass windows, or them gold organs, nor pulpits, nor any o' that. We only want to see Jesus. That's what we want!" he added very energetically. "Please, miss, did you ever read about the b'liever's telescope?"

"No; I don't know what you mean," said Etta, who, although she was beginning to understand in some degree the original character of his conversation, could by no means always fathom his eccentric expressions. She soon learned to discover that this one was not so eccentric as she had thought. Nor was it the first specimen of a similar discovery. He interested her, and she listened while he quoted—

"Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty; they shall behold the land that is very far off."

"Very far distances," Etta found that it was in the margin of her Bible when she reached home; and then she understood Michael's simile better. In the meantime she listened very quietly, and as she listened, she was putting two and two together, and pondering thus. Though her thoughts were not very defined, if put into words they might have taken this shape—

"Is it not a far greater degree of spirituality to be able, like these poor men, to commune with God—to 'see His beauty'—in a poor, tumble-down old place, made of common wood, and to rejoice in His presence there; than to be dependent, as we are for our devotions, on so much that is external? They require no 'aids to devotion!' They see God. They know Him. How is this? Where does the difference lie? It seems to me as though they had faith, while we have only sight!" and she gave partial expression to her thoughts by saying to Mike, in answer to his remark:

"Doesn't it say something in the Bible about 'walking by faith, and not by sight?'"

"Oh yes, it do!" said poor old Bateman, quite unconscious of his comparative altitude in the Christian course as he said it; though he must have felt, and did acknowledge in saying it, that he was taking his Master's position, who prayed in the boat and on the sea, and at the mountain-top, and by the roadside, and in the garden, and on the shore, and with the lowly fishermen, and for His persecuted followers.

"It's in the book," said Mike, "'We walk by faith and not by sight,' and then the Lord said to Moses—and it was in the wilderness, it was, not in a church—'My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest.'"

"Oh, but Michael," said Etta, "you know there was a tabernacle, and then a temple, and the Lord commanded the people to go to them three times a year."

"Yes," answered Mike, "but I have heard the minister read, and I've seen it in my Bible too, that they people went to the outer court, and on'y the High Priest was to go into the beautiful part 'long with the ark, and the gold, and the light. The Priest was Jesus!" he continued warmly.

Here Etta was out of her depth; and, preferring to avoid any further flounderings with Michael, she wisely determined to search out the matter for herself. But she had got a great lift, a help almost unconsciously. Her talks with the old man generally landed her in a higher and more ethereal region of thought than that to which she had been accustomed hitherto. To-day she was about to return with quite a new line of suggested subjects for her own Scripture search and meditation. But as she was going out of the cottage Mike said to her in his most mysterious tones:

"There's Dan'l Higgins. He's the fly-driver. He's been and lost everythink through drinkin'. Poor chap! It's dreadful to hear him swearin' and a-goin on. Do you think you could call up his way, miss?"

The suggestion of such a visit did not sound pleasant. It was not altogether so attractive that it must needs be accomplished at that very moment; so, after a moment's hesitation and nodding a vague acquiescence, Etta proceeded on her way home. But the recollection of this request from old Mike and the bare idea of this combined state of wickedness and misery into which a neighbor had plunged himself, quite haunted her.

When sitting by the prettily-decorated dinner-table that evening, and afterward in the depths of a luxurious chair in the drawing-room, her mental panorama of the morning's scenes resolved itself into a variety of tableaux—the mother in her bare cottage, troubled by the sins and cruelties of her husband and sons; Mike, sitting on the end of his rough deal table, giving utterance to his eloquent and graphic description of facts past and present; his parenthetical mention of sweet little Aleth; her reverie invariably wound up with the bankrupt fly-driver, driven to recklessness by his liquor-loving propensities.

Certainly, in her more thoughtless days, Etta had never been so much accused of pre-occupation as she was now. Her sisters, and even her brothers, would constantly rally her on being "absorbed," or "meditative," or "full of something or other." It was certainly very strange that, though "buried" was not too strong a word for the state of trance-like inaction into which her sisters would pass for hours together, when a new novel of exciting tone was in their hands, yet no one seemed to object or to consider their normal state of coma, at such times, by any means singular or unnatural.

Her far-away looks, or abstracted replies, at any moment of the day, or only for a moment, were generally pounced upon either by a satirical smile or a look or word of censure. It was a "bad habit," a result of "these new ideas," or a sign of "want of interest" in passing events. How little did the other members of that pleasant home realize how much of the real romance of life—not to say comedy and tragedy!—Etta was passing through; only that each new phase of it was really none the less true because so novel.

Actual acquaintance with the lives and histories, past and present, of those around us, has in it far more of the sensational excitement of mystery and general interest than the wildest pages of fiction. If a condition of vulture-like feeding on our own internal being conduces to many an ill result, generally classified under the wholesale term "morbid"—for which, let it be remembered, people usually have as little pity or sympathy as for hysteria—then by the order of reverse, an occupation of mind with external interests, and those of the highest kind, must tend naturally to happiness and self-elevation; and these we must acknowledge to be benefits in themselves, apart from the benefits thus conferred on the beings by whom we are surrounded.

"No man liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." If we endeavor to live to ourselves, and, in fact, indulge the morbid propensities to which we are all liable, we are violating a natural law, and thereby injuring, not only ourselves, but those also to whom, as fellow-creatures, we "owe" the debt of "love." No possible benefit can accrue from it. But, too often, those who are not self-absorbed, but occupied with far higher thoughts and deeper considerations than those their friends quite understand—who are occupied, in fact, with the Lord Himself, His teachings, His marvellous illuminations of heart and intellect—are considered "morbid."

Such was Etta's case. The fact was that her new interests and her consideration of them were misunderstood; and this for the simple reason that they had not yet become the interests of the others. What would she have given for a little sympathy in them!

How she wondered now that no one could care for these streets lying close round their path, and teeming with human life, immortal spirits—each cottage wall embracing a miniature world of its own, joy, sorrow, light, darkness, sin, purity, selfish cruelty, unselfish devotion!—all these, and many other phases of life, being represented not falsely as within the yellow covers of the fascinating railway novel, but exhibited in their true kaleidoscope of colors, the actual daily facts of real life. Many would seem to think that these must necessarily be prosaic. But there is intense poetry in all reality, as well as reality in true poetry; and Etta, Lady Isabel, Mrs. Clemence, and even pretty little Aleth were daily becoming more fascinated with its pages. They had the advantage after all, for their delights were true, lasting, and ennobling.

"A penny for your thoughts, Etta!" said Bob, pulling a lock of her hair, as he passed through the shadowed circle of gauzy, evening-garbed sisters. "What's up?"

A sweet smile answered his mischievous glances, while the hand stretched out to replace the loosened tresses lovingly patted the broad, red little fist of the marauder. Had she been gifted with the comprehension of herself—a mystery beyond the cleverest of us!—as well as with the gift of prophecy, she might have answered Bob's query thus:

"Wait a little. I am just now in all the bewilderment of groping my way into a new life. By and by, when all is clear, and my path is plain, I shall be the merriest and happiest of you all."

Yes, Master Bob, have patience; your sister has passed out of the phase of ball-dresses, gossip, and butterfly existence, but she has not yet reached her goal. Her tossing boat has not yet entered "the haven where it would be." When once harbored there, firmly anchored on the shores of Truth, she will be as happy as you wish. Her own mind at rest, she will be able to give her attention to those around her. All claims will then be satisfied.

In the meantime, the note directed to Lady Isabel was peacefully reposing in Mrs. Fennecker's pocket. At bedtime a conference took place between mother and daughter.

"I intercepted your note, Etta, this morning. The fact is that your father does not wish you to think any more about this chimerical scheme that you proposed; and for that reason did not wish you to accept the invitation to Lionel Court. But he now agrees with me that there is no objection to your going if you will quite give up that most foolish idea of yours—unpleasant idea, I call it, for a young lady to take into her head—and simply pay an ordinary visit. Of course you will easily say to her when you go there, that we 'don't approve of the scheme' you proposed. 'Nonsense,' your father calls it. I say it is worse than nonsense."

The reply that was naturally coming from Etta was stopped by the words:

"It would grieve me very much if you were to think any more about coming out in this line. I know quite well all that you would say in defence; but, as it distresses me very much, I would rather not hear you say it."

Etta bit her lips and was silent. Then she said, "Dearest mother, it shall be as you wish." And after this the only course left for her was to retire to her room. There she prayed. All her wishes, difficulties, everything, were spread before Him who is tender in love as He is mighty to help. Opening her little Bible her eye fell upon the words, "For we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin."

THE WALK TO EMMAUS.

S. S. Lesson for June 12, Luke 24:13-35. Golden Text, ver. 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

DURING the time of His sojourn upon earth our blessed Lord had continually sought to lead His disciples to the truth of His resurrection. But how should they, who would not receive the truth concerning His death, believe in His resurrection? Mary alone, who anointed Him for His burial, grasped the truth of His sacrificial death, and if she was the same as Mary Magdalene, it was but natural that He should appear first unto her (Mark 16:9). It is even so with many followers of Christ, they look for power and for the anointing of the Holy Ghost in their own spiritual life, but forget too often that the way to resurrection goes through death, and that if we would reign with Christ and be glorified with Him, we must also suffer with Him (Rom. 7:17), must deny ourselves, take up our cross, and follow Him.

Two of the disciples on the evening of the resurrection day went to a village called Emmaus, and "talked together of all these things which had happened." They had seen the mighty power of the Son of Man in healing the sick and raising the dead; they had heard many say, "Never man spake like this man" (John 7:46). They knew the prophecies of glory which should be fulfilled by the Messiah when He came, but now Jesus was dead, apparently conquered by the very death which He had conquered in the case of others; it would seem as though His mission had become a failure. But these rumors of resurrection, and the undeniable fact that His grave had been found empty, were their subjects when "they communed together and reasoned." O if they had remembered His own words instead of leaning on their own reason they would have understood.

"Jesus drew near and went with them;" blessed be His name, He is ever ready to go with us, although we go so tardily with Him. "But their eyes were holden, that they should not know Him." O how often God's children take for granted that the Lord is absent from them, although He has said, "Lo I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28:20); "Fear not; for I am with thee: be not dismayed; for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness" (Isa. 41:10). How often they want a stronger warrant for believing that He is with them than His own saying so; and yet the word which they so lightly esteem had power to bring all things into being, "For He spake and it was done; He commanded and it stood fast" (Ps. 33:9). They could not see Him, but He was there; He spoke to them as He often does to us, but in such an unexpected way that the voice is not recognized. When we take for granted that Jesus is with us because He says so, then we shall also be able to take for granted that He is speaking to us, our ear will become more and more accustomed to the sound of His voice, and no circumstance, however trivial, will occur without our being able to hear through it what He has to say, and our whole being will become like a listening ear and a ready hand to hear and to do His will.

In answer to His question as to what was the subject of their discourse and their sadness, they asked Him if He were only a stranger in Jerusalem, and then recounted to Him their story about Jesus of Nazareth, whom they called "a prophet mighty in deed and word." Was it then forgotten among the disciples that Simon Peter had said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God?" True, He had charged His disciples to "tell no man that He was Jesus the Christ" (Matt. 16:20), but could that be the reason that in their sadness for His death they speak no word of His being the Son of God? Could the dying thief and the centurion alone acknowledge Him in His shame and death? These disciples said with regard to Him that they trusted "that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel," and then they mentioned to Him whom they still held as a stranger, the rumors about His resurrection.

O how like is all this to the blindness of many of God's children, who speak of His truth as though their eyes were only half open, and mention great truths as though they were mere possibilities. How many reason over, instead of yielding themselves up to the word of God's grace, and thus they stand afar off from a dying Jesus, and are blind to a risen Christ. Only the power of the Holy Ghost, the indwelling God, can make such weak members of Christ's body to be a living power in the world. The Lord Jesus spoke severe words to them, "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken: ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into His glory? And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself."

Veil after veil fell from before their eyes as the Scripture opened, and they could see things in a light in which they never before appeared. The power of a future reigning Messiah was to them a well known Scripture doctrine, but a present redemption from the power of sin and Satan through His blood—a present nearness to God through the rent vail of His flesh—a present kingdom of righteousness, peace, joy in the Holy Ghost—this was all new, even to those who had heard Jesus preach these truths, for they had never come home to them as realities. Until Jesus really died, they could neither see in the Scripture that He must die, nor the great reason for His death. O how often must God bring us to severe and bitter experience that our hearts, slow to believe, may take in His meaning; and O how blind we often are to the clear statements of His Word.

They drew nigh unto the village whither they went without discovering who was their companion. But there was an attraction, a fascination, about Him which they could not resist nor understand; their hearts burned within them while He talked with them and opened to them the Scriptures, but they were so persuaded that Jesus was dead, that the possibility did not seem to occur to them that this was He. How near is Jesus sometimes and we know it not; we have lost, perhaps, something of the sensuous enjoyment of His presence, and therefore conclude that He is not near us, that He is dead to us, and inactive for us, and perhaps the very apparent deadness is His own voice calling us to understand what is written, and to believe His Word rather than our experience. We are taught to look off unto Jesus; thus every moment in which we are occupied with our own experience is a moment of unbelief and disobedience. We dare by faith to count upon His unseen, unfelt, but promised presence at all times, and know that He will never leave us nor forsake us.

When "He made as though He would have gone further," they "constrained Him, saying, Abide with us; for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. And He went in to tarry with them." The disciples in Jerusalem were all well known to one another, this stranger was not one of them; how then could they show Him so much of their confidence? At last the spell was broken, "As He sat at meat with them, He took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them." This was enough. Although they are not mentioned as having been present at the last supper, yet there is no doubt that every detail of this time of sorrow was known to all the little band of a hundred and twenty who believed on Him in Jerusalem. "And their eyes were opened, and they knew Him; and He vanished out of their sight." He had led them to His Word, that must now suffice them. They returned to Jerusalem with the glad tidings and their newly discovered treasures in the Word, but before they could tell out their tale of gladness, answering tidings were given by the eleven and them that were with them, doubts began to give way, and they knew that the Lord was risen indeed.

INCIDENTS OF THE FIVE POINTS MISSION.

Jemmy Hyde and the Gold Watch.

ONE little fellow, with a good honest face and amiable expression—little Jemmy Hyde (for, although fourteen years old, he was small for his age)—by his orderly conduct and his diligence in study merited the approbation of his teachers. On Thanksgiving Day a silver pencil was given to him as the best boy in the school. And Jemmy had an opportunity of proving the strength of his principles. One day as he was walking in Broadway he picked up a handsome gold watch. Jemmy had never had anything so beautiful in his hands before; there was a rich gold chain, fashioned like a serpent, and a gold locket containing two pictures, and two rings, and a little gold purse, and other charms the like of which he had never seen.

He took these beautiful things home to his mother, and she put them in her trunk. Jemmy wanted to advertise them, but she said she had no money to pay for the advertisement, and she kept them, looking daily for an advertisement and reward. None met her eye, and as several weeks passed, she was afraid to let it be known that she had the watch in her possession. But Jemmy's conscience was troubled; he could not rest; he knew that he ought not to keep what did not belong to him; and he came and told the missionary all about it; and his face looked brighter, and his heart felt lighter for the telling.

The watch was advertised, and the same day a gentleman brought a letter in which every article was described. The watch belonged to a lady residing in Boston, a niece of the Hon. Rufus Choate, and it was the last gift of her father, so that she had mourned over the loss of this precious memorial of his affection. She kindly sent fifty dollars for the boy, with the assurance that she should ever feel a lively interest in the welfare of her little unknown friend, and in the mission school where such good principles were instilled. The money was placed in the savings bank, to be paid to the boy when he was eighteen years old.

But this is not all. Jemmy said that he wanted to get away from the evil influences of the Five Points, and the missionary was about to procure him a place in the country where he could learn a trade. But a lawyer in whose office Jemmy had been employed a short time, pleased with the intelligence and integrity of the boy, offered to give him a home and clothe and educate him. Thankful and happy for the fair prospects opening before her son, the mother exclaimed that always from the time he was a very little boy Jemmy had said, "I will be a jintleman yet."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Another Important Arrest has been Made in Ireland under the Coercion Act. On May 23d, Thomas Brennan, secretary of the Land League, was arrested in the offices of the League at Dublin and taken to Naas jail in Kildare. The charge in the warrant is one of "inciting persons to commit riot and assault for the purpose of obstructing and preventing the execution of the process of law, committed in Queen's County; and also of being an inciter to acts of violence, tending to interfere with law and order." That the authorities had serious reasons for arresting the secretary is well known. In the last speech he delivered before his arrest he said: "Let us have no more nibbling with this question, but let every man in Ireland who pays rent only pay rent when he is forced to do it at the bayonet's point. Let them bring their bailiffs, sheriffs, and soldiers, those hired mercenaries who are recruited from the slums of England and brought here to shoot down the Irish people. Allow rent only to be collected when they have put all their machinery in force. You should do this with regard to all writs for the recovery of rents, and as for the recovery of possession and notices of ejectment, you should treat them just in the same way."

The Prosecution of Herr Johann Most, Publisher of the Freiheit, the socialist journal published in London, on a charge of inciting to murder, has resulted in conviction. The jury was absent from the court-room twenty minutes, and returned with a verdict of guilty on all the counts, but recommended the prisoner to the mercy of the court, on the ground that he is a foreigner. The sentence of the court is deferred pending argument on the point of law raised by Mr. Sullivan, Herr Most's counsel, that the statute against inciting to murder does not apply to newspaper invective. The judge, however, during the trial, said that his present impression of the meaning of the statute was adverse to Mr. Sullivan's contention, and he directed the jury to find a verdict on the separate counts; so, apparently, even if the reserved point is decided in favor of Herr Most, it will only result in the amelioration of his sentence.

Rumors of Newly Discovered Plots Against the life of the Czar of Russia are again in circulation. In the course of a letter from the correspondent of the London Times the following information on Russian affairs is given on authority for which the correspondent vouches: "It is a great mistake to suppose that the fears for the new Emperor's safety are exaggerated. It is, indeed, strange to see a man of thirty-seven, of robust frame and Herculean strength, a prey to terror, for the Emperor has extraordinary physical strength, and I remember seeing him bend a horseshoe with his finger; yet such is the case, owing to the influence upon him—he is an excellent husband—of the Empress' nervousness. His departure for Gatchina was a veritable flight.

"The population of St. Petersburg were greatly impressed at the Emperor's absence from the fortieth day's mass for his father, the presence of a son on that occasion being more obligatory in Russia than attendance even at the funeral. The Empress was likewise absent. On Easter Sunday, when from time immemorial every Russian could see and even kiss the Emperor, nobody could catch sight of him, which stupefied all Russia."

Serious Disorders Prevail in Greece Owing to the popular dissatisfaction with the Government on the question of the Turkish frontier. The people are intensely opposed to the Turco-Greek convention. The disaffection is also increased by the fact that large defalcations have been discovered in the Treasury Department, in which a number of prominent officials are said to be implicated. Brigandage prevails everywhere. It is now said that the Government has decided to assume the responsibility of ratifying the boundary convention with Turkey without convoking the Chamber. The representatives of the Powers have made an urgent representation to M. Coumoundouros, the Greek Premier, to induce him to send immediate instructions to the Greek minister at Constantinople authorizing him to sign a special convention between Turkey and Greece for facilitating the surrender to Greece of the ceded territory. Premier Coumoundouros replied that it will probably be necessary to summon the Chamber of Deputies before signing a convention.

The Treaty Between France and Tunis Appears not to have been so much of a surprise to the Bey as he represented in his dispatch to Constantinople. The French Foreign Secretary states that the overtures General Bréard was instructed to make to the Bey of Tunis previous to the signing of the treaty contained nothing unexpected for the Bey, as he knew beforehand the general sense of the stipulations which were to be submitted to him, and on the bearing of which his mind had had time to reflect. A correspondent adds: "The truth is that substantially the same treaty was submitted to the Bey more than a year ago, when after two days' consideration he refused to sign it." The French War Office estimates the cost of the expedition at 14,000,000 francs ($2,800,000), and of this sum Tunis will probably be saddled with 10,000,000 francs.

The French are preparing to attack the Kroumirs from Soutarba. They do not conceal the fact that they wish to justify the entry of so many troops into the regency by some military exploit, and with this object they likewise contemplate an attack on the Arabs at Mater.

Professor Robertson Smith's Published Works some time ago caused serious uneasiness in the minds of orthodox ministers in Scotland, who saw with alarm that a man intrusted with the training of students for the ministry held erroneous views respecting the inspiration of the Bible. The subject has been brought before the General Assembly of the Scotch Free Church, who have adopted, by a large majority, a resolution that, considering the nature of certain writings of Professor Robertson Smith, in particular an article on the Hebrew language and literature in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," the Assembly feel constrained to declare that they no longer consider it safe or advantageous for the Church that Professor Smith should continue to teach in one of her colleges. Professor Smith's friends have made an ineffectual appeal to the Assembly to give him a trial before the Presbytery.

A New Coin, Composed of Gold and Silver in carefully calculated proportions and of the value of a dollar, has been struck for presentation to the members of the Monetary Conference. It was intended as a suggestion to them, in the event of their being able to agree on a bimetallic standard. The London Daily News, in its financial article, referring to the coin, says: "The experiment may be successful in furnishing a good token coin for circulation in France, and perhaps in other countries of the Latin Union; and, if so, it will supersede the unwieldy silver five-franc pieces and the minute gold coins which are so easily lost. It is impossible that the new coins should become international money in the full sense of the term, for their value would continually fluctuate according to the value of silver in the bullion market."

An Infidel Detective was Once Listening to Ned Wright reading the Bible near the "Elephant and Castle," London. The detective knew the reader well, and had often "wanted" him before he was converted to Christ. As Ned looked at him he saw him wipe away a tear, trying hard all the time to conceal his feelings; but it was only too plain that he was broken-hearted, and shortly went away because he could not listen any further. A few evenings after this, while Ned was preaching at a hall in the neighborhood, a lady entered, and at the close of the service asked him, "You will, perhaps, excuse me, sir, but are you 'Ned Wright,' the converted burglar?" "I am," he replied. "Then, sir," said the lady, "you are the person my husband talks so much about. He has been an infidel all his life; but he is now very ill, and says that you haunt him day and night, asleep or awake, and that he is continually thinking of you. Will you come and see him?" On arriving at the house, what was Ned's surprise to find that it was his old friend, the detective, on his dying bed! Ned began to talk earnestly about the salvation of his soul, and the greatness of the love of Christ for all poor sinners, and the way by which sinners could be saved. But the dying man cried out, "Oh, Ned, say no more, say no more; I cannot bear it—it will break my heart." The poor man was led to see that "there is life for a look at the crucified One," and looking, he lived. Shortly after, he fell asleep in Jesus, and his wife is now an earnest Christian.

Bismarck's Personation of a Lady's Cousin took place forty-six years ago, as follows: A young Swedish nobleman was studying at the Berlin University. A lady cousin of his was to pass through Berlin, and her father asked him to call and show her over the city. She arrived at Berlin in due course, and was waited upon at her hotel by a stalwart young student, who escorted her during the three following days to museums, picture-galleries, and other places of interest. On the fourth day he attended her to the Post-Amt, whence she was to depart by diligence for Ems, and before taking his leave, said, "I must no longer conceal from you that, as a matter of fact, I am not your cousin at all. A friend of mine, however, has that honor. He is undergoing his examinations at college, and confided to me the agreeable duty of carrying out your papa's wishes. My name is Von Bismarck." This very lady visited Berlin last year, and took occasion to remind the Chancellor Bismarck of the above incident, reiterating the expression of her gratitude for his chivalrous politeness of nearly half a century ago. Interrupting her with a genial smile, Prince Bismarck observed, "Pardon me, madam; it is I who am under obligation to you in that matter. Thanks to you, I was at that time enabled to visit the museum. I have never had time to do so again!"

Conversion of a Burglar in a London Theatre.—The Rev. Aubrey Price, whose services in the theatres of London have been blessed to many remarkable conversions, relates that on one occasion he was accosted by a rough-looking man who said: "You were at the Victoria Theatre on Sunday night. I was there, too, and" (taking out of a side-pocket a number of house-breaking instruments) "with these. I was engaged with two other fellows to commit a burglary after midnight. I was walking up and down outside the theatre waiting for my pals, when the thought came into my head, I'll go in and hear what the parson has to say. I did so. I heard you say that Christ would pardon the vilest sinner, and now I am come to ask you whether He will pardon me." The man was evidently most earnest. His whole soul seemed thrown into the question he put. After a long conversation with him Mr. Price left him full of hope that the Spirit of God was at work in his soul. The man subsequently emigrated to the West Indies, and Mr. Price recently heard from his employer who spoke of the converted burglar as an earnest consistent Christian.

Early Struggles—A Business Disappointment—A New Sphere—Split-rings, Steel Pens, etc.—The Electro-Plating Industry—Generous Gift of Two Million Dollars.

AMONG the princely givers of the present day must be reckoned Sir Josiah Mason of Birmingham, England, whose portrait appears this week on our first page. It is well that such acts of munificence as those performed by this Christian philanthropist should be widely published, because it is often charged against the Christian Church by her enemies, that all her efforts are directed to proselytizing and spiritual change, while the works of charity and benevolence are neglected.

The best reply to such charges is to point the accuser to facts. In no nation do institutions for the physical and spiritual benefit of the afflicted flourish as they do in countries where Christianity is taught in its fulness, and if it were possible to take an accurate census throughout the world of such institutions and the means of their foundation and support, it would be found that those people who have been most active and most munificent in this field have been Christian men and women. Especially is the fact and the inference manifest in the case of those whom death has bereaved of their natural protectors. God, who is the Father of the fatherless and the Husband of the widow, has raised up men who have "delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless and him that had none to help him, and have caused the widow's heart to sing for joy."

The following particulars of Sir Josiah Mason's life and the institution he has founded and endowed will, we think, interest our readers, who will recognize in the philanthropist not so much his nationality as his brotherhood with them in Christ, and will rejoice that God has given him the means and the disposition to manifest in this manner the vital power of religion.

On February 23d, 1795, in the busy English town of Kidderminster, Josiah Mason was born. Only five days before, in Danvers, Mass., another child first saw the light, one who was destined to hold the highest place in that honorable roll of the world's benefactors on which Josiah Mason's name is inscribed. We refer to the illustrious American philanthropist, George Peabody, whose portrait and biography appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 31st, 1879. Like Peabody, Josiah Mason was born in a humble home. His early life was one of great struggle and hardship. His father was foreman in a carpet factory in the town, where, in order to "make both ends meet," he also kept a small general store, which was managed by the mother of Josiah. When the boy was only twelve years old his father died, and henceforth Josiah was thrown entirely on his own resources. At one time he had no other means of earning a livelihood than that of selling rolls as a baker's boy in the streets of his native town. His education was of the most meagre character, for the schools to which boys of his class could go, were, in those years, few and inefficient.

HIS EARLY STRUGGLES.

In a modest autobiographic sketch which he has written, he tells us that from his earliest youth he was engaged, first as a shoemaker, then as a baker, and then as a carpet-weaver at Kidderminster, and then, at the age of twenty, in 1815, he went to Birmingham. In the manufacturing metropolis he worked as a jeweller and gilt-toy maker for ten years. From the very outset of his career he gave signs of that enterprising character which was afterward so successfully developed. He neglected no opportunity of gaining knowledge and capital.

When he had nearly completed his ten years in Birmingham in the jewelry and gilt-toy trade, and had given ample proof to his employers of his assiduity, usefulness, and powers of invention, he was promised a partnership in the concern; but this promise was not kept, and he therefore quitted the house, disappointed and discouraged with the results of his long and faithful service. He was at this time thirty years of age, and his only capital was a sum equivalent to seven dollars, with which he had to face the world. He deeply felt the injustice which had been practised upon him; but he was not the man to sink under disappointment, heavy and bitter though it might be. Happily to one of his energy and skill, Birmingham presented a wide field for profitable activity.

"Go to Mr. Harrison," said a friend to him, who met him shortly after he had left his late employer; "he wants just such a man as you." Mr. Harrison was a maker of steel split-rings and key-rings in Birmingham, and to him Mr. Mason forthwith went and asked for employment. "You are not afraid of dirtying your fingers with work?" asked Mr. Harrison. "Try me," was Mason's rejoinder. Mr. Harrison did try him; the trial resulted in a permanent engagement; this led to a life-long friendship of the closest kind; and when Mr. Harrison died Mr. Mason succeeded to his business, which, for more than half a century, he has been carrying on upon the same premises.

A STEEL PEN MAKER.

About the year 1828, while walking through a street in Birmingham, he saw in a stationer's window a card of steel pens, marked at the rate of a dollar each. They were clumsy contrivances, looking little likely to supersede the quill pens then in use. Mr. Mason, however, with his quick practical insight, saw their capability of improvement, and entering the store purchased one of the pens. "The novelty," said Mr. Mason, in telling the story, "induced me to go in. Mr. Peart, the stationer, was writing with one of the pens, and called it a regular pin. I instantly saw that I could improve upon it, and I bought it."

On examining it, Mr. Mason made out the name of the maker to be "Perry, Red Lion Square, London." Going home, he made three pens, from which he selected the best, and sent it by that night's post to Mr. Perry. A few days afterward Mr. Perry presented himself in Birmingham to see the man who had made a better pen than his own, and to ascertain if he could make them in large quantities, and to conclude a bargain with him. His interview with Mr. Mason satisfied him of his skill and ability, and an arrangement was made between them for the manufacture of steel pens. This was the beginning of Mr. Mason's career as one of the most extensive manufacturers of steel pens throughout the world.

ELECTRO-PLATING.

Mr. Mason still continued his business of manufacturing steel rings, although the production of pens soon dwarfed that department in extent and profit. He was becoming well known in the business community in Birmingham as a man of considerable skill and sagacity, and was rapidly accumulating a fortune. In 1842 he embarked in another enterprise—that of electro-plating. The idea of plating inferior metals with a coating of more precious ones was yet in its infancy, but it was quickly developed by Mr. Mason's perseverance and fertility of resource. A very large amount of capital was sunk in the early experiments, but the trade became extremely remunerative, and the name of Elkington, Mason & Co. became a household word among all the civilized nations of the world.

The death of Mr. Elkington in 1865 dissolved the firm, and as Mr. Mason was at that time seventy years of age, he preferred to relinquish his share in the business rather than enter into the new partnership with Mr. Elkington's successors. He therefore confined his attention to the manufacture of pens and split-rings, in which he regularly employed from 300 to 400 workpeople.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF HIS WEALTH.

In the autobiographic sketch already referred to, he alludes to the wealth which crowned his multifarious efforts in the following terms: "And the said Josiah Mason hath dedicated a portion of the wealth so acquired, in erecting and endowing at Erdington, near Birmingham, an Orphan Asylum for boys and girls; and, being deeply convinced, from his long and varied experience in different branches of manufacture, of the necessity for, and benefit of, thorough systematic scientific instruction, specially adapted to the artistic requirements of the Midland districts, and particularly of the boroughs of Birmingham and Kidderminster, hath determined to devote a portion of his remaining property to the foundation of an institution wherein such systematic scientific education may be given; and in order to connect the said institution with Josiah Mason's Orphanage, and to commemorate his connection with Birmingham and Kidderminster, he hath determined to provide for such preference for certain of the pupils of the said Orphanage, and for persons born in the said boroughs of Birmingham and Kidderminster, as is hereinafter provided."

In the foregoing simple statement we have the summary of his life from the time he started, amid hardship and struggle, to the period in which he was numbered among the wealthiest, and, better still, among the most benevolent men of the day. Altogether in all probability Sir Josiah Mason acquired an immense fortune, as is shown by his munificence in the building and endowment of his Orphanage, Almshouses, and College, which alone aggregated over two million dollars.

THE ERDINGTON ORPHANAGE AND ALMSHOUSES.

Origin and Growth of the Institutions—Commenced in 1860, Opened in 1869—Its Valuable Endowments—Management—Regulations for Admission.

THE above institutions (a view of which appears on our frontispiece), are situated in the village of Erdington, near Birmingham. They were at first designed to receive a number of aged women and a few orphan children. By degrees, as Mr. Mason thought them out, his plans enlarged themselves until at last he resolved to maintain the Almshouses for forty-six women, and to erect in addition a magnificent range of buildings capable of receiving about three hundred orphans, admission being restricted to those deprived of both parents. The erection of the Orphanage was begun in a quiet, unostentatious way, about 1864, on a fine and healthy site of thirteen acres, at some distance from the Almshouses, and lying behind the village of Erdington.

In August, 1869, the Orphanage was finished, and the founder quietly opened it without ceremony. He had by this time become Sir Josiah Mason, having been knighted by the Queen. It will be remembered that her Majesty desired to confer the same mark of her favor on Mr. Peabody, but that gentleman was an American citizen, and he courteously but firmly declined the offer so coveted by the subjects of Queen Victoria.

The cost of the buildings and their site, as nearly as can be ascertained, was equivalent to $300,000. It is endowed with property of the estimated value of one million dollars. It may be added that all the children received in the institution are taught, fed, and clothed gratuitously, at the expense of the charity, and provision is made to place them in service or in trade on leaving the Orphanage. The instruction given is a plain education in English, embracing all the branches usually taught in government elementary schools, with special training in household work for the girls.

The religious teaching is confined by the trust-deed to instruction "in the Holy Scriptures in the authorized English version, and the truths therein contained;" and it is expressly provided "that no catechisms, formularies, or articles of faith, whether of the United Church of England and Ireland as by law established, or of any other body of professing Christians, shall be taught to the children." Divine worship is conducted daily on the same unsectarian principle; and as regards admissions there is no restriction of sex, country, or creed.

THE VALUABLE ENDOWMENTS.

The endowments of the Orphanage consist of about 1032 acres of freehold land. Of this about two acres and a half consist of building land in the heart of the town of Birmingham, mostly covered with buildings, and of increasing value. One of these properties, erected about twenty years ago, is let at more than $7500 a year, and the total rental of the Orphanage estates cannot be much less than $50,000 a year. In a very few years this amount will probably be doubled by the increasing value of the endowments, and in view of this con tingency the trustees are directed to apply any surplus funds, when these are sufficient, to the erection of other orphanages, in accordance with the general scope of the trust deed.

Sir Josiah provided that after his death the number of trustees should never be less than ten nor more than fourteen, of whom seven are always to be nominated by the Town Council of Birmingham. The Council are to keep up this number of seven trustees by election as vacancies arise.

REGULATIONS FOR ADMISSION.

The regulations of the Orphanage provide that there shall always be twice as many girls as boys. The number is not restricted to three hundred, and the building is large enough for five hundred. The children must, when admitted, be under the age of nine years, and may be retained, boys until the age of fourteen, and girls until eighteen, exceptions being made in special cases indicated by the deed. The only other conditions are that the children shall be legitimate, destitute, and that both parents shall be dead. "In all respects the Orphanage is absolutely free, and, from the moment at which they enter the institution until that at which they leave it, the whole charge and care of the children are undertaken by the charity, no contributions being received from the friends of inmates, who, however, are permitted to visit the children at stated intervals, and to give them toys and other presents not incompatible with the rules."

THE SCHEME OF INSTRUCTION.

The scheme of instruction is plain and simple. Great stress is laid by the founder upon the physical and industrial training of the children. It is provided by the deed that the girls especially shall be instructed in "sewing, baking, cooking, washing, and all ordinary household and domestic duties." The boys are regularly and efficiently taught handicraft trades. The school teaching is confined to "reading, writing, spelling, English grammar, arithmetic, geography, and history," and Sir Josiah directed that "no instruction in any language or grammar other than the English language and grammar" shall be given in the Orphanage. When the inmates leave the Orphanage each of them receives a Bible and an outfit of clothing; and the trustees pay apprentice fees when necessary.

The Orphanage building occupies, with playgrounds, plantations, garden ground, and fields, about thirteen acres of land, lying high, on a gravelly soil, well open on all sides, and commanding fine views of the surrounding country, from which its great central tower, 200 feet high, may be seen for many miles. The building, which is bold and massive in general form, is of the Lombardic style, varied to suit modern requirements. The plan is that of an irregular oblong, presenting a length of 207 feet at the north-west or entrance front in Bell Lane, 190 feet to the north-east or playground front, 300 feet to the east or garden side, and 270 feet to the west side, where the out-offices are placed.

The interior contains large school-rooms, dining-rooms, dormitories, baths, a chapel, and all other appliances for habitation and instruction. The domestic offices are on an unusually complete scale. All the cooking and laundry work is done by steam, and the whole building is warmed by hot water, on a system devised by Sir Josiah himself, who possesses a high degree of mechanical skill. All the arrangements required for the comfort, health, and recreation of the children are most carefully devised: indeed, the whole building bespeaks a degree of thoughtfulness which could have been bestowed only by a man deeply penetrated with a love of children, and a knowledge of their wants and ways. In the present case this is the more remarkable as, although married, Sir Josiah Mason has no children of his own. The staff of instructors consists of a matron, sub-matron, school and drill master, sewing mistress, outdoor mistress, and other teachers, the elder children taking part in the school work, and also doing the housework. Two physicians are appointed to the medical care of the inmates.

THE SCIENTIFIC COLLEGE.

We can only mention, in conclusion, that the other work of Sir Josiah Mason's life is the Scientific College—a project which was conceived in 1870. The object of this college is to impart a "thorough systematic scientific instruction, specially adapted to the practical, mechanical, and artistic requirements of the district." It may be mentioned as characteristic of Sir Josiah Mason's disposition, that although he has given away so large a sum of money in charity, and has become very popular in Birmingham, he has never sought public office or honor, but has shrunk from anything like ostentation or display.

ANECDOTES,

Related at the London May Meetings.

THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON IN A CHINAMAN'S PULPIT.

The Lord Mayor of London, speaking at a missionary breakfast, narrated the following incident:

"When I was in Melbourne (Australia), I was asked to preside at a missionary meeting in connection with the China mission. I went, and it was a most interesting meeting. On the following Sunday I went with my friend Dr. Wall to one of our churches in Melbourne. He said to me, 'Come, I think we will be in time to go to the Chinese church.' We drove to the Chinese church and found it pretty well filled with Chinamen. There was a native Chinese missionary preaching Christ to the people, and they were listening with profound attention. The good man in his pulpit, when he saw me coming in, turned round to the people and said, 'I see a gentleman has come in, and I must leave.' and down he came from the pulpit and put me in it, and he got an interpreter, and I had the pleasure of addressing the congregation. Therefore, I think I may lay claim, in some respects, to be a returned missionary."

THE DYING AFRICAN CHIEF.

The Rev. John Kilner said: "After one of the most terrible journeys I ever undertook, being a day of forty or fifty miles' travel through one of the most terrible thunderstorms I ever encountered, and assailed by one of the most furious hurricanes that ever a man on shore had to meet—at half-past nine or ten o'clock, drenched to the skin, I and the junior member of the deputation crept into the mission-house of the locality presided over by a native African chief.

"We had a tolerably warm reception, but what interested me most was an interview with native royalty. There they keep up all forms of regal etiquette, and it is good for them that they do so. We were permitted to go into the palace so-called, and there, stretched upon his caross, lay an old chief, a man that had been a hero, a warrior, afraid of nobody and of nothing—a man celebrated for his hunting propensities. Many a lion and other wild beast had fallen to his assegai. But there he lay, weary of life and apparently on the verge of the other world, and they had brought him out into the sunshine under the lee of a fence. There upon his caross he lay, his commander-in-chief supporting his head, and his queen keeping a respectful distance under the veranda. Through the medium of the missionary I had intercourse with him.

"I talked with him about one thing and another, and just as I was leaving him I took his hand and said to him, 'I come from England; the great country has sent me to see into our mission matters in this land, and I am returning to England, and I shall have to tell them things touching you and others. What shall I say? That you die trusting to idols or clinging to Jesus? What?' I waited for a response. His hand gripped mine; and his eye fastened itself upon mine, and there was an evident perturbation in the quivering lip. 'Tell them in England,' said the old chieftain, 'tell them in England that I die a poor sinner clinging to Jesus.' This was one proof of the missionaries' reward; and there are hundreds like it cropping up in all directions."

A KAFFIR WARRIOR'S CONVERSION.

"I remember preaching in South Africa. A chief who was a mighty warrior was there. After service we were plying the chief from side to side with reasons why he should embrace Christ and repudiate the absurdities and superstitions of his creed. And what said he after a while? He would give it his best thought. I had travelled two or three stages further on when I received a letter which I have, and which I should like to show to people who are unbelieving. 'It will gladden your heart,' said he, 'to learn that Makowlah has put away his heathenism; that Makowlah has sent away twenty-five out of his twenty-six wives; that Makowlah has burst asunder from the trammels of witchcraft, and asks your prayers that he may steadfastly hold to Christ.'

THE MAD ZULU AND THE MISSIONARY.

"There is a lone, solitary man. Watch him there in his study. There comes a man furious as though possessed by a legion of demoniacs, and every demoniac was a mad Zulu, and every Zulu had a dagger. He rushes into the study of this solitary, lone man. There he sits, and in comes the furious chief with his fists clenched, and flourishing those great, mighty fists of his—he was six feet four inches in height—and with every indication of intensity of rage. 'How dare you?' said he, and the missionary looks up to him in the midst of the uproar and says, 'Chief, would you like a cup of tea?' Why, the Duke of Wellington never marshalled his troops better. He collapsed, and fell at the knees of the missionary, and was in tears at once. 'Forgive me, teacher; forgive me;' and he could have carried him like a babe wherever he wanted him to go."

SAVAGE TROOPS DISBANDED BY A MISSIONARY.

"You see there right upon the top of the hills dark lines of crested warriors, and they mean war; here lies in the plain below a missionary station. These warriors are coming; here is Kreli still at large, the terror of that part of the land. Kreli comes with his martial host to wreak vengeance, and who is to resist Kreli? You see there the smoking kraal, and there a circle of ominous triumph on the part of the foes, and a presage of the inevitable destruction of those who had trusted. The missionary says to his local preachers and leaders, 'Mount your horses and be ready at such an hour.' They mount their horses, some ten or fifteen of them.

"I went up the route that they took. Up one serpentine path we had to go, and our horses had to make a desperate leap over a sort of right-angled difficulty. We got to the crest of the hills. And 'There,' he said, 'is where Kreli's camp was.' By the time we had got to the bottom of the hill half of his troops had vanished. On he went with his diminished force till he got to the top, and when he reached the summit half the rest had vanished, and with these picked men, drawn to him by an influence that was resistless, on he went. 'If he is going to die,' said they, with the old instinct, 'let us go and die with him,' and to death these men marched. Straight to the camp of Kreli does the missionary walk.

OUT COMES KRELI! WHAT FOR?

To honor the man. He had heard of him before; aye, he had seen him before. He knew the man; and the missionary said, 'What, Kreli! I hunger, Kreli, I hunger.' Instantly the hospitality and generosity of the chief were called to the front, subordinate passions were kept in abeyance; kill the fatted calf and let the missionary eat, and there you see Kreli and the missionary joining in the repast. 'Kreli, the Government of England will be surprised to find you here.' Kreli nodded assent. 'The Colonial Government, Kreli, will be surprised to find you here.' And he nodded a dull assent. 'Kreli, I am surprised to see you here.' The man stood still.

'KRELI, GO HOME!'

The repast is finished, the missionary withdraws. Ah! and if it were not the bugle that sounded it was the well-known sound which the Kaffir warriors knew, 'Retreat home to your tents, ye soldiers of Kreli!' And as you look they that were to have descended like so many hungry vultures, and with one fell swoop to have destroyed the lovely little paradise in that missionary station, are marching home at the bid of whom? Not Kreli, but the unknown, unrecognized hero. That man is in London to-day. Let the name be known at last, henceforth and forever—

THAT MISSIONARY IS PETER HARGREAVES."

THE NEW VERSION: A MUTILATION AND PROFANATION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, June 5, 1881.

"And when they came to Nachon's threshing-floor, Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God and took hold of it, for the oxen shook it. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah, and God smote him there for his error."—2 Samuel 6 : 6 and 7.

THE sacred chest of acacia wood called the ark of the covenant, about four feet by two, golden lidded, golden hinged, and mounted by two cherubims, and made to contain the divine covenant, and at one time holding a bowl of wilderness manna and Aaron's rod that budded, was the most sacred box ever formed. It was in the presence of that chest God communed with the Israelites. Improperly to touch that box was death. All the people understood it. On one occasion fifty thousand and seventy people lost their lives by irreverence to the box. The circumstances of my text were these : That precious chest was being transferred on a cart drawn by oxen. Now, oxen are an uncertain team, especially when on a hot day they come near a shadow ; for without reference to the safety of that which they draw, they dart aside for the cool place. For this or some other reason the oxen with this precious chest made some sudden start and the box rocked, and Uzzah, the driver, put his hand upon it. He had no business to touch it under any circumstances. Under the judgment of God this driver drops dead by the cart wheel.

We have a sacred chest, an ark of the covenant, the Bible. Like the ark of old it contains the divine covenant and the manna for poor wildernessed pilgrims, and the rod of trouble that has budded into fragrant consolation, and over it the mercy seat. It is so sacred that the hands of worldly criticism and the hands of pedantry and the hands of useless disturbance had better keep off it. Wrongly to touch that omnipotent box—which is our ark of the covenant—is to die.

We are in the midst of

consequent from the new revision of the Scriptures. We had a translation two hundred and seventy years old, embosomed in the warmest affections of all the good of earth, interlocked with the best secular literature, and pronounced by Webster and the Washington Irvings as the masterpiece of English prose; the translation at work blessing and revolutionizing the nations for good, and all Christendom satisfied with the translation, except a few doctors of divinity. But two companies, an Old Testament Company and a New Testament Company, have been busy for ten years changing the book, and a few days ago the New Testament Company launched the results of their labors upon the world. After great universal advertisement of the intended book and the dramatic withholding of the book till a certain day, and then withholding it till a still further day the work comes forth. The English printing press keeps a tight grip on the copyright, and when our American publishing houses offered a large sum for the privilege of reproducing the book simultaneously, the English presses rejected the offer in cavalier and abrupt style.

Two million copies are sold in two days. What a compliment to the Scriptures! Yes, but be not deceived. Did the two million people suddenly become passionately fond of Scripture reading? No. These two million Bibles went into houses where the Bible was already enthroned. All those of us who honored the book wanted to know what these men had been doing for ten years with our favorite book. Had we a statue in New York City Hall Park that had been the pride of the nation since its foundation, and sculptured and lifted at vast expense, and thirty-eight men for ten years had been busy under cover, changing that statue, on the morning the cover dropped and the changes should be revealed, there would be no room in the streets or squares approximate to hold the spectators.

In addition to this general curiosity which we all felt about the iconoclasm of parts of our best book, the denominations of religionists were anxious to see if their peculiar views would be favored or opposed by the new version. The Baptists wanted to see what the revisionists had done for immersion, and the Presbyterians what had been done about the decrees, and the Episcopalians to see what had been done about Apostolic succession, and the Methodists to see what had been done about free grace, and the Congregationalists to see what had been done about the democracy of religion, and the Universalists what had been done with future punishment, and so we all rushed for the revised New Testament.

The Church and the world have the famous revision before them. We are

ASKED FOR OUR VERDICT.

We all have a vote. The humblest person in this house has a vote. "What do you think of it?" is the perpetual question. Some say, "I like it very much." Others say, "I like it to a certain extent." Others say, "I want a year to consider it," which means, "I want to hear what others say, and then I will say the same thing." There are many who do not want to offend the ecclesiastical Ring, for each denomination has such a ring, and there is as much bossism in the Church of God as in the world, and monopoly would rule the kingdom of Christ, if it could, as it rules the money markets and legislatures of the world. There are two voices that have not yet been fully heard.

First, the unpretending Christian scholarship of America and England is displeased more than it can express at many of the changes made, and the other voice is the voice of the great masses of Christian people, nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand, who regret in the depths of their soul that this revision has been attempted, and who look upon it as a desecration and a profanation and a mutilation and a religious outrage. That last sentiment will come up like the surges of the Atlantic after a tempest of ten days.

I shall give you my reasons for rejecting this new revision of the Scriptures. I am willing to take it as a commentary, and to stand it respectfully on my bookshelf beside other human opinions of the word of God. But to put it upon my private study or in my family room or on my pulpit, as a substitute for King James' translation, I never will. I put my hand on the old book and take oath of allegiance. So help me God! I am glad to know that Lord Shaftesbury and the Archbishop of York, and many other strong men on the other side of the sea, are anti-revisionists. But supported by high authority or no authority, I here and now take my stand.

These fifty men for ten years busy in tinkering the New Testament agree in the statement that they find no new doctrine. Differing on many other things they all agree here. If it had been found that the old translation was teaching any false ideas of God or the soul or eternity, I would say, by all means give us a new revision and put forth immediate and mightiest effort for the organized obliteration of the old translation. The world cannot afford to have wrong notions of God and the soul and eternity. But the new version keeps all the old doctrines. Then what good reason could there be for this disturbance of sacred association, this loosening of the faith of Christendom.

I. It is too late to reconstruct the Bible. When King James' translation was made the Bible was a sparsely circulated book, and the changes made caused no wide perturbation. But this revision of 1881 is a depreciation of 300 million copies of the Bible out in the world and doing their work. It assails the magnificent liturgy of the Episcopal Church and makes all her prayer-books vast inaccuracies. It makes the inscriptions on the graves of your dead untrue. It reflects upon the old family Bible, and to the uninitiated leaves nothing about it certain save the record of marriages and births and deaths. If this new revision succeed, for the next few years you will have to watch your children's evening offering of the Lord's prayer and jerk them up short before they run over the "evil one" into an uninspired doxology. It is an out and out war against all the religious literature of the ages. Away with your Cruden's and Brown's concordances. Your Bible dictionaries wrong. Matthew Henry's commentary wrong, Kitto's readings wrong, Zahn's archæology wrong. All your religious books wrong. In matters of religious accuracy it means chaos and old night.

Who undertook this impertinence on the other side of the sea? I know not the qualifications of the archbishops and archdeacons and professors who have done the work on the other side of the Atlantic. I understand that many of them are far from being the best scholars of Great Britain. I know that men with great titles are often the merest accidents and their high office no sign of scholarship. D.D., LL.D., and F.R.S., are often the heavy baggage of a very slow train. I only judge them by this revision. It is pedantic and capricious, and false to the principle which they declared at the outset would guide them ; namely, that they would make no unnecessary changes.

As to the work done by the American revisionists, I have this to say, one gentleman here takes the responsibility of choosing a group of American scholars to revise the New Testament. The gentleman taking this responsibility having been born and educated in a foreign land was not especially adapted to make wise selection among American scholars. This gentleman in making the selection derided the living and dead generations of Bible readers by saying and reiterating : "The Christian people for years have been drinking the water of life from the jaw-bone of a royal ass." This gentleman selects a group of scholars to revise the New Testament, and excepting four of them they are unknown outside of their little circle. I could call the roll of a hundred scholars superior to all those employed in this work, except the illustrious Dr. Woolsey. If such a work, must needs be done, why not call in convention all the great and good scholars of America, and have them make selection of revisionists? Where in this New Testament Company is the scholarship of Princeton, and Columbia, and Middletown, and New Brunswick?

II. The work is a

which will never be adopted if all the people fearless of criticism and rebuff speak out their real sentiments. To come down to the mechanical arrangement of this new version, I vehemently reject the mode of putting the scripture in columns like a solid newspaper column instead of the division of verses as in our present translation. It is the charm of our old book that a business man or a wife overborne with household cares, or an invalid with no power of consecutive thought, can take up a verse and carry it all day.

I open a page of this new version and I find one paragraph a column and a half long. By this new translation one will be tempted to think "I can take the whole page, so I will take nothing." That shortest verse of the Bible, an ocean of sympathy compressed in two words—Jesus wept—is set in a solid paragraph of one column and a half. You can find it if you look long enough for it ; but it needs to stand out isolated and alone in its grandeur, and tenderness, and pathos, and omnipotence of meaning. Another mechanical misfortune is the dropping of the headings of the chapters. It is an important part of the old translation. We all want to know what the chapter is about before we begin to read it.

III. I reject the new version for

ITS AMAZING TRIVIALITY.

You have more control over your sense of the ridiculous than I have if you can read without a smile some of the changes made or proposed. You remember Christ's sermon where He speaks of the inaptitude of putting new wine into old bottles. In our revision of 1881 it is rendered : "No man putteth new wine into old wine skins, else the skins burst and the wine is spilled and the skins perish. But they put new wine into fresh wine-skins." The change is evidently made to show that the bottles of olden time were made out of the skins of animals, but is it not just as easy to explain the bottles to the people as to explain the wine-skins? "Show me a penny," said Christ wishing from the kingly stamp on it to illustrate its earthly currency. That will not do, say the American revisionists. Instead of "Show me a penny," "show me a denarius." The revision changes the "beasts" of Revelation into "living creatures." But will you not have to explain the living creatures as well as the beasts. The old translation was too much for the delicacy of the American part of the New Testament Company. Where it says of Simon Peter "he girt his coat about him for he was naked," the American Committee suggests that it should read in the margin "had on his undergarment only." The old translation said: "Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel but on a candle-stick." The revisers reject "candle-stick" for "stand."

The new revision makes other changes of how little importance judge ye when it says that the old translation which reads "into a mountain" ought to be "into the mountain;" where the old translation says "into a ship" it ought to be "the ship," and instead of "a teacher in Israel" it ought to be "the teacher," instead of "a good fight" it ought to be "the good fight" and instead of "a crown of righteousness," it ought to be "the crown of righteousness," and instead of "a bushel" "the bushel," and instead of "covered with waves" it ought to read "becoming covered," and instead of "nets break" it ought to read "were breaking," and instead of "straining at a gnat," it ought to be "straining out a gnat" and other infinitesimals of difference with which I shall not worry your patience.

Thirty-eight men for ten years hunt for inaccuracies, and all this only a foretaste of what we shall have when after three years more of labor the forty-one members of the Old Testament Company will launch their work. I have sometimes wondered what the thirty-eight gentlemen of the New Testament Company and the forty-one gentlemen of the Old Testament Company might have accompliished for good if they had spent the last ten years in preaching the old translation instead of finding fault with it, and if the hundreds of thousands of dollars which directly and indirectly have been expended in the preparation of this new revision had been put into the American Bible Society and the British Bible Society for the spreading abroad of that old translation out of whose loins civilization and Christianity were born, and under whose influence England and America are what they are, and the dark skies of heathendom begin to flame with the morning.

What the world wants is not critics but evangels; not men to knock the doxology out of the Lord's prayer but men to make all nations kneel proclaiming at the feet of Christ, "Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory for ever. Amen." At the opening of the service to-day I led you in the Lord's prayer according to the new version, stopping before the doxology, but I will never do it again, either in public or private, unless in my dying prayer my breath should go out at that point, and then I would finish it in heaven, for that is the only part of the Lord's prayer appropriate for both Church militant and Church triumphant.

IV. I reject this revision because it comes

AT A MOST INOPPORTUNE DATE.

The great battle between sin and righteousness is fully open and all the batteries are unlimbered. While the forces of heaven and hell are in hand-to-hand fight it is asked that we stop to discuss whether our weapons might not be hammered into a little better shape, whether we can't have a better tassel put on the hilt of our sword since they make better tassels now than they used to. While the apocalyptic angel is flying through the midst of heaven proclaiming to all nations, and kindreds, and people the Gospel, we are criticising the angel's plumes and trying to catch him till we can stroke his feathers another way.

V. Again I reject this new revision for

of many in the truth of the Bible. Out and out infidelity, after hundreds of years of bombardment, instead of demolishing, has only driven the Bible further into the affections of the world. The chief danger is from the mistaken friends of the Bible. Unbelief and scepticism are not logical. But you have to take men as they are. The revisionists begin their work by saying there are in the New Testament ten thousand mistakes, and that there are one hundred and fifty thousand varieties of reading to the New Testament. The devil takes these statistics, which you can manage without damage to yourself, and he makes them the everlasting ruin of a great multitude. This movement will turn more souls into stark infidelity than the thirty-eight gentlemen of the New Testament Company will ever argue out of it, though they should live the eight hundred and ninty-five years of Mahalaleel, the nine hundred and sixty-two years of Jared, and the nine hundred and sixty-nine years of Methusaleh aggregated.

The greatest work of the last two hundred years has been to have the people understand that this was the Word of God; the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. And now you say there are only 10,000 mistakes in it, and only about 135,000 readings; 40 changes to be made in the Sermon on the Mount. You say they are not radical mistakes. Why, then, all this excitement of the public mind? Look out lest while with torches you are hunting for rats in the cellar, you do not set in conflagration the august temple.

For ten years, and ever since I heard of the movement, I have deplored it. But there has been no good time to speak on the subject till now. I may be scoffed at for my words in very high places, but I am only putting into words the sentiment of more people than ever thought strongly the same way on any one subject since the world was created, and they will be heard; and this is only the muttering of the on-coming tempest of popular indignation cis-Atlantic and trans-Atlantic. Hands off the ark of the covenant.

THE END OF THE WEDGE.

VI. I reject this new version because it opens the door for revisions innumerable. Have you any idea that these changes will stop here? In the back part of this New Testament there are twelve pages of practical protest on the part of the Americans of the New Testament company, against the revision of the Englishmen and Irishmen of the same company. Hence, we shall have another revision to revise this, and another revision to revise that, and as in 1823, Noah Webster published his revision of the Bible, and Professor Noyes and Moses Stuart and Bishop Ellicott, and Dean Alford offered their revision of different portions of the scripture, so we shall have revision on the top of revision, revisions in flocks, revisions in herds, revisions in swarms; and after a while Presbyterian revision and Baptist revision and Episcopalian revision—perhaps I shall issue a revision! and the time will go on if we allow this thing to pass without denunciation until the church will go into paroxysms of revision and there will be nothing intelligent, satisfactory, and appropriate left either in Bible or prayer-book, but the ejaculation, "Good Lord deliver us!"

These discoverers of 10,000 mistakes, and the 135,000 different readings have actually got hold of the music of the angels over Bethlehem. If those angels had known that they were within hearing distance of the New Testament Company, they would not have sung so loud. Instead of the translation which says, "On earth peace, good will toward men," it is to read "on earth peace among men in whom He is well pleased." The rhythm gone, the wide sweep of meaning gone, the Christmas carol choked till it is black in the face. I wonder if the brethren will not go on, now they have their hand in, and give us a new revision of Handel's "Messiah," and Haydn's "Creation," and chisel out a few improvements on Powers' Greek Slave, and touch up Angelo's "Last Judgment," and improve the sunrise and the sunset, and show us the aorist of the spring blossoming of last year, and let us have universal revision.

Meanwhile to private Christians let me give

A WORD OF PRACTICAL ADVICE.

Hold on to your pocket Bibles, your family Bibles, your church Bibles.

THE OLD BIBLE IS GOOD ENOUGH FOR ME.

It has brought so many sons to glory I am hoping through its teaching to get safely there myself. The old Bible is good enough for you. If you have money that you want to spend in augmenting your scriptural knowledge, do not spend it on this mutilation of the scriptures, but purchase Scott's or Clarke's or Barnes' or Jacobus' or Alexander's or Bridges' or Stuart's or French's or Plummer's commentaries. The three hundred million copies of King James's translation will soon vote down the four or ten million of the new revision. Besides it will take more than seventy-nine revisionists to revise the memory of whole generations of Bible readers. The Bible as you now quote it, will be the Bible as quoted till the end of time.

The only revision your Bible will bear, will be the marks of your own lead pencils in the margin, stating how certain passages have been illumined in your own solaced experience. I should not wonder, if upon some of the consolatory passages of the Old Testament, you wrote your own commentary not with pen and ink, but by the indelible signature of a tear. Better than Gustave Doré's illustration of the Scripture would be that Bible illumination. I also advise all private Christians all up and down the earth, and teachers of Sunday-schools, parents and all ministers of the gospel who have unterrified utterance, to be quick and vehement in their protest against this scholarly profanation. Speak out now or forever hold your peace.

I pray God that this excitement about the new revision may wake us all up to higher appreciation of that great monarch of books before which the Iliads and the Odysseys and the Korans and the Vedas and the Shasters and the Zend-Avestas and the national libraries of earth must yet kneel. By its torch may we find our pathway to the end of the pilgrimage, and on its pillow of gracious promises may we drop off into the calm, cool, dreamless slumber that waits for the first resurrection.

A Gallant Rescue has been Acknowledged by Queen Victoria in the presentation of the Albert medal to George Williams, boatman, of the coast-guard. On Sunday morning, the 6th of March last, during a heavy gale, the Norwegian brig Ranger was wrecked at Marywells, when Williams was the means of saving the four survivors of the crew. Communication with the wrecked vessel was obtained by means of the rocket apparatus, but the crew did not seem to understand how to use it, so Williams got into the buoy and hauled himself out hand over hand. On getting within about twenty yards of the wreck, and finding he was making no headway, he dropped from the buoy on to the rocks, and made his way over them and through the wreckage to the wreck, on reaching which he found the crew quite helpless. After almost incredible exertions and difficulties, he saved the four men on board; but his hands were greatly lacerated, and his back severely bruised, and he has since suffered severely from the effects of the exposure and the shock to the system. We can find no words too strong to express admiration of men who endanger their own lives to save those of other people, but we often fail to realize that Christ actually gave His life to ransom rebellious men.

"The Gospel at Rome also."—The Rev. James Wall, of Rome, Italy, mentions in a recent letter that "Signor Barratti had just come to Florence, bringing about seven hundred-weight of copies of the New Testament and Gospels. The people in the street in which the Gospel-room is situated stared at the great boxes which they saw deposited at the door, and when they knew their contents, several strong men offered their help to get them upstairs. After prayer for blessing the boxes were opened, and the missionaries sallied forth to sell the New Testaments, give the Gospels, and invite the people to a meeting in the evening. One hundred New Testaments were sold on the spot, and the meeting afterward was crowded with persons listening to the Word of Life."

JAMES GRAHAM'S BUSH LIFE IN AUSTRALIA.

A Quaint Ceremony—A Grand Hunt and Feast—An Attempt to Shoot Frustrated—Lock Joins a New Firm—"Getting on"—James Graham Innocently Sent to Jail for Three Months.

THE Crajee's face is painted, and his head dressed with feathers and cockatoo top-knots. The fire reveals the warriors standing all around with their weapons in their hands. Lines in white pipe-clay are drawn from their breast-bone along their ribs on either side, and down the outside of their legs and thighs, so that they appear a circle of hideous skeletons, surrounding the inner circle of youths who are about to emerge from picanninies to young men.

As the crajee approaches the music rises to its highest pitch, and when it has reached its climax a number of warriors step forward, and with their waddies knock the young fellows on the side of the head, and as they pull the kangaroo cord, out flies a tooth from every head.

The crajee then steps into the middle of the circle, the music having ceased, and all being still, he in true native Warragera, reads them a long eloquent lecture on the laws of the tribe and of their own future course, and pronounces punishment on them for any breach of chastity they may have previously committed.

Every adult male black you see in Australia wants the second incisor tooth in the upper jaw. This is the mark of manhood. Each must lose a tooth ere he can get a rib; and from this strange extraction, as from Father Adam's in Eden, family life dates. No one can tell whence the immemorial custom is drawn. I do not think they have any tradition of the Bible Eden in it.

Next day the young men are led away into a district of the forest, far from every human resort, and there they are compelled to live on certain roots, grubs, and reptiles, with perhaps an occasional snake or opossum; being compelled to keep Lent, after their fashion, by abstaining from certain proscribed game, especially from kangaroo. For three moons they must not approach a human habitation.

At the end of three moons they make their appearance in the distance; and their friends go forth, and bring them home to as high a feast, in their way, as is the Roman carnival after Lent. Then they live in the young men's camp together; and when any father will betroth his daughter to them or the chief allot them a wife, they may get married; and when they get the gin in possession they remove to the camp of the married men.

We got back next day to the station, having learnt something more of bush life among the natives. I fear, however I have dwelt too long on this excursion; and shall finish off with an account of the jubilee corrobora, when the young men returned after three months, and which we were curious to see.

There was a grand hunt of kangaroos, emus, and opossums just before the end of "the three moons," and a great feast was made to welcome the young men. When the new moon was seen the young men approached the camp, and their friends went out and brought them home with great demonstrations of delight, and the feast commenced.

Some of their wittiest fellows, in different clans, had prepared songs, with appropriate music. These they had rehearsed among some friends of their own; and after the feast they were recited by the composers two or three times in presence of all the company. After the author had sung and danced his solo till all had caught the spirit, air, and dance of the piece, then, with wonderful precision, they commenced their performance.

There was the war dance, in which young men got terrible lessons as to how they were to yell at their enemies, and how to handle the club, the wammerah, and the spear. The kangaroo and emu hunt, in which one party, as hunters, inclosed another, as victims of the chase, was very laughable. There were also songs of patriotism and love. Some mimicked the white man's ignorance of bush life and his peculiar habits and vices. Some of these were exceedingly droll.

All sung a patriotic song in an old dialect inculcating truth to the tribe, and that young men should not wander from it for wives. As they sing it the music commences low, and the men with spears and shields beat time overhead, while they keep time with their feet in the dance. It rises to great vehemence before the end; but closes in deep guttural bass and pectoral grunts. Every clan of the tribe knows and sings it.

I could not help praying most fervently at the close of that day, after my usual evening chat with young Ash, that these people who observed laws of chastity with commendable consistency, and whose hearts were capable of feeling the warm fire of devoted and unselfish patriotism, might ere long rejoice in the health-giving radiance of the Fountain of everlasting life, and learn to sing those songs of redemption which rise from the hearts of those who know and love the name of Christ, the Saviour of the degraded and lost, and to which the Father Divine Himself listens with delight and complacency.

The latter part of the time I remained at Baroo with Ash, Alder, and Lock was not very pleasant. It was not without its incidents, however. One evening as young Ash and I were returning from a distant part of the sheep-run, a fellow bailed us up with a great musket in his hand, which he pointed at Ash's breast, and threatened to shoot him if we did not give up all the money we had. I perceived there was no lock on the musket, and stepping up I wrenched it out of his hands; and, having given him a sound banging with it, dismissed him and took it home.

Little adventures of this kind together made young Ash and me fast friends. Why I mention this you will see by and by. Lock and he, as I before said, could not agree together. We all lived in the one house, and ate at the one table. And as husband and wife, by night and day, have the very best opportunities of mutual annoyance, so young Ash and Lock had the next best. They did not let them slip, for two more opposite characters than close, worldly-wise Lock, and candid, generous Ash could not well be. At length Ash and Alder gave notice to Lock for a dissolution of partnership.

Before news of this got abroad, Lock went to a most opulent squatting firm near Bathurst and induced them to receive him as partner, on condition of his bringing so much capital with him. He was looked on as one of the ablest buyers and salesmen, and so he was. I never knew a man who, before he bought, could so persuasively say, "It is naught, it is naught" (Proverbs 20:14), or so quietly show the good points of what he had to sell. I never knew a man who could so steadily and silently keep a long complex plan in view, and with true calculation realize every step.

Messrs. Bullock and Sheepshanks were quite right in thinking they had got an able partner in Jerrold Lock. The latter soon gave proof of his business habits; for he had a stamped agreement, with regular articles of partnership, at once drawn up by his favorite solicitor, Mr. Holdfast, of Bathurst.

Lock drew, as well as I remember, £550 from Ash and Alder. Perhaps it was that he feared money would injure me; but except the experience I had gained, and the clothes and stores I had drawn, he proposed I should have only some £10 for my two years. Young Ash spoke very strongly, I was told. He declared that if the man that did work deserved money, I deserved it better than Lock. They generously gave me the sum of £60.

When they had settled all, and the other partners gave me a strong recommendation to a magistrate, whom (as the history is so modern I prefer an occasional change of names) I shall call Benjamin Pyrphren, Esq., he engaged me at a salary of £50 per annum as general overseer.

But to return to Lock. No sooner had his former partners heard of his intended partnership with Bullock and Sheepshanks than they thought it their duty to advise them of Lock's style of sharp practice. They took the alarm and repudiated the agreement. Lock smiled at them, and directed them to his solicitor. The result was that they paid him some £400 of damages for breach of contract. He had then upward of £1000 in money and stock.

My employer had a son-in-law lately appointed a stipendiary magistrate, by name and title Edward Cabbage, Esq., S.J.P. He had seized the confiscated stock of an old government man, who after his emancipation had become a successful stockholder, but who had to fly for a grievous misdemeanor. The law was that such stock should be sold by public auction. But as only some fifty head of very poor cattle were found at the station, Lock went to the magistrate and offered to buy them by private contract; for it would not be worth while to have a public sale of so few and such poor cattle. Cabbage consented, and sold them, on account of government, at two pounds a head.

Lock had a bill of sale of all the stock of Dick Flylaw made out at the same price. He asked me to witness the payment of part of this money as well as the magistrate's signature. He had been very gracious that morning, having brought news from home, and I was soft enough to comply. He put the whole affair into the hands of Holdfast.

Before a week above two hundred head of prime cattle belonging to Flylaw were driven in out of the bush with his unmistakable brand. I suppose Lock had information that the outlaw's friends had driven them away. They were worth more than double what Lock had bought them for.

The result was that my employer and Cabbage had to compromise with Lock for £300. My employer, before the suit came on, wanted me to go a hundred miles up the country to look for stray cattle till the trial should be over. Lock adjured me by Heaven and honor and friendship to do justice between man and man. I told my employer I must do so as a witness. He grew black in the face, and answered, "Then remember it."

Lock was making a rapid fortune. He soon set up stockkeeping for himself, and one day he met me he gave me excellent advice, and backed it home by saying, "Graham, I came to the colony as poor as you; how is it you cannot get on like me? I fear you will be all your life in the service of others."

I felt my inferiority, and remained dumb; though I felt tempted to compliment him on his skill in making law contribute to his gain from the fruit of the industry of others, whereas I could only make money by my own hard work. I did not then recall to mind the fable of the tortoise and the hare. And it was clear that Lock did not care to remember the statement in the Bible, that "an inheritance may be gotten hastily at the beginning; but the end thereof shall not be blessed" (Proverbs 20:21).

Before a month my employer had his noose set for me. He told me to take his saddle-horse and go into Bathurst to inquire of certain stockmen concerning a mob of cattle bearing his brand that had strayed into the bush before I took oversight of the station. I did so, and he had me summoned to the bench on the charge of deserting my duties on the station without leave, and, moreover, riding off his own saddle-horse.

There was no witness, but God, that he gave me the orders, and several witnesses of my being in Bathurst at the time he said. My character was blameless, and known through all the district, but all in vain. My employer's brother-magistrates believed him and disbelieved me; and, though he was plaintiff, he sat on the bench while I was sentenced to three months' imprisonment in Bathurst jail.

Young Ash and his uncle had removed away to Sydney, I think, and Lock was nowhere. I felt stunned by the unjust and unexpected blow; but this is a simple, unvarnished statement of facts. Indeed, such things were quite common to men in the colonies then; though I did not then know it. When I came to understand such things I did not so much wonder at my treatment, or that so many unfriended and injured men betook themselves to the bush and to the wild justice of revenge. It is rather a damaging thing to a man to say of him that he was convicted and imprisoned once in his life; but my experience has taught me charity in judging, for if I ever did a true and upright act it was that which got me convicted and imprisoned.

But now of Lock—though it anticipates my story. When he heard I was in prison he came to see me. He heard all, and learned that for his sake my salary was cancelled, my deposit forfeited, and myself without money or character, and, in jail. He was dressed like a gentleman; and as my offence was one of the lightest I had leave to walk with him to and fro to the porter's lodge, and sit down there and talk.

CHRIST'S PROPHECY ON THE MOUNT.

MATTHEW 24.

By Rev. Richard Chester, A.B.

The Great Tribulation—Easy of Interpretation—A Different Advent—Reconciliation of Two Aspects—The Jewish Remnant.

WE can point to the site upon which the once proud buildings of the Temple stood, and to the recent records of "the Palestine Exploration Society," in proof of how accurately the opening words of our Lord's discourse, as here recorded, have been accomplished, and "not one stone" of all that glorious structure "left upon another," but "all of them thrown down." Having done this, may we not triumphantly ask if there be any room for doubt or question, or misgiving as to the equally literal accomplishment in the glorious Second Appearing of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ of each and every particular foretold in the prophecy, which has not as yet completely come to pass?

From verse 36, however, to the end of the chapter, we get upon altogether and encounter statements and warnings which it is not at first sight easy, I may almost say possible, to reconcile with what has gone before.

In the former portion of the chapter we read of an Advent preceded and heralded by many most remarkable and portentous events—an Advent which cannot possibly take place until these events shall have each and all of them occurred. So fully must this be the case that our Lord speaks (verses 32, 33) of the occurrence of these signs as betokening the nearness of His coming, just as the buds upon the fig tree most surely betoken the advent of the summer. But the sequel of the chapter, from verse 36 to the end, forewarns us of an Advent, "the day and hour of which knoweth no man" (verse 36), which shall come upon the world unexpectedly, even as the flood upon the world of the ungodly (verses 37–39)—which shall come so suddenly that "two men shall be at work in the field—two women grinding at the mill"—the world's business and the world's pleasures going on in their ordinary every-day course—when all at once "one" of the two thus employed "shall be taken," the other "shall be left" (verses 40, 41).

We read in the former part of the chapter of an Advent, of which, owing to its premonitory signs, those who are alive upon the earth at the time cannot but be aware, previous to the occurrence of these signs, that it is still at some distance, and when they occur that it is positively close at hand. In the latter part we read of an Advent so unheralded as to the actual time of its occurrence by any premonitory signs that we are expressly bidden (verse 42) to be evermore upon the watch for it, inasmuch as "we know not what hour our Lord shall come;" to be always ready for it (verse 44), because it is "at an hour that we think not the Son of Man cometh."

How are these two aspects of the Second Advent to be reconciled? There is but one way that I know of, or can possibly conceive.

Our blessed Lord's First Advent, foretold throughout the Old Testament Scriptures as one event, consisted nevertheless of or parts—His coming to the stable at Bethlehem to be born, His coming to the cross on Calvary to die as a sacrifice for the sins of the world.

There was an unrevealed interval of thirty-three years between these two. Even so I believe that the Scriptures which foretell His Second Advent do, not obscurely or uncertainly reveal to us that it in like manner will consist of two separate acts or parts—His coming for His saints to the air to "receive them to Himself" (1 Thessalonians 4:15–17; John 14:3). His subsequent coming with His saints to the earth in judgment upon the world of the ungodly (Zechariah 14:1–12; Revelation 19:11–21). And that there will in like manner be an interval of unrevealed duration between these two events. To this latter aspect of His Advent, and to its memorable type in the destroying judgment upon Jerusalem under Titus, our Lord, I believe, refers exclusively in Matthew 24:1–35. To the former aspect of the Advent, I, for my part, feel perfectly satisfied that He refers altogether in the sequel of the chapter, verses 36 to the end.

It may, however, not unnaturally, be asked, why, if such be the case, should the reference to what you regard as the first part of the Advent come last? Why should not the latter part of the prophecy have preceded the former? The reason for this is not, it seems to me, difficult to determine. Our blessed Lord was led to the whole subject by the fact of His disciples having directed His attention to the buildings of the Temple, and by the questions which they put to Him concerning the overthrow of these buildings, when He had announced it to them. He had, therefore, to deal first with the events connected with that overthrow, and with that aspect of His Second Advent of which they formed so remarkable a type.

In so doing, it seems specially worthy of our notice, He spoke to His disciples as the representatives of—and, therefore, the recipients of the teaching concerning His Advent which was intended for—not so much the members of the yet uncommenced Christian Church, which did not begin to exist, and of which these disciples did not become members until the subsequent memorable day of Pentecost, but which teaching was specially intended for which several predictions in the Old Testament and in the Book of Revelation (for instance, Zechariah 14, Revelation 7), represent as in Jerusalem in the days immediately preceding that Advent. Of such the disciples whom the Lord was upon this occasion addressing were the becoming representatives at that time. They were Jews, believing in, and faithful to, Jesus of Nazareth as their long-promised Messiah at a time when their nation was rejecting Him. They were in daily expectation of His "taking to Himself His great power" and "restoring the kingdom to Israel." But they were not yet Christians.

Of Jesus as the crucified and risen Redeemer—of the distinctive doctrines which constitute men and women, whether Jews or Gentiles, members of the Church of Christ—they were as yet in utter ignorance. Therefore, the Lord here addresses them as representatives of a faithful Jewish remnant of the latter day—the "one third," it would seem, who are spoken of (Zechariah 13:8, 9). He sets before them the circumstances under which His Advent to the Mount of Olives (Zechariah 14:1–5) shall find this remnant, and the aspect which it shall wear to them (verses 32, 33), and the far different aspect which it shall wear to the unbelieving world (verses 29, 30), as also its result (verse 31) to the still dispersed members of their elect nation then to be completely restored.

That such is the tenor of this portion of the chapter seems very evident from the language of verses 15–21. None but those actually in Jerusalem at the time can witness the setting up of "the abomination of desolation," which I have already shown to be a yet future event. To none else can the words of verse 16, "Then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains," have any possible application, or the future warning of verses 17–19. While the exhortation of verse 20, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day"—utterly inapplicable to, and therefore never acted upon or obeyed by, any members of the Christian Church—seems conclusive upon the matter.

If it be thus manifest that the language of this first portion of the prophecy is specially intended for Jewish disciples as such, no less evident is it that the sequel of the chapter (verse 36 to the end) has a general application, was addressed to the disciples in their then future position as the first members of the Christian Church, and representatives, as such, of all its members to the end of the age. The first portion is specially designed for those upon whom the Advent would come in connection with trials and dangers out of which they were to flee, the latter for those whom the Advent would find working in the field, grinding at the mill, engaged in their ordinary every-day avocations; and of whom one would be "taken"—the same verb as in John 14:3, "I will receive you unto myself"—and the other would be "left." The exhortation to these accordingly is not, "Pray that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." It is, verse 42, "Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come."

INCIDENTS OF THE FIVE POINTS MISSION.

The Jew Who Believed Nothing.

[The following story is told in the words of the missionary connected with the Five Points Mission about thirty years ago.]

Not long since, as I was sitting in the office, a poor-looking Jew, with the longest possible face and a most woe-begone expression, came in and asked me if I could do something for him. I told him that I did not know what he wanted. He said, "I wants some clothes, to make me look so as people will like me and give me work." "What is your business?" said I. "I am glazier, but my diamond is in de pawn-shop, and I has not de means to get it out, so as I can work." "Where do you live?" "Around in de next street; but I is very poor, and cannot get any sleep all tree nights. I wish you could give me some place to sleep." I told him I would help him in some way.

He brightened up at this, and I asked him, "Do you love Jesus?" "No." "Do you believe in Him?" "No." "Do you believe in God?" "Yes, but not Jesus; no, no, not Jesus." "Do you believe the New Testament?" "No." "Well, come with me," said I, as he followed me to the wardrobe, where I clothed him, and then inquired, "Do you think Nature a sufficient teacher?" "Yes; do you know my faith?" I said I did not. "Well, den, I am pantheist, and don't believe noting." "It was the religion of Jesus," I replied, "that put it into the hearts of Christians to send these clothes to me for you, and then put it into my heart to give them to you, and (handing him some silver) gave others and me a heart to give you this. Do you not think there is something in the religion of Jesus?" "I don't know," he said, shaking his head; but as he was going out, I saw the big tear roll down his cheek. I was deeply moved with his cold, cheerless unbelief, and as I knew not how to meet his many objections to the religion of Jesus, I the more earnestly prayed for him.

It was some time before I saw him again, and when I did he said he was sick, and I sent him to Dr. McNaire, who examined him and found his liver somewhat affected, though convinced, as he has since told me, that his trouble was more of the mind than the body. He came back to me from the doctor, and said he "felt very bad." I at once began the old story: "You must be converted. The blood of Jesus can alone take away your sins, and without it you will be lost after all your good thoughts." He sighed deeply, and I spoke earnestly to him, showing him that immediate reconciliation with God through Jesus Christ was his only way of escape. I was called away, and when I came back he was gone.

Some time elapsed before I saw him again, and then I met him in the street. I asked him how he felt, and to my great surprise and wonder his only reply was, "I tink I need de blood of Jesus." Without another word I went on my way, thinking that the Spirit was doing the work, and needed me not. Some days after I met him full of smiles, with the queerest expression of face imaginable: a tear standing in each eye, and his mouth in a half-laugh, half-cry form. "How do you do?" said I. With deep earnestness he replied, "I feel such a loveness to Jesus I could not sleep last night." "Do you believe the Bible now?" I asked. "Yes, I believe, but I do not understand." "Are you sure your sins are all forgiven?" Laying his hand on his breast, he said, "Oh, yes! I know it here."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senatorial Contest at Albany Last Week was of an indecisive character. The caucus summoned in the interest of the ex-senators was attended by only thirty-six Republicans, while at the administration conference there were present fifty-seven members. The latter wing of the party were united in opposition to Messrs. Conkling and Platt, but did not agree on any candidates of their own for the vacant offices. The Democrats nominated Senator Jacobs and Ex-Senator Kernan. Balloting commenced on Tuesday, May 31st, and has been continued on every day since, with substantially the same results as on the first day. The vote has stood, for Mr. Conkling, 35; for Mr. Platt, 29; for Mr. Jacobs, 53; for Mr. Kernan, 54. The balance of the Republican vote was scattered among some twenty candidates, of whom Governor Cornell is apparently the strongest.

However the struggle may end, the fact of there being a contest of this character at all, is in itself substantially a defeat for the ex-senators. Their resignation and candidature for re-election was apparently a strategic movement designed to increase their strength in their conflict with the administration. That movement has failed, for, even if re-elected, their position will be weaker than it was before they resigned. Then Mr. Conkling was the unanimous choice of his party in the State, now it is plain that a large proportion, if not the majority, of the party are opposed to him. A triumphant and spontaneous re-election would have been, in a measure, an expression of popular opinion which might have influenced other senators, and possibly have had its weight with the President and his cabinet; but anything short of an unsolicited and unanimous re-election is worthless for that purpose.

Among the possible issues of this split in the Republican party is a postponement of the election until after the fall, when the Democrats may gain sufficient strength to elect two Democratic senators and so gain the control of the United States Senate. Both the President and the ex-senators would probably in such a case entertain a new opinion as to the importance of the issue on which they have fought.

Both the Ex-Presidents Have Favored the public with their views on the senatorial contest. Gen. Grant, in his letter to Senator Jones, and in other ways, has expressed his sympathy with Mr. Conkling, but he is reported to have said that, otherwise, he will take no part in the fight. If the report is true, the general's decision is an evidence of his prudence, and it may simplify matters in many ways. Mr. Conkling, reflecting upon it, may decide to take no hand in any fight on the general's behalf in the future, and so the troublesome question of a third term may be finally eliminated from the field of politics. Ex-President Hayes's contribution to the discussion is the statement that he considers Mr. Conkling "a monomaniac." Mr. Hayes is not complimentary, but he probably thinks this a favorable opportunity to retaliate on the antagonist of his own administration. The present position of Mr. Hayes outside the circle of politics, his character and experience, entitle his opinions to general respect. If he would also tell us what he thinks of Assistant Secretary Brady, and some other of his former officials, he might rely on an attentive audience. A satisfactory explanation of certain irregularities said to have been discovered by President Garfield's administration would be a relief to many people who gave Mr. Hayes and his cabinet their stedfast support.

The Resignations of the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury and his deputy have been tendered, at the request of Secretary Windom, and accepted. The sixth auditor is intrusted with the examination of the post office accounts and his office is in the post office building. It is understood that Mr. Windom's action was taken at the suggestion of Postmaster-General James and the Attorney General, who considered the removals necessary to the thorough investigation of the star route contracts. It is claimed on behalf of the auditor and his deputy, that their duties were confined to ascertaining that the accounts were in due form and arithmetically correct. The resignation of First Assistant Postmaster-General Tyner was also announced on Saturday last. The appointment of Colonel William A. Cook as Special Assistant Attorney General to take charge of the star route business seems to imply that criminal proceedings will be taken. The net annual saving on star route and steamboat mail service so far effected by reductions and discontinuances, amounts to $745,568.

The Reduction of the Public Debt at the close of last month amounted to $11,150,721. This sum makes the total reduction for the eleven months of the fiscal year $89,250,323. The receipts during May averaged one million dollars daily, and it is believed that if, as is probable, that rate is maintained during the month of June, the reduction during the entire year will reach the large sum of one hundred millions. The internal revenue, which Mr. Sherman estimated would produce $130,000,000, has already amounted to $123,443,283, and there are still to be made the collections for June.

The Pertinacity of the Opponents of Dr. Talmage has probably reached its limit. Their complaint was originally presented to the Presbytery, who dismissed it; they then appealed to the Synod of Long Island, who declined to entertain it; and finally they appealed to the General Assembly, the highest ecclesiastical court in the Presbyterian Church. Last week the General Assembly dismissed the complaint, thus confirming the Synod and the Presbytery in their decision that it was not of a character demanding investigation. We may now hope that the last has been heard of this movement. It was generally deplored at its initiation, and its conduct was marked by the display of a spirit so uncharitable, if not actually vindictive, as to excite wide-spread sorrow among Christians jealous for the honor of Christ's Church and zealous for the spread of the Gospel in the world.

Police Brutalities have been Brought under public notice by the publication in one of the New York dailies of a list of persons who during the past three months have suffered unjustly at the hands of these officials. The list records the cases of men who, while suffering from sudden and severe sickness, have been found unconscious in the streets and have been flung into a police cell under the charge of drunkenness, when they should have been sent to an hospital. In one case, after lying in a cell for some time, the victim was found still unconscious and after a rough examination was supposed to be dead and was actually sent to the Morgue, though he there recovered under proper treatment. Citizens are startled by the discovery that if rendered unconscious in the street by sudden injury or sudden sickness, they may be first clubbed over the head, and then dragged to a prison. The danger is a serious one, and some attempts should be made to counteract it. The ignorant and brutal ruffians who manage to obtain appointments among the intelligent members of the force should be taught that discrimination is necessary in cases of insensibility. It may seem to a policeman an over-nice and fastidious distinction to draw between the case of a man suffering from an epileptic attack and that of one drunk and incapable, but the public has a different opinion and thinks such a distinction should be made or that those inhuman monsters who perpetrate the outrages should be dismissed from the force.

The Excitement Produced in this City on Wednesday, June 1st, by the intelligence that Iroquois, an American horse, belonging to Mr. Lorillard, had won the famous English race known as the Derby, indicates how far society still is below that standard of life which the religion of Christ sets up as the true estimate of progress. The brokers of the stock exchange stopped buying and selling to join in the general exultation, and the American success was the general topic of conversation in the cars and in the streets. One newspaper went to the expense of telegraphic arrangements by which the result of the race was flashed from the course to its office in four seconds from the moment the horses passed the winning post at Epsom, and no greater interest could have been manifested had the fate of nations hung in the balance. All this excitement and agitation over a horse race, while the great prize of the Christian life, which the Apostle Paul describes under the figure of a race, is a matter of indifference to the world!

Miss S. A. Sewell, whose Christian Work in the prisons of New York and among the employees at railroad depots in the Western States has been so signally blest of God, arrived in New York from England on June 2d. For more than a year she has been laboring in the cities and large towns of Great Britain with remarkable success. In every place at which she was invited to hold meetings the Holy Spirit was present quickening and converting souls. In the Mile End Road, London, a locality notorious for the poverty and squalid misery of the inhabitants, many of whom belong to the criminal classes and nearly all are Godless and depraved, Miss Sewell's services were thronged with anxious listeners, and she was the means of the conversion of large numbers of abandoned profligates. At Bristol over three hundred people came forward to acknowledge Christ before men, as the result of God's blessing on her work, and at many other places her services were similarly blessed. Miss Sewell had a stormy and tedious voyage to America, in the course of which she suffered severely. She proposes to take a short season of rest, and then to recommence her work in such places and spheres as the Lord may direct.

Some Facts Deserving Serious Consideration were elicited in the course of a trial at Philadelphia two weeks ago. A woman was charged with the murder of her new-born babe. Her husband had deserted her, and she wandered about the streets penniless and in rags. She was found there by a woman almost as poor as herself, but who generously gave her bread and shelter for the night. The next day she took her from one wealthy charity to another, and being refused at each on account of some technical objection, she finally took her to the almshouse, but she was refused admission there too, because she was married. For several days the woman wandered about the city without food. Three times she fell fainting in the street from sheer weakness and fatigue. At length hopeless of obtaining assistance, she begged a few cents and hired a wretched garret room, in which there was not a single article of furniture. There her child was born, and there she was said to have killed it in her frenzied despair. We have been often told of the advantages of organized over indiscriminate charity, but there is something wrong about a system under which such an experience as this woman's is possible. It would seem in this case that the rules of the institutions were too rigidly enforced, and sufficient discretion was not allowed to the officials. This revelation ought to be a warning to the managers of our charities.

The Y. M. C. A. of Mobile Ala., Presents a very encouraging report of its position and progress. It has only been two years in existence, yet at its anniversary on May 16th, the membership was stated at over five hundred, though at the commencement there were only seventeen members. One interesting feature of the organization is that by a resolution adopted last year ladies may become honorary members. The experiment has been eminently satisfactory, the finances of the association have profited by the exertions of the lady members, and the meetings have become more interesting and profitable since they have participated in them.

An Appeal to Christians Against the Wicked practice of duelling has been made by Bishop Howe, of the Episcopal Church in South Carolina. The bishop expresses his conviction that in the greater number of these encounters, men professing to be Christians have been directly or indirectly concerned. The bishop urges preachers to warn their hearers of the sin of this practice, and ladies especially to exert their influence against it. This appeal is timely, and the public journals give evidence of its necessity. "The code of honor," and "the satisfaction customary among gentlemen" are fine phrases, but it ought never to be forgotten that deliberate and premeditated murder is not excused by such phrases, and that we are expressly forbidden by God to avenge ourselves (Rom. 12 : 19).

Color-Blindness has been Made the Subject of investigation by the surgeons of the United States Marine Hospital service, which has resulted in inducing the belief that the peculiarity, while generally hereditary, is in many cases acquired. It is found to be a symptom of some diseases of the brain and optic nerve, and it is recommended that pilots and engineers, after any exhausting disease, such as typhoid fever, be tested as to their perception of color before again resuming their duties. Injuries about the head may, it is said, produce partial color-blindness, and the same effect is sometimes produced by the excessive use of alcohol and tobacco. Its effect is that the sufferer is unable to distinguish one color from another. The fact that it is sometimes induced by vicious habits suggests the thought that it resembles the spiritual state of the man who has sunk into so low a state of degradation as to be unable to recognize sin in practices which the soul enlightened by the Holy Spirit perceives are grievously wicked.

A Husband was Reproved in the Presence of his dissolute companions recently by his wife at Cape Girardeau, Mo. She had suffered severe privations from his neglect, while he wasted his money in drink and frivolous amusements. One day she traced him to a barroom, where he was playing cards with several companions. Setting a covered dish she held in her hands down upon the table she said, "Presuming, husband, that you were too busy to come home to dinner, I have brought you yours," and departed. With a forced laugh he invited his friends to dine with him, but on removing the cover from the dish found only a slip of paper, on which was written, "I hope you will enjoy your meal; it is the same your family have at home." The influence of a dissipated life on the conscience is to harden it, causing the sinner to become oblivious of his duties toward God, his family, and the world. In such cases an open reproof so forcible as this wife administered sometimes produces the effect needed (Prov. 13 : 18).

A Surgical Operation was Performed by a cough at Norristown, Pa. recently. The Philadelphia Press says that General William J. Bolton, while Colonel of the Fifty-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Veteran Volunteers, was awaiting orders on a mound at the time of the famous mine explosion at Petersburg, July 30th, 1864, when a Confederate canister-shell exploded near him, and a small bullet entered his lower right jaw at the very point where he had received a bullet wound at the battle of Antietam. Since then General Bolton felt pain and oppression in his neck, which of late was more intense, and he felt some sharp object cutting its way toward his throat—pieces of his shattered jawbone he thought. On May 20th this year, while in business, he had occasion to stoop, and was immediately taken with a violent fit of coughing. Placing his hand instinctively over his mouth something dropped into his hand. He found it to be the painful little ball. It was covered with rust, and its surface was traversed by sharp ridges. In this case nature succeeded in ejecting the troublesome intruder after scientific skill had failed. According to some pernicious modern teaching, men may unaided so eradicate evil from their nature, but the attempt has always proved a failure. Holiness and purity are the work of the Holy Spirit alone (Titus 3 : 3-5).

A Man has been Tried Five Times for a Murder at St. Louis, and the fifth trial ended on May 21st in his conviction. His name is Charles F. Krug, and he is found guilty of murdering Mrs. Dora Droemser on January 15th, 1875. This is the second time he has been convicted and sentenced to death. His counsel has again given notice of motion for another trial, so that it is possible the prisoner may be arraigned the sixth time. Krug, if he is really guilty, has been able to evade the just punishment of his crime for a long time, and his and similar cases operate prejudicially on the criminal classes, inducing a hope that their crimes may not bring judgment upon them. Sinners indulge the same hope with regard to God's warnings, but they will be deceived. God is very merciful, but His judgments are not only just but certain (Eccles. 8 : 11–13).

An Act of Genuine Heroism was Performed by a mere boy at a fire at Waterville, Conn., a few days ago. A Connecticut paper, describing the fire, says that just as the flames burst out from the explosion of the oil-tank a boy named William Reed was seen emerging from the building, his clothing apparently on fire, with a keg of gunpowder in his arms, calling out and warning others to get out of the way, as the powder might explode. His own danger he did not mind, but bore the keg to a place of safety. There was real nobility displayed in that daring act which is a rebuke to the spirit of worldly prudence now too prevalent. According to the world's maxims the boy's first duty when he perceived the impending danger was to provide for his own safety, then, if he could do so without peril, to warn others, but this brave lad reversed the policy. We too should never forget that although we may not be called to perform such an act, yet our own convenience and interests ought not to prevent our taking advantage of opportunities for Christian usefulness. Christ Himself taught this (John 10 : 30–37).

A Piteous Spectacle was Witnessed at a Funeral in Pittsburg on May 30th. As the coffin containing the remains of a prominent citizen was deposited in the church the divorced wife of the dead man was observed entering the edifice, where she remained during the service weeping bitterly. As the relatives surrounded the coffin to take a last look at the face of the dead, the erring woman approached the group, begging that she might look once more at the man she had loved. She was repulsed, for they knew how bitter had been the suffering her sin had caused her husband. She continued her appeals until the glass was covered, and even then followed the coffin to the grave and tried unavailingly to induce the gravedigger to remove the cover, now wet with the tears wrung from her by remorse. The scene was a very sad one, but none could say that the woman's sin did not merit this denial of her request. But for her, and such as her, there remains the consolation that true penitence and faith will be accepted by Him who came to seek and to save that which was lost.

Twenty-three Years of Prayer have been answered in the conversion of one of a troop of minstrels. The young man related the circumstances at a meeting in New York last week. He said his father prayed twenty-three years for his conversion. The speaker was a minstrel and achieved notoriety. His father was a beloved and respected minister. The father died not having received the fulfilment of the promise, but now after his death the son was converted. Since his conversion he has sought to do a good work in the field of Gospel temperance, and has been eminently useful.

THE SUBSTANCE OF TRUE RELIGION.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"But ye should say, Why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me."—JOB 19 : 28.

The Essential and the Ornamental in Religion—I. The Essential Defined—Firm Faith in the Redeemer—Religious Fancy Goods—Appropriating Faith—Trust in God—The Living Redeemer—Confidence in Certain Salvation—II. The Essential Described—A Rootless Tree mere Timber—The Root a Vital Necessity—Comprehends all else—III. Its Possession Discernable by Others—Sometimes Hidden—An Inward Thing—Should be Avowed—A Source of Comfort—A Defence against Opposers—IV. Demands Tender Respect—A Rebuke to Persecution—The South Sea Islanders and a Romish Picture—An End to Ungenerous Denunciation—Persecution by Mistrust—Encourage the Tender Root.

YOU will always understand a passage of Scripture better if you carefully attend to its connection. The habit of picking out portions from the Bible and separating them from their context may be carried a great deal too far, and in the process the reader may miss the mind of the Spirit, and force upon the words a meaning of his own. If we were to treat men's books as we do God's Book we should, probably, be judged to be insane. It is, indeed, a wonderful book to bear such mangling. Every sensible person will see that it must always be wise to study the context, for it is likely enough to cast a light upon the passage in hand.

Job in the verse before us is answering Bildad the Shuhite. Now, this Bildad on two occasions had described Job as a hypocrite, and accounted for his dire distress by the fact that, though hypocrites may flourish for a time, they will ultimately be destroyed. In the two bitter speeches which he made he described the hypocrite under the figure of a tree which is torn up by the roots, or dies down even to the root. The inference he meant to draw was this: you, Job, are utterly dried up, for all your prosperity is gone, and therefore you must be a hypocrite. The assault was very cruel, but the sufferer successfully parried it. No, says Job, I am no hypocrite. I will prove it by your own words, for the root of the matter is still in me, and therefore I am no hypocrite. Though I admit that I have lost branch, and leaf, and fruit, and flower, yet I have not lost the root of the matter, for I hold the essential faith as firmly as ever; and, therefore, by your own argument, I am no hypocrite, and "Ye should say, why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me?"

There is then, dear friends, a something in true religion which is its essential root. It has fundamental matters which cannot be dispensed with under any circumstances. Some things pertain to godliness, are ornamental, useful, pleasant, and desirable, yet these may be absent and still there may be the truth of religion in the soul: but there is a something which cannot be absent in any case without its being certain that the man is not a true child of God; there is a something which is vital, without which there is no spiritual life. Of

we are going to speak this morning as we are enabled by the Holy Spirit.

Job derived comfort from the fact that the root of the matter was in him, whatever his accusers might say, and I trust that others will be encouraged as they too shall find that the root of the matter is in them. It will be pleasant to my heart to cheer the fainting, and equally so if I can lead my stronger brethren to deal tenderly with such.

I. Our first thought will be that this root of the matter may be clearly defined. We are not left in the dark as to what the essential point of true religion is; it can be laid down with absolute certainty. True there has been considerable disputing over the phrase before us and questions have been raised as to what Job meant by "the root of the matter," but I conceive that if we read the verse in its own connection, apart from any extraneous suggestion, there will be no doubt about its meaning.

Commence at the twenty-fifth verse, and read on as Job spoke, and he tells us plainly what is "the root of the matter." Here it is: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me." This knowledge of the Redeemer is evidently the root of the matter. Come, then, let us look more closely into this choice confession of faith. I shall not attempt to expound this golden utterance, but I shall glance at it with the one object of showing what Job considered to be the essence of true religion.

And, first, it is clear that "the root of the matter" is in the Redeemer; it is to be able to say from the inmost heart, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Not I think so, but "I know;" for saving faith is certain, and the true believer is a positivist. Faith abhors conjectures, it will not put its foot down upon fictions, but rests upon matters of fact. Faith never deals in the fancy goods of opinion, theory, speculation, and probability; she searches for the priceless pearl of certainty; she must needs know. Such was the faith of Job, and he expresses it in firm, decided, clear language, saying, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

This faith was an appropriating one, so that Job took to himself the Redeemer. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," laying hold upon the Lord to be unto him all that he was meant to be, namely, a Redeemer who would set him at liberty from his misery. He embraced the Redeemer as his own, and believed that he would be raised by Him from the pit of corruption. Come, brethren, have we such a faith as this? a faith which knows that there is a Saviour able to redeem and sure to accomplish the work? And do we take Him for our own, saying, "my Redeemer?" This is the point: Do we accept him in His ordained office and cast our soul entirely upon Him? Are we content to sink or swim with this God's appointed Saviour? If saved it shall be by Him; and at His cross foot are we content to lie and wait the issue? This is the "root of the matter;" a recognition of the redeeming Lord, and a simple dependence upon Him for sure salvation.

Look steadily at the passage, and especially gaze into its original meaning, and you will see that in this "root of the matter" there is a recognition of the blessed Christ of God in the peculiar relationship which he has taken up to man. It is "I know that my goel, or kinsman, liveth." You know what the next of kin was among the Jews: it was he who must redeem the inheritance if it had been alienated from the family: he was the guardian of those to whom he was next of kin. If there had been manslaughter committed, it was the near kinsman, who must take vengeance on behalf of the murdered man. The goel was the patron of the weak ones of the family, and the defender of the whole clan.

Beloved, this is a cardinal point of saving faith, that Jesus Christ the eternal Son of God is next of kin to us poor, guilty men. His name is Emmanuel, God with us: not only God from before all worlds, but God with us in our nature. The Word was made flesh: Jesus was born at Bethlehem, and there he was nursed at the breast of a woman. He lived among our race, bearing our infirmities, and tempted in all points like as we are, though without sin. It is most sweet for faith to say, He is nearest of kin to me; my goel, my Redeemer; bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh,

"In ties of blood with sinners one."

He is the Head, the second Adam of our race, a brother born for adversity, yea, and more than a brother.

Because He has deigned to enter into the closest of all relationships with us by taking upon Himself our nature, the Lord Jesus has now become our Redeemer, bound to restore to those who are in Him the inheritance which was forfeited by the fall. Glory be to His name, He has restored that which He took not away; He has redeemed from the hand of the enemy that which sin and Satan snatched from us by our first parents' fault. Nor is this all—the goel was bound also to avenge the quarrel of his client. Our Lord is now our advocate with the Father, pleading our cause both by the word of His mouth and by the power of His arm. "Thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul," O Jesus! Thou art my defender and my exceeding great reward.

Still look at the text further, and you perceive that the root of the matter is to believe that this kinsman, this Redeemer lives. We could never find comfort or salvation in one who had ceased to be. We have no lively hope unless we believe that our Lord Jesus Christ was raised from the dead. If it were possible for us to believe in the merit of Christ's death, and to deny His resurrection, our faith would have a fatal flaw in it. "He was delivered for our offences, but He was raised again for our justification;" and, therefore, we must believe in the resurrection or we are not justified. It is because He ever liveth to make intercession for us that He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him.

Still there was more than this: Job believed in this next of kin of his who still lived, that he would surely save him, seeing he trusted in him. He expected that he would right all things, however wrong they might be, and clear the character of his servant. Job felt that though his accusers might condemn him, and his appeal to God might not win him a vindication, so that he might go down to his grave under a cloud of reproach, and lie there and rot with a dishonored memory, yet he would be cleared one day. Though the worms might devour his body till no rag or relic of him remained, yet his living kinsman would never rest till he had cleared him, and enabled him to see God without fear. This is to feel that whatever God may do with me, if I am in Christ and behave myself as His faithful servant He will preserve me from all harm.

Yea, and I shall see my God again, and even my poor failing body, full of aches and pains and weakness, after resting in the grave a little, shall rise again in beauty and power. The grave is a refining pot wherein the bodies of the saints are purified and made fit to dwell with the pure and holy God forever. Faith has no question about the resurrection; she has not a mere hope, but a firmly assured belief, so that she cries, "I know that in my flesh through Christ my Redeemer, I shall see my God without fear."

Every man in a certain sense will see God, for every eye shall behold the King upon the throne of judgment; but that expectation would not be a ground of comfort, and therefore more is here meant by seeing God. Job evidently expected to see God with acceptance and with delight, and this he felt quite sure about, though the corruption of his body looked like an effectual barrier to the realization of such a hope. All his friends may condemn him, and treat him as an alien and a stranger, but he so trusts himself with his Redeemer that he is quite sure of justification before God and men. Those who have a divine advocate must be cleared in the judgment. Now, soul, answer this question, Dost thou commit thyself wholly and entirely to the Mediator, the Incarnate God, the Kinsman of humanity? Say, dost thou look alone to thy living Advocate, in life, in death, and in eternity? Is Christ thine all in all, thy sole and solid hope? Oh, then, rest thou assured that "the root of the matter is found in thee."

II. Secondly, let us spend a few minutes in remarking that in our text this fundamental matter is most instructively described by the words which I have so constantly repeated—"the root of the matter." What does this mean?

First, does it not mean that which is essential? "The root of the matter." To a tree a root is absolutely essential; it is a mere pole or piece of timber if there be no root. It can be a tree of a certain sort without branches, and at certain seasons without leaves, but not without a root. Look at the trees in the winter. Their substance is in them when they lose their leaves; the foliage has all fallen, but the bare boughs and stem still make a tree, because a root is there. You may call it a tree even though only the trunk remains rooted to the soil. But it is not a tree if you have taken the root away and set it up in the hedge—it is mere dead timber for the scaffold or the fire. So, if a man hath faith in the Redeemer, though he may be destitute of a thousand other most needful things, yet the essential point is settled: he that believeth in Christ Jesus hath everlasting life.

The root, again, is not only that which is vital to the tree, it is from the root that the life-force proceeds by which the trunk and the branches are nourished and sustained. There is hope of a tree if it be cut down that it shall sprout again, at the scent of water it shall bud; so long as there is a root there is more or less of vitality and power to grow, and so faith in Christ is the vital point of religion; he that believeth liveth. If thou dost not know the living Redeemer thou dost not know life. Without trust in the work of Jesus a man may attempt to follow the moral teachings of Jesus, but he will miss salvation, since no morals which do not begin with faith in God can be acceptable to the Most High. The practical teaching of our holy religion is admirable, and we must obey it or be lost; but the root of holy living is faith in Christ, neither can it be produced otherwise.

Again, it is called the "root of the matter" because it comprehends all the rest; for

EVERYTHING IS IN THE ROOT.

You walked in your garden in the winter and many plants were entirely invisible; there was not the slightest token of their presence in the soil: now they are above ground, they are flowering, they are proceeding to fruit. Where was the plant? It was all in the root. Leaf, branch, fruit, seed—all were there. Even so, all the elements of a perfect character lie hidden in faith in Christ. The holiness of heaven is packed away in the faith of a penitent sinner.

III. So I come, thirdly, to dwell upon a further remark: This root of the matter may be personally discerned, as being in a man's own possession. Job says to his teasing friends, "Ye should say, Why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me?" Notice the curious change of pronouns. "Ye should say, Why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in him?" that is how the words would naturally run. But Job is so earnest to clear himself from Bildad's insinuation that he is a hypocrite that he will not speak of himself in the third person, but plainly declares, "The root of the matter is found in me." Job seems to say, "The vital part of the matter may or may not be in you, but it is in me, I know. You may not believe me, but I know it is so, and I tell you to your faces that no argument of yours can rob me of this confidence; for as I know that my Redeemer liveth, I know that the root of the matter is found in me."

Many Christian people are afraid to speak in that fashion. They say, "I humbly hope it is so, and I trust it is so." That sounds prettily; but is it right? Is that the way in which men speak about their houses and lands? Do you possess a little freehold? Did I hear you answer, "I humbly hope that my house and garden are my own?" What, then, are your title-deeds so questionable that you do not know? Is this the way in which you speak of your wages at the end of the week: "I sometimes have a hope that these shillings are mine?" Is that the way you talk about your wife? Is that the manner in which you speak of your own life? Are you afraid even to call your soul your own? No, no; we demand certainties in reference to things of value, and so it ought to be with regard to Christ and eternity; we cannot put up with mere hopes and surmises in reference to them.

Note well that sometimes this root needs to be searched for. Job says, "the root of the matter is found in me," as if he had looked for it, and made a discovery of what else had been hidden. Roots generally lie underground and out of sight, and so may our faith in the Redeemer. His interest in the Redeemer may have been a question for self-examination with Job, when first his griefs came thick and heavy; it may be a matter of search with us, too.

"He that never doubted of his state,
He may—perhaps he may, too late."

I can understand a Christian doubting whether he is saved or not, but I cannot understand his being happy while he continues to doubt about it, nor happy at all till he is sure of it. Job had made his personal condition the subject of investigation; he had digged beneath the surface, and had seen within his heart. You cannot always find roots in winter time, unless you use a spade and turn over the soil: there are winter times with us when we cannot tell whether we have real faith in Christ or not till we examine ourselves whether we be in the faith. After searching, Job found the treasure, and said, "the root of the matter is found in me."

And note again, the root of the matter in Job was

AN INWARD THING.

"The root of the matter is found in me." He did not say, "I wear the outward garb of a religious man;" no, but, "the root of the matter is found in me." If you, my hearers, are in the possession of the essence of true Christianity, it does not lie in your outward profession, your baptism, your church-membership, or your reception of the Lord's Supper; but it lies within your heart and mind. Faith, which is the evidence of the inner life, is altogether spiritual and inward; its abode is within the vitals of the spiritual being, in the very core of the renewed heart. True godliness is not separable from the godly man; it is woven into him just as a thread enters into the essence and substance of the fabric.

When grace is found in us, and we do really believe in our Redeemer, we ought to avow it; for Job says, "The root of the matter is found in me. I know that my Redeemer liveth." Are there not some among you who have never said as much as that? Some of you who are believers have never yet owned your Lord. What did I call some of you the other day? I think I compared cowardly believers to rats behind the wainscot that come out of a night to eat a crumb or two, and then run in again. The rat is a poor creature to be compared with: it is a domestic animal, I suppose, for it lives in the house; but it is not a beautiful object to be likened to, and so I will not compare you to it, although there might be more untruthful comparisons. I pray you try and alter before I am driven to the simile, and never be ashamed of Christ, or if you ever are so, be more ashamed of yourselves.

The fact of our having the root of the matter in us will be a great comfort to us. "Alas," saith Job, "my servant will not come when I call him, my wife is strange to me, my kinsfolk fail me, but I know that my Redeemer liveth. Bildad and Zophar, and others of them, all condemn me, but my conscience acquits me, for I know that the root of the matter is in me." It is a blessed thing to be able to hear the harsh speeches of men as though we heard them not. What matters it after all what others judge of me, if I know what I do know, and am sure in my own soul that I am right with God? What if men find fault with our eyes, does it signify if we can say, "One thing I know, whereas I was once blind now I see." Critics may find fault with our experience, and they may call our earnest utterances rant, but this will not affect the truth of our conversion, or the acceptableness of our testimony for Jesus.

There is more real comfort in the possession of simple faith than in the fond persuasion that you are in a high state of grace. When we proudly think, "Oh, I need not look at the root of the matter, for my flowers and fruits are evidence more than sufficient," we are getting dangerously elevated. That man is in a perilous plight who glories in himself, saying, "How useful I am! how gifted! how influential! How highly my brethren think of me!" All this will turn out to be unsubstantial comfort in the hour of trial, but the root of the matter yields the sweetest and surest consolation at all times. If your Redeemer lives you shall have a candle lighted for you in the darkest shades.

This fact also will be your defence against opposers. Thus may you answer them in Job's fashion, "You ought not to condemn me; for, though I am not what I ought to be, or what I want to be, or what I shall be, yet still the root of the matter is found in me. Be kind to me, therefore." Carefully observe this, my dear young friends. You have been lately converted, and if you fall in with those who are very stern and censorious you must not be surprised. Some venerable professors have not so much grown ripe as sour, and they show their sourness by censuring their younger brethren. It does not occur to them to say, "Why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is in him?"

Thus much on our third point.

IV. Now we come to the fourth subject of discourse, which is a practical lesson from the text for those believers in Christ who have passed beyond the root stage into a further development.

Notice, then, that this root of the matter is

TO BE TENDERLY RESPECTED

by all who see it. "Ye should say, why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me?"

What a rebuke this is to the persecutions which have been carried on by nominal Christians against each other, sect against sect! Romanists have fiercely persecuted Protestants, and Protestants have persecuted one another. If they had but listened to their gracious Lord and Saviour they would have heard Him whisper, "Ye should say, wherefore persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me?" How can those who trust in the same Saviour rend and devour each other?

In many of the islands of the South Seas our missionaries have been the means of converting the people to the faith. In one of these the shaven crowns of Rome began to put in their appearance, with the view of turning away the people from the faith to the errors of Rome. Among their cunning instruments of conversion was a picture representing the tree of the Church. Certain twigs were represented as rotten; they were cut off, and were falling into the fire: these were such persons as Luther, Calvin, and other famous teachers of the Gospel. The Protestant missionaries, too, were dead twigs, and were all to be removed from the tree. The natives were not quite sure about this, and made more inquiries. Certain other branches were green and vigorous; these were the priests of the Catholic Church, and the larger boughs were bishops and cardinals of the same community; the natives were not quite clear about that, and passed on to examine the trunk. This of course consisted of an array of popes, of whom the islanders had never heard. They passed on, hoping to come to something presently; and so they did, for at the bottom was the name of our Lord Jesus. The inquiring islanders said, "And what is this at the bottom, marked with the name of Jesus?" "That is the root," said the priest. "Well, then," shouted the natives, "we have the root! The new teachers say we have the root, and so we are all right; our missionaries have told us the truth." There was philosophy in that. Let us see to it that "we have the root."

Friend, dost thou believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God? If so, thou hast the root. I shall be very sorry if you belong to the Church of Rome, for she teaches much error; but if you rest wholly in Christ Jesus you will be saved. Do you believe in the once crucified but now living Christ? Well, my brother, I am sorry you should be a high-churchman, or anything else which is not according to Scripture, but your faith has saved you. I pray you think the same of me, if I too am a believer in the one Redeemer. If I believe, and rest my soul on the one salvation which God has provided in Christ Jesus, have charity toward me, for this rock will bear both thee and me. This should end all religious persecutions.

But next, it ought to be the end of all

UNGENEROUS DENUNCIATIONS.

If I know that a man is really believing in Jesus Christ, I may not treat him as an enemy. If I perceive that he holds a great many wrong notions, I am to be grieved at his mistakes, and to labor for his instruction, but I ought not to feel rancor toward him. It is my duty, especially if I am a public instructor, to expose and refute his errors; but as for the man himself, if he trusts in the atoning blood, I am not to treat him as a reprobate. Does he believe in Jesus Christ alone? Does he hold vital, fundamental truth, then I am not to make him an offender for a word, and twist his language into a meaning what he never intended by it. I am too near akin to every believer in Jesus to take down bell, book, and candle and excommunicate him for not being so well instructed as he might be. If the Redeemer is next of kin to me and next of kin to him, why, then, we are near of kin to one another, and it is unseemly for us to strive together, being brethren.

Further than this, the question is, "Why persecute we him?" We can do that by a COLD MISTRUST.

I have seen chill suspicion exercised by good solid, substantial Christians, who have had a chronic fear and trembling lest new converts should not be true converts. The young man seems to be very earnest; he is evidently much impressed; he forsakes his sin, and there is a great change in him; he boldly declares his faith in Jesus Christ; but the jealous guardian of the purity of the Church objects, for the young man was converted in an irregular way; he did not go among the Presbyterians, or Baptists, or Congregationalists, or Evangelical Church people, and get saved in a respectable manner, but he went out in the street and he heard a mere ranter, or a salvation army captain, and therefore it is feared that it cannot be a genuine work of grace.

The cautious brother does not say much, but he draws himself into himself and retires from the person whom he suspects, just as a snail draws in his horns and hides himself in his shell. The elder brother is angry and will not go in; and in that way he persecutes the returning prodigal. Why, some of these icy critics will cause the very marrow of a poor fellow's bones to freeze while he looks at him. Do not let us stand off in holy isolation from any who have the root of the matter in them. Wherefore should we persecute such? Let us encourage them, and give them information upon the points in which they are deficient.

Dear brothers and sisters, I beg you to be on the look-out in this congregation for those who have just received the root of the matter, those that have just had the seed dropped into the soul. It has hardly begun to sprout yet, but you can see it is there. They can just say,

> "We are poor sinners, and nothing at all,
> But Jesus Christ is our all in all."

Do not frighten them, do not distress them, do not chill them like a sharp frost. Cheer and encourage them, and say, "I, too, was once as you are. Ay, and I, too, often am as you are. Ay, and I, too, sometimes wish I were as you are, for I would still keep on my knees, keep humbly dependent upon Christ. Come, if elder brethren will not receive you, I will, and I will cheer you and encourage you for Jesus' sake."

Well, try and do that this morning, if you can, before you leave the Tabernacle. There may be somebody sitting next to you who just wants a word. Try it. I know some will be quite frightened at your venturing to speak to them. Very well, frighten them a little it will not hurt them. Try the power of courteous personal appeal. It may be if you frighten one or two you will be the means of blessing so many more that if those who are frightened do not forgive you they will not break your heart. God Himself will not, because there will be nothing to forgive. He will commend you for what you have done, and I pray you, therefore, do it for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

ANECDOTES,

Related at the London May Meetings.

AT the anniversary meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Exeter Hall, Lord Shaftesbury presided, and it was stated that the income of the society during the past year had been a sum equivalent to $1,047,595, and the expenditure $965,000. The issues of Bibles, New Testaments and Portions for the year had been 2,846,029, making a total since the formation of the society of 91,014,448 copies, in 248 languages and dialects.

The Rev. Sylvester Whitehead, Wesleyan missionary from China, in the course of an interesting speech, said: "The Bible began to flash its light upon the minds and to touch the hearts of the Chinese, even when in the process of translation and printing. Dr. Morrison tells us that his first convert, while 'employed in superintending the printing of the New Testament, began to see that the merits of Jesus were sufficient for the salvation of all mankind, and hence believed in Him;' and that, taking the conduct of Philip as a guide, at a spring of water issuing from the foot of a lofty hill by the seaside, away from human observation, he baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, Trae A-Ko, the first China Protestant Christian.

"One of the first American missionaries, Bishop Boone, gives a similar account of the conversion of his Chinese teacher, who assisted him in translating the Scriptures: One day, much to the missionary's surprise, he came hastily into the room with an open Testament in his hand, and exclaimed, 'Whoever made that book made me; it knows all that is in my heart. It tells me what no one else except God can know about me. Whoever made me wrote that book.' The result was his conversion to Christ. The Book by its blessed truths attracted and transformed some of the first Chinese minds that came in contact with it; their souls, dead in trespasses and sins, no sooner touched it than, like the dead man upon the prophet's bones, they were quickened into life. These are specimens of the transformations it has been working ever since.

A CHINESE GRADUATE CONVERTED.

"Some time ago a Bible was given by a missionary to a literary man, a Bachelor of Arts, who looked into it from curiosity, but soon put it aside. Hearing some time afterward of the progress the Gospel was making, he was led to take up his book again, and such was the light that dawned upon his soul that he went to a native catechist for instruction. It cost him a struggle to break with the past, to let go all he had reverenced from childhood—to give up Confucius for Christ—but he did it. He sacrificed everything for Christ—wife, child, literary fame, money, and friends, and he is now the native principal of a theological college.

A CONFUCIAN TEMPLE-KEEPER MARTYRED FOR CHRIST.

"A Confucian temple-keeper named Ch'é, at the city of Poklo, on the Canton East River, received the Scriptures from a colporteur of the London Mission, became convinced of the folly of idolatry, and was baptized by Dr. Legge. He gave up his calling, and set to work among his acquaintances and friends as a self-appointed Scripture-reader. He went through the streets of the city and the country round with a board on his back containing some text of Scripture. So successful was he that in about three years' time about one hundred of the people were baptized: and so mightily grew the Word of God and prevailed that surprise and hostility were excited, and a fierce persecution broke out. The Christians were driven from their villages, and their property was plundered. Ch'é, the colporteur, was seized, and twice within forty-eight hours dragged before the Literati, and called upon to recant. This he steadfastly refused to do; he was therefore tortured by being suspended by the arms during the night. The next morning he was brought forward in an enfeebled state, pale and trembling, for a second trial; but the brave old man was still firm in his resolve to cleave to the Bible and Christ, and expressed a hope that his judges would some day embrace the new doctrine. This was more than they could tolerate, and like the judges of Stephen they ran upon him with one accord and killed him on the spot by repeated blows of their side arms, and threw him into the river. Thus perished the first Protestant Christian martyr of China."

PARRICIDES AND THE BISHOP.

The Bishop of Moosonee, whose diocese is in the region of the Hudson's Bay territory, and inhabited chiefly by Ojibbeway Indians and Esquimaux, said: "Let me take you in thought to a place a hundred miles distant from my own home in that country, a place called Rupert's House. One morning I had before me a large congregation of Indians. I knew that among them there were four men who only a month or two before had murdered their fathers and mothers, and I intentionally placed those men directly in front of me. Of what crime were those poor murdered people guilty? They were guilty of a crime of which we may any of us be guilty, and of which some of us here already begin to be guilty—the crime of growing old. Accordingly the old father and mother were told that they had lived long enough, and that it was time for them to die, and the bow-string was speedily placed round their necks, and with one son pulling at one end, and another son or perhaps a daughter at the other, the poor old people were deprived of life, and then hastily flung into a grave. Happily this state of things has now passed away."

A CONVERTED SWEEP.

The Rev. Dr. Stoughton said: "There was once a chimney-sweep who came to me to apply for church fellowship, and I inquired of the man what reason he had to believe he had experienced a change in his soul. 'Why, sir,' he said, 'if it were not that I still see the same houses, and the same trees, and the same faces, I should not believe that I was in the same world.' I thought that was a beautiful testimony to the marvellous effect which is produced by the Gospel of Jesus Christ when men are made new creatures in that Jesus, and old things are passed away and all things become new.

THE COLPORTEUR AND THE JEWELLER.

"A colporteur says that in the course of some visits which he paid to a town where there was a fair being held, he met a man, a jeweller, with whom he had been connected in earlier life. This man came up to him, and said, 'Have you got any romances to sell?' 'No,' said the colporteur, 'but I have got the Bible.' 'Well,' he said, 'you know the Bible is all very well for priests and ministers, but I do not care about that.' Then the colporteur began to talk to him seriously, and wanted the man to confess that he was living a very ungodly and immoral life. He had no religion, and hardly believed that there was a God. The colporteur went on talking to him very tenderly, very lovingly, and at last he saw the tears begin to start in the man's eyes, and he said, 'Well, I must acknowledge that it is a very blessed thing to be religious, and I only wish that I could be so.' They spent some four days together. The colporteur continued his conversations with him, and reading the Scriptures, until it ended in the man making a profession of faith in Christ, and manifesting in his conduct afterward such a moral change that his father and his family were filled with perfect astonishment, and they said, 'Here is our son who was once leading such an immoral and ungodly life, and now he is a perfectly altered man.'"

A PARTING REQUEST.

The Rev. George Everard, M.A., dwelling upon the value of the Bible to young men, said: "Here is a lad at school; one morning his sister is just passing by on a coach. She is going out to Africa, and she has only a little while to stay. She runs up into her brother's bedroom, gives him a good hug, and then she says a few earnest words to him, and leaves his room with these words, 'Robert, read your Bible!' Forty-three years pass by. Go to the death-bed of a missionary in India; he is passing away full of peace and bright joy and hope. A friend of mine stands by his death-bed; he turns to him, and he says, 'There is an old story that when you were a lad your sister told you to read the Bible—is it true?' And Robert Noble answers my friend, 'She told me to read my Bible, and I have done it; I have done it; I have done it.' Ah, and that had made Robert Noble a brave, devoted missionary to the young men of India; I suppose as useful to those young men as ever a man had been. There was one fruit of a young man following the Word of God.

THE BIBLE SUPPORTING THE DYING.

"The day after my ordination I went with Dr. Merriman to see one of his young men, who was very ill. The day before they thought he was dying. Dr. Merriman took him by the hand and said, 'Luke, were you afraid yesterday when you thought you were dying? Why was it you were in tears? Were you afraid to die?' 'No, sir.' 'Why were you in tears?' 'Why,' he said, 'my poor widowed mother—I thought—what would she do when I was gone?' But he took his Bible from underneath his pillow, held it up in Dr. Merriman's face, and said, 'This kept me from being afraid to die; the promises of this Book were my rest and my comfort when I thought death was near.'"

THE BIBLE AND THE YOUNG LAWYER.

Dr. Sinclair Patterson said, among many other excellent things: "There was a man whose labors were known throughout Scotland. He was learned in the study of the law, and occupied a promising position in Edinburgh, but he was an unbelieving young man. One morning his wife, a godly woman, went to church and left him at home. He took up the New Testament and began to read the Gospels, and when his wife returned she found him melted in tears. The word of God had found him. He gave up his legal studies and profession, and became a preacher of the Gospel of righteousness, and his name was fragrant in the city, where he labored for many years as one honored to turn many from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God.

The following anecdotes were related at the annual meeting of the

WESLEYAN HOME MISSIONS:

The Rev. Charles Garrett said: "I have seen a woman who said that for thirty years she had never been without a bruise from her husband's hand. She and her husband were both converted through a home mission agent. All the rooms we can hire in my neighborhood are crowded. My attention was attracted to one street by the papers remarking on its bad character, when it was supposed a missing young woman was detained there. I engaged two rooms, and put a married man in them. All the services there were crowded. There was a woman lying drunk in a pool of bloody water. The flies were covering her face, and the home mission agent drove them off and laid a tract on it. When she recovered sensibility she read the tract, and then came to the service. She is now one of the best and bravest of members. The children in this district are in a wretched state. In one house the father was found drunk, the mother dead, and the children in rags. Especially for the neglected little girls am I anxious. One sent to Mr. Stephenson's home had to be washed again and again before her skin could be seen, and then it was found to be covered with wounds from the buckle of her father's strap."

At the eighty-second anniversary of the Rev. C. W. Park said: "About 250 or 300 miles inland from Bombay, in the very centre of Hindostan, and perhaps in its darkest portion, the dominions of the Nizam of Hyderabad, is a little village. That little village with its two or three hundreds of people has an hereditary watchman whose business it is to guard it day and night. He is now an old man, 60 years of age perhaps; his hair is gray; but in his earlier days he was known as a mighty man of valor, and, worse than that, as a daring robber, and

and for his crimes was apprehended and sent to jail. He returned to his village and his conscience troubled him, and the feeling took possession of him, "I am a sinner; I have deserved evil, not alone of my fellow men, but of my God;" and after the manner of his people he went from place to place, from one temple to another, from shrine to shrine, making his offerings, falling at the feet of his heathen gods, and striving to find peace to his troubled conscience. But there was no peace. His mind had no rest, and he knew not where to turn.

"In the year 1874 there came to his door one day a traveller, a Hindoo, like himself, a man of the lowest caste, who asked for water, and the old watchman brought forth the water and gave him, and then his visitor began to speak to him of the living water, and told him where the soul burdened with a sense of sin might find rest and peace and joy. The watchman's soul was thirsty, and as he heard the words of everlasting life and salvation and of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ he said: 'This is the Saviour that I want, and here at the feet of Christ my soul finds peace.' Now the old watchman, the ex-thief, is the pastor of a little congregation of Christian Hindoos gathered from among his own caste—people not alone in his own village, but from other villages lying round about.

"The work has gone on spreading in wider and wider circles, and now there are more congregations than one in that dark region of the Nizam's territory, where but a short time ago there was but the unbroken darkness of heathenism. 'What connection has this with the work of the Tract Society?' This: the man through whom the watchman first heard of the Gospel was from a village about forty miles nearer to Bombay. He was called Ramjee. He was a religious teacher, and taught Hindooism. There once fell into his hands a little tract published by the Bombay Tract Society. It was written by a pious Christian officer in Hindostan, and the title of it was 'The True Way.' Ramjee read it; he believed what it said; he became a Christian; it was my privilege to baptize him; and then he went round from place to place wherever his disciples lived, teaching them of his new religion, of his new hope, and of the new and the truer way which he had found, and in which he was beginning to walk, and is still walking."

THE LAST CHAPTER OF SATANIC HISTORY.

By Rev. William Maude.

America a Refuge—The Energizing of the Antichrist—An Unscriptural Opinion—The Separated Seventieth Week—The Purification of the Air.

THE first of the events referred to in the foregoing chapter, one which cannot now be far distant, is

THE EVICTION OF SATAN FROM THE AIR.

This is fully described in the twelfth chapter of Revelation, in a passage which has already been partially quoted: "And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought, and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was there place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out (lit., cast down) into the earth, and his angels were cast down with him. And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of His Christ; for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night. . . . Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe to the inhabiters of the earth and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (verses 7–12).

The interpretation of this chapter in detail is attended with great and almost insuperable difficulties; but, nevertheless, some points are sufficiently clear. It is clear, for instance, that the war in heaven between Michael (Christ) and his angels and the devil and his angels is an event which is still future. This is proved not only by the relation in which this vision stands to the seventh trumpet and the rise of the personal Antichrist, but also by the fact that when thus cast down to the earth Satan knows that "he hath but a little season," which could not be said if any pre-Adamic fall from the third heaven was alluded to.

Again, the character of the action taken by Satan after his being cast down to the earth is plainly revealed in the thirteenth and following verses: "And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man-child (see verses 1, 2). And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, safe from the face of the serpent. And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a river after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the river. And the earth helped the woman, and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the river which the dragon cast out of his mouth. And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ."

Now, if by the woman in this chapter we are to understand the Church, then the waters which the dragon casts out of his mouth may denote the future ten kingdoms of the Roman earth in a state of revolutionary and democratic anarchy; while, on the other hand, the earth—society in a more orderly and settled condition—describes nations in the more distant parts of the earth, as America, Australia, etc., to which the persecuted worshippers of God will be compelled to fly; while the "remnant of the woman's seed" will fitly describe those unready believers who are left on earth when the rapture of the waiting saints takes place, or who are subsequently converted. These will become the objects of Satan's relentless persecution, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, and the great instrument which he will employ for this purpose will be the personal Antichrist.

Accordingly the very next thing we read of, at the commencement of the thirteenth chapter of Revelation, is

THE ENERGIZING OF THE ANTICHRIST.

"And he (i.e., the dragon) stood upon the sand of the sea, and I saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the names of blasphemy. And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion; and the dragon gave him his power, and his throne, and great authority." In these words we have the fulfilment of St. Paul's prophecy in 2 Thessalonians 2: 9, "Whose coming is after the energizing of Satan, with all power, and signs, and wonders of falsehood."

Some of the ancient Christian writers, indeed, were of opinion that antichrist would be a veritable incarnation of Satan. Thus the great Augustine writes: "But let us now see what is to be the beginning of Antichrist. . . . Now He will be born in the usual manner like other men, and not, as some say, of a virgin alone. . . . But at the very moment when he beings to be conceived, the devil will enter at the same time into his mother's womb, and of the power of the devil will his substance be quickened, compacted, and fostered in his mother's womb, and the power of the devil will ever be with him. . . . Thus shall the devil descend on the mother of Antichrist, and fill her totally, surround her totally, hold her totally, and possess her totally, within and without: that she may conceive by the co-operation of the devil through a man, and the thing that shall be born be altogether sinful, altogether damned" ("De Antichristo").

Theodoret expresses himself on the same subject as follows: "For the devil will imitate the incarnation of our Lord and Saviour; and as the Lord was manifested by the instrumentality of man's nature, and wrought our salvation, so shall the devil also take a meet instrument of his wickedness, and by means thereof show forth his own operation, deceiving such men as are indolent and off their guard with false signs and wonders, and a parade of marvels in appearance" ("Opera" ii., 1207, in Daniel 7: 26).

This opinion, however, is not scriptural, for not only in Revelation 13: 4 do we find the worship of the dragon distinguished from the worship of the beast, when it is said: "And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast: and they worshipped the beast," etc.; but in Revelation 20: 10, the devil, the beast, and the false prophet are all three mentioned separately. The beast, therefore, cannot be an incarnation of the devil, though energized by him.

Chronologically the casting down of Satan to the earth would seem to synchronize with the great prophetic period of seven years—Daniel's seventieth separated week—which intervenes between the first rapture of the waiting saints, according to 1 Thessalonians 4: 16, 19, and the Lord's subsequent manifestation with His saints in judgment, according to the first chapter of the same epistle.

We arrive at this conclusion on two separate grounds. In the first place the beast of Revelation 13: 1 is raised up by Satan subsequently to his descent on the earth; but previously to the conclusion of the seven years' covenant between Antichrist and the Jewish nation, which seven years' covenant will coincide with the last week of Daniel. And in the second place, one main reason for the expulsion of Satan and his angels from the aerial regions is obviously to prepare and purify them for the presence of Christ and His risen saints, and the descent of Christ into the air will evidently take place previous to the commencement of the seven years of Antichrist's reign.

Thus, as Auberlen says, though now "we live in an atmosphere poisoned and impregnated with deadly elements, of the air will be effected by Christ's coming." "By and by," writes William Kelly, "God will not allow Satan any longer to taint the air of heaven. He is forcibly cast down thence, and has only power to deal with mankind in an earthly way. Satan is henceforth entirely prevented from usurping his higher place as prince of the power of the air. The heavens will be cleared of him and his angels, never to regain their place above."

How awful will be the condition of the world, especially of the Roman earth, during these last years of the present dispensation, it is difficult to conceive. From the day when Adam fell and was driven from Paradise, the history of our world has indeed been a dark and troubled one. But now the darkness will deepen into a very noon of night. The Divine Hinderer of the world's moral and spiritual corruption will be gone out of the midst. The saints of God—those who by their holy example and loving ministry illumined with star-like beauty the darkness of this evil world—will have heard and obeyed the call, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh!" The devil, "having great wrath," will be here raging like an imprisoned wild beast; and Antichrist, his chosen instrument, while by His great signs and wonders He shall deceive all but the very elect, will deluge the earth with the blood of those who refuse to worship Him, or to receive His mark in their forehead or in their hands. Hence, in tender compassion for the miseries which believers in Him will be called upon to endure in those coming days, did the Lord say, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man" (Luke 21: 36).

(To be concluded.)

A Whale's Attack on a Vessel, in April last, is reported by Captain McPhail, of the ship Anna, in the Atlantic. A large whale was seen making direct for the vessel. The captain seeing its approach ordered her to be luffed up, so that the whale should not strike her on the broadside. This was done, and proved a wise precaution. The whale came up from behind and struck the stern of the bark with great force, the wood being much splintered. Passing on in its course the whale on reaching the bow struck it a blow with its tail which almost knocked away the cutwater from the 11-inch mark to the keel. A streak of blood was visible in the water after the whale had disappeared. A gale of wind was blowing at the time. The pumps were sounded, but it was found that the vessel was not leaking. Captain McPhail thinks that the whale was seriously hurt by the collision.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Etta's Morning Occupation — A Visit to the Drunken Hackman—Something Accomplished—Aleth's Lessons—The Rector Learning.

In the morning, when Etta looked out of her window, the sun was rising in a pale glow of color, that irradiated the dark evergreens, and kindled into warmth and brightness the misty mazes of the far-stretching park; even tipping separately each little ripple on the lake surface, till the whole shone like burnished gold. A sheet of varied color lay before her, so exquisite that it wrung from her heart the incense of praise; and she understood, better than she had ever understood before, the impulsive, many-noted song of multitudinous birds, that echoed, in all their sweetness of voice, the joy of light after darkness, the birth of Morning from its mother, Night.

The duties of the day were hastily conned in prospect, as she concluded her dressing. The visit to Lady Isabel was promised, and the note despatched by an after-breakfast post. Her housekeeping performances were finished, her hour with the children accomplished, one or two other small items of daily routine performed; and then she considered her morning her own.

To-day her recreation must be a walk alone amid the beauties that had tempted her sight so early. She set off accordingly. And here we leave to the pen of spiritual thought the tracings of infinite refreshment that she found in this solitary ramble, as she talked with the One she had already learned to love the best. Her God was her Friend; and to her, to-day, was the truth of that verse experienced—

"Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him; I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. . . . With long life will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation" (Ps. 91 : 14 and 16).

Etta might now have endorsed this verse, as many of us can, by the insertion of the feminine pronoun throughout.

When Mrs. Clemence called that afternoon, she was told that "Miss Fennecker and her sisters had gone out driving—Mrs. Fennecker was at the rectory."

On her way home in the wagonette, Etta desired the coachman to set her down in the High Street; and from thence she proceeded to call on the fly-driver, of whom Bateman had told her.

It was not difficult to find his residence. Knocking at the side door she waited for a response, and then courageously knocked again. This proceeding resulted in the half opening of the door, its narrow aperture being filled by a rough, red-faced, half-dressed man, whose appearance sent Etta's "heart into her mouth"—and at the same time convinced her that she had found the object of her search.

"May I come in?" she said.

"Missus isn't in," said the shock-headed man doubtfully.

"Then I should like to come in, for I came to call upon you," said Etta.

His worst manners would not permit Alexander Selkirk to dismiss from his door a young lady possessing so flattering an intention. Therefore leading the way, in a clumsy, stumbling fashion, he proceeded up the stairs, ushering her into a small room that looked down into the street. As he shut the door firmly behind him, Etta bravely began—

"I am very glad to see you; for you know you are our neighbor; and I often pass near your door."

"Ya-as!" said the man. "It's been better weather lately."

A plunge into the important topic was necessary as soon as possible, for the golden opportunity was quickly passing.

"You have been here a long time, haven't you? But I have never seen you before."

"Yes; been here some fifteen year," responded the man.

"It would be so nice if you could get the Lord's blessing upon your house, wouldn't it?" Etta continued. "It seems to me it is very little worth our while having anything without that."

"Oh! yes, yes," said the man; "no doubt, no doubt."

"But wouldn't you like to have it? O Selkirk! you know Jesus Christ—the Lord of glory—left His Father's home, and came down to save us. You believe He died instead of us, don't you? And He can forgive all your sins and mine."

By this time Etta's courage was waxing strong, while poor Alexander's was proportionately waning. He was gradually becoming intensely nervous, not to say frightened. And to relieve himself of a superabundance of electric force perhaps, which was gradually bringing the perspiration into beads on his forehead, he had seized the cat, who up to that moment was inoffensively lying before the fire.

At this point he so violently squeezed the cat's tail that he rung from her a yell of pain. This interrupted Etta for a moment; however, she went on again—

"In my little Bible I read this verse to-day. It is very nice; I know you will like it:

"'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

"'Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

"'For my yoke is easy; and my burden is light.'

"Wouldn't you like to have a word and a touch from Jesus?" she was continuing, looking very earnestly at him, when unfortunately the application proved too much for him, and he hung his head again, while once more he afflicted the cat, causing her to utter renewed cries of anguish.

"Oh, do put the poor cat down!" said Etta.

It was mechanically dropped, and Etta began again—

"I know you would like to be happy, and have the Lord Jesus Christ for your Friend forever and forever. Wouldn't you? You will think of what I am saying. I know you will."

And then she read another verse, and yet another, her listener sitting by in silence. After this she proposed prayer, saying—

"Do you ever ask a blessing on this house and on all your earnings? Suppose we ask it now. And then I want to ask the Lord to give you eternal life, through His dear Son. He can give it you, if you like."

So she knelt down, asking the fly-driver to do the same.

She was very simply offering—and very earnestly—these requests when, by a sort of evil fascination, or perhaps knowing her to be a mutual friend, the cat jumped up on her chair; she vainly tried to keep it from going across to its master. Alas! he seized it once more by the tail, as he knelt, and it gave a terrific yell, a howl, which suddenly brought both to their feet.

But something had been accomplished. Etta was allowed to take down the big Bible that had not yet been sold or pawned, and to place a marker in it at the third chapter of St. John's Gospel, outlining with her pencil the precious verses within its columns which have, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, proved the turning-point of so many bewildered, sin-oppressed souls.

When Etta left the house, she felt that she had at least gained that man's friendship, and, through God's blessing, she hoped far more than that.

From that time they never met without a friendly recognition of one another. Just a smile or a word it might be, but sufficient to prove that her gentle effort made in faith had not been in vain. She soon heard too the glad news, offered always as a profound secret, that Aleck Selkirk was not "going to the public-house nearly so much now." And then, still more wonderful to relate, she heard that he had been once at old Michael's meeting! Tidy clothes he had not mastered as yet, so he would not take his place in the church pew. But "a straw will show which way the wind blows," and these first steps showed that her friend was thinking, and that was something. Perhaps a light that would burn through all eternity was being kindled in his heart.

The pain of Etta's life at present was that all these new interests, so great to her, must be buried in her own bosom. She could not impart them to her parents, brothers, or sisters; for if the subject were even approached, a look of amusement or censure would instantly put to flight her confidences. Perhaps a less reserved nature would have felt this penalty to be a still harder one. But even reserve, and even the strong character, needs sympathy, craves it.

Here the heart is often taught to fill up this vacuous blank by a fresh reception of the Lord Himself, in His tenderest sympathies, and in His most healing power. This was the open page of her daily lesson-book at present. For though in a class very near the door of the Great School, and only in the A B C of her heavenly training, she was learning fast; for the Master had found in his child a willing pupil, and He could trace, as she could not, the elements of beauty, as well as of power, in both her natural and spiritual character. The true metal must pass through the heated furnace ere it can be fully moulded to the Refiner's will; and to this rule Etta's lot was no exception.

When we reach the portals of light—perfected, glorified light—where every mystery will be unfolded and the secret things revealed, perhaps one of the marvels that will greet our enraptured and yet astonished gaze, will be the amount of tension that gentle spirits have been able to bear continuously here.

If regrets could hamper us amid the ineffable blessedness to which we look forward there, perhaps one of the bitterest would be our harsh and uncomprehending condemnation of the half-expressed murmur, or look of pain, that revealed so little of the actual suffering endured in the sight of God, and endured by our means, but borne in humble patience. We see a faint shadow of the external friction that lies in its hidden realities exposed to the "Father of Lights." Let us be on our guard that we do not come beneath the censure given by our Lord to the professing Pharisees, "Ye bind burdens on men's shoulders, grievous to be borne."

While thus the small events of daily life flashed and flickered their varied reflections on the interior and exterior of Shenstone Hall, Aleth lay on her window couch learning her lessons. She was teaching too! teaching far more than the highly-certificated preceptress of the parish school, in whose abilities and success Mr. Habershon was wont to profess his pride. Miss Barker was dragging innocent little brains into a state of normal stupefaction, from an overcrowding of intricate facts and arithmetical problems into the smallest given space, namely, an infantine cranium; and thereby provoking many motherly growls throughout the community. Aleth was humbling, unconsciously, many a proud heart, and drawing down many a cold professor to gaze upon the place of learning at the Saviour's feet, and to covet that place.

"Good afternoon!" said Mr. Habershon, in his usual off-hand, patronizing manner, to a poor woman one day. "Children getting on at the school? Excellent, mistress, excellent!"

"Yes, sir, thank ye, sir," said the woman, dropping a rapid courtesy. "Take a chair, sir?"

"Thank you; yes, I will; just for a moment," said Mr. Habershon. "And the children are getting on nicely, are they?"

"Well, sir, they has hedducks (headaches) and there's Lucy. Miss Whatever-you-call-'em says she's a-gettin' on uncommon with her 'metics, but she do get terrible faint and bad at school and when she comes home, lor! bless ye, sir, can't get her to do nothing. No, sir. Nothing at all. She don't seem fit for nothing; and she can't work, not as I used to when I was a child. My mother, and our school teacher too, in those days, was werry partikler of us sewin', they was sir."

The speaker paused, and wiped her face with her apron, while her audience first smiled and then fairly laughed.

"It is high education, you know, Mrs. Comfor

That's what it is. But I am sure you can't mean that you don't value it. The children here are very well off to have such a teacher."

Poor Mr. Habershon's rather long-worded argument having silenced, though apparently not convinced the mother, he concluded his visit, wishing her "Good-day!" and proceeded toward the school.

Here he found Miss Barker, in a state of white heat, catechising the girls. Mr. Habershon looked gravity condensed while the ordeal of catechising proceeded.

In the evening he said to his sister, "How has Aleth been to-day? Poor little darling! I don't think I should like her to have Miss Barker for a preceptress."

"Miss Barker! What do you mean?" ejaculated that worthy personage.

"I was only following the line of my own thoughts," he answered. "I was hearing her catechise the children to-day."

"Oh! she is a first-rate schoolmistress," answered Miss Habershon. "First-rate, I believe. We were very fortunate in getting her."

"Oh, yes, I know that," said the rector. "I am sure she is very harsh to those unfortunate children. That is a fact. Poor little things, they seemed quite bamboozled this afternoon."

"Of course," said Miss Habershon, "every one knows they are very slow, stupid children here. But that is not her fault, poor woman."

"Well, really, I am not so sure," said Mr. Habershon.

"I am going up to Aleth for a little while," he said, as he rose and pushed his chair away from the fire.

(To be continued.)

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for June 19. Golden Text, John 3 : 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"RABBI, we know that Thou art a Teacher come from God." Such is our golden text, and such was the testimony of a seeker after truth as yet unrenewed by the Holy Spirit. "A Teacher come from God," God's Messenger with God's message, and yet rejected! There is power in the Messenger and power in the message to bring life out of death, and to bring life and immortality to light through the Gospel (2 Tim. 1 : 10). O God, give us holy reverence in coming to Thy Words, that we may consider the issues which are at stake, if we reject or even neglect Thy Word spoken. "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven" (Heb. 12 : 25).

The first of our Lord's teachings which we considered during this quarter was "following Jesus": the manner of following Him, and the cost which it involves. We learned that this vocation cannot be made to accord with other ends which we may have in view; it must be in itself a life's vocation or it is none at all. To follow Him is to have a new centre and a new end, to sacrifice self and to live Christ. Ruth said to Naomi, "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, I will die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me" (Ruth 1 : 16, 17). Such is the spirit of one who truly follows Jesus. The unworthy thought does not enter into his mind, "Is there harm in this? Is there harm in that?" The object of his life is not to avoid that which may harm himself, but that which may dishonor God. He does not say, "I see no harm in going to a concert, or to a quiet croquet party"; rather he says to Jesus, "Lord, can I follow Thee there? Entreat me not to leave Thee. I can well do without music and croquet, but I cannot do without Thee, and unless I can seek these things for thee, they have no attraction for me." The true following of Jesus is no unnatural strain put upon the natural man, from which there must be reaction afterward: it is the entering in of another life, another spirit, and other tastes.

Our second lesson is a practical illustration of following Jesus. The good Samaritan did not wait to know whether the poor man who had fallen among thieves was a worthy object of his benevolence; he did not think whether it would serve his own interests to help him, whether it would increase or decrease his popularity, whether in the circle of his friends it would be approved or disapproved: the poor man was in urgent need, and as one to whom God had given the power to help him, the Samaritan treated him as a brother, although in social and in religious matters the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans. It was a Christ-like deed, and the Master says to each of us, as well as to the lawyer, "Go and do thou likewise."

Our next lesson contains Christ's reproof to the Pharisees. They possessed a piety which was altogether external, made for the eye of man, and not for that of God; their real object was not to be holy, but to appear so; not really to hold communion with God, but that men should think they did. They were ready to go any length in external observance, but their heart was the same old, proud, wicked heart as before. Jesus saw through all this, and said unto them, "Woe unto you." But oh, how much of this spirit is there even among believers! How sweet is it to some minds to hear commendatory phrases spoken in their favor, and how bitter to them if they are disparaged! In measure as we live in the light of eternity, the opinion which is held about us, even by the most advanced Christians, ceases to afford us pain or satisfaction, for we seek the eye of God alone. If we know that our consciences are clear before Him, we can afford to be blamed by His children; if, on the contrary, He lays His holy finger upon a fault, and speaks with us about it, no justification of it from the holiest men will make us see ourselves other than He shows us to be. Our next lesson upon Covetousness strikes again at the root of self, for Christianity is the living a life for another and in another. Oh how opposite to covetousness was the early Church of Christ, when there was no "my own," when their possessions consisted in Christ and one another, when the loss of one was the loss of all, the gain of one the gain of all, when in glory and in shame they shared alike, and their foes were obliged to say, "See how these Christians love one another."

We came next to the parables in Luke 15, the lost sheep, the lost silver, and the lost son—all precious to the owner—the two first sought after, the last seeking his own way back. Let us not forget that every soul is either a gain or a loss to the Master; no one can take a neutral position; every man on earth is either lost or found. Dear reader, which is it with you? Do you know the place of safety on the good Shepherd's shoulder, and have you made it yours? Are you like the silver in the tradesman's hand, increasing the wealth of the kingdom, or are you lost among the dust and rubbish of the things of time? Are you a son, conscious of your creation in the image of God, fully aware of the call you have to union with that God, knowing your responsibilities, and yet violating them, through your idolatrous love of pleasure, fame, or other passing things of earth? O arise, and come to your Father, have the matter fully, honestly out with Him; return, and give His heart the joy of welcoming you as a returned prodigal.

God calls us to the highest holiness, to be as Christ was in this world (1 John 4 : 17). He calls us to become partakers of the divine nature, "having escaped the corruption which is in the world through lust" (2 Pet. 1 : 4). But holy as He is, He comes down to every soul in every state and condition. It is His will that we should not sin (1 John 2 : 1), but in His deep love He makes provision for the sinner; although the loss incurred by the sinner is our eternal loss, and the years he has wasted are lost for eternity, and the strength which he has spent in folly is no more his to devote to the cause of God, there remains yet forgiveness for him through the precious blood of Christ; the lost sheep has a way of the return to the fold, the silver may yet come into use again, the son can again take his place in his father's house, for our God is "the God of all grace" (1 Pet. 5 : 10).

Our next lesson was "the rich man and Lazarus," and here we had a picture of the miserable littleness of a life lived only for this world: we have seen how such a life is the most common and ordinary around us. There are hundreds of thousands of whom men say that they are good sort of men, meaning that they are not particularly bad nor particularly good: in fact, they do as other men do, and sheltering themselves under the excuse that if they are lost most other men will be lost too, they live a life void of communion with God from beginning to end. Their religion is that which is expected of their position, and the thought of rational and real intercourse with God is completely foreign to them.

From this sad picture we turned to the Lord's parables on prayer, and learned first, through the importunity of the widow, that perseverance which becomes those who have to deal with God. If we have a right to approach Him, and if His Word gives us to expect that our prayers shall receive an answer, then the failure in perseverance is a doubt of God's faithfulness. Let us never look at ourselves when we pray, but at Him in whose name we draw near, and then we see the impossibility of our petitions being refused. Oh how little we know of the mighty power which lies in the name of Jesus. From the Pharisee and the publican we learned the difference between reality and unreality in prayer. The Pharisee neither knew himself nor his God; comparing himself with men, and not with God's holy law, he was inflated with pride and self-satisfaction. It never occurred to him to think what he might have been, had he been placed in the same circumstances as the publican; glorifying himself and condemning others, he was as much really without God as the rich man of the previous lesson. The consciously sinful publican, on the contrary, measured himself by God, and knew that he was "found wanting," and this man obtained an answer, while the other did not even seek for one.

Our next lesson was one of solemn responsibility—the charge which devolves on the servants of the Master to occupy until He come, the reward of the faithful, and the irreparable loss of the unfaithful. To keep "the charge of the Lord" (Num. 9 : 23). this is our high vocation, and it enters into everything which belongs to our life here on earth; we are in charge for Another, and not acting for ourselves; in every relation of life, in every experience of soul or body, we are on duty for God, and in charge to occupy "till He come." This is no bondage to a loving heart, it is the fullest, most precious freedom, and He provides grace for all which He demands; only He will be inquired of. He will have us to do with Him about all these things.

We next come to our Lord's sacrificial death in our course of lessons—"the Saviour lifted up"—and we thought of those who stood around His cross in their different degrees of nearness to Him or of distance from Him, His friends and his enemies: some close to Him, sharing His shame; some friends, but afar off, two alone daring to acknowledge Him by word; one of these was the dying thief, and the other the heathen centurion. And we thought, "Where is my place upon Calvary? Am I near the Master, the Crucified, or am I, in word, in thought, in action, standing afar off? Am I among His friends or His foes, and if the former, in which class of them? If the latter, how long shall I continue to be the enemy of Him who has loved me unto death?

Our last lesson was the Saviour's last words, the Gospel to the world. God wills that every creature should hear the glad tidings of Christ's salvation, and that redeemed and saved sinners shall be His messengers. He could have sent messengers from His angel host, but in His tender love to His redeemed He chose those who had been lost, committed to them this precious, solemn charge, and then said, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace" (Isa. 52 : 7). And "this God is our God for ever and ever; He will be our guide even unto death" (Ps. 48 : 14).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Ireland is on the Brink of Civil War, says the correspondent of a New York journal. The intelligence is very grievous, but it is confirmed by reports received, almost daily, of conflicts between the people and the military. The Queen's picked troops in large numbers are employed in protecting process-servers and landords' agents, and there is abundant evidence that their presence in Ireland alone prevents a general rising. Men who have been witnesses of the three great agitations during the last forty years describe the present one as far more formidable and difficult to grapple with than that of O'Connell or of the Fenians. It is rumored that decisive measures are under the consideration of the government, among which the suppression of the Land League, the suspension of trial by jury and the substitution of courts martial are contemplated. It appears that prisoners are acquitted by Irish juries in the face of overwhelming evidence, and that every juryman knows when he enters the box that his life would be in peril if he convicted a Land Leaguer. Under these circumstances it is urged upon the government that for the protection of loyal subjects summary powers ought to be confided to the judges.

A serious danger of bloodshed arises from the fact that the soldiers and police are bitterly incensed against the populace. They have not until recently been allowed to use their arms for their own protection, and they have seen their comrades injured severely and in some cases fatally, and the criminals going unpunished. There is some risk of this indignant feeling assuming a form dangerous to discipline and may lead to an irrepressible outbreak of fury against the people or acts of retaliation upon the inhabitants of the garrisoned districts. Mr. Parnell, who is largely responsible for the excited state of public feeling, is aware of the danger, and advised the government to refuse to give the assistance of armed force to landlords in carrying out evictions, and warned them that, if they continued to employ the military and police, there would be extensive bloodshed before the Land Bill was passed. If blood, he said, was shed by the police and military there would undoubtedly be retaliation, and the lives of many landlords and tenants would be lost.

The French Senate has under Consideration an important constitutional change, which may, if enacted, have a material influence on the future of France. It is known as the scrutin de liste, and is strongly advocated by M. Gambetta. The object of the new project is to do away with the present system of voting by arrondissements, which are equivalent to our wards, and to substitute therefor the scrutin de liste, a method by which the constituencies are enlarged. Paris is now divided into twenty arrondissements, each of which returns one Deputy to the Chamber. The result is that each arrondissement being in the hands of the local politicians, they fix upon one of their friends, who may or may not be a man of capacity, and send him to the Chamber as their representative. Should the proposed law pass, the number of representatives will remain the same, but each voter will have twenty votes, one of which he will cast for each of the twenty men he chooses from the list of candidates. By this method it is hoped that a more intelligent class of representatives will be elected, and the mere ward politician, whose political capital is his popularity in a small circle will be forced to retire in the wider field. The bill has been passed by the Chamber of Deputies, and is now before the Senate. The Senators fear that it may concentrate public attention too much on a few men, whose power may become dangerous to the Republic.

A Riot Occurred at Clonmel, in Ireland, on May 31st. A land sale was proceeding in the town under the protection of a large force of military and police. An excited crowd had gathered, when the cry was raised that a priest had been arrested. It appears that a policeman was conversing with the priest, and was observed to lay his hand on his arm, an act which gave rise to the excitement in the crowd. Immediately a scene of wild confusion ensued. A rush was at once made on the police, but was repelled. The riot act was then read, and the hussars charged and recharged the mob, who hurled volley after volley of stones at the military, inflicting upon many of them severe injuries. The charge of the cavalry down the short street was so impetuous that several horses and riders dashed through the shop windows at the end of the street.

Another riot occurred in County Clare on June 2d. A party of soldiers and police accompanied a bailiff who was serving writs on some tenants at Bodyke. The people were gathered together by the ringing of the church bells and the blowing of horns. They assembled in thousands in the village and on the surrounding heights, and attempted to impede the progress of the police force. The first collision took place at the entrance of the town. Six mounted policemen were ordered to charge the crowd which barred ingress to the village. In this charge one man was severely injured. Then a regular fusillade was opened on the party from the heights. A clergyman, in running up the hill to implore the people to desist, had a narrow escape from being shot, a rifle bullet perforating his coat. Meanwhile firing was continued, and the Riot act having been read the fire was returned by the police, who charged the people.

At Fort Anbeg, a town in the vicinity, the police were surprised by an armed party lying in wait, and who immediately opened fire on the police from an adjoining wood. No less than forty shots were counted in regular file-firing order, the bullets whizzing over the heads of the force, happily doing no injury. The police briskly returned the fire, but with what effect is not known. About a quarter of a mile further on they were again fired on by another armed party from behind some hedges, and one of the horses in the car on which sat the County Inspector, was shot dead.

The Irish Land Bill is Making Slow Progress in the House of Commons. The number of amendments placed on the file is now fifteen hundred. The House has adjourned for the Whitsuntide holidays, and when the members left, line thirteen of the bill was under discussion, but as the first seven lines belong to the preamble, six lines represents the amount of progress made in three sittings. The bill contains 1085 lines. At this rate of progress, supposing no fresh amendments are introduced, the House would have to sit daily for 568 days to complete the bill. But fresh amendments are added daily. Sir Stafford Northcote, speaking at a Conservative demonstration on May 31st, observed that he thought there were not ten men in the House of Commons who had confidence in the land bill. It seems probable that even if it runs the gauntlet of all this opposition it will not reach the House of Lords early enough to be considered this session.

The South African Boers.—The British Commission appointed to settle the details of the peace convention with the Boers, has been holding preliminary sittings. The surrender of Potchefstroom, which was obtained by the treacherous concealment of the armistice by the Boers from the garrison, has been the chief topic of discussion, and Sir Evelyn Wood demands the right of reoccupation by the British troops. It is said that the Boer leaders have shown a conciliatory spirit, and appear determined to maintain peace, but the same cannot be said of their followers, while the feeling among the Europeans and the loyalist Boers, who have been ruthlessly plundered by their rebellious brethren, is wholly against the proposed settlement. Large numbers of loyalists are leaving the country, and monster protestation meetings are being constantly held throughout South Africa, while a rising of the natives against the Boers is looked upon as probable.

The Death of Major Malan, on Tuesday, May 17th, was painfully sudden. It resulted from an ulcer in the mouth. Miss Marsh, the authoress of Captain Hedley Vicar's Life, wrote on May 14th: "No one can look upon the face of that brave and patient sufferer without seeing that he is going through a hot fire of affliction. Not many days ago, when I went up to see him, he wrote on a sheet of paper (for he did not attempt to speak) in answer to the inquiry of sorrowful sympathy, 'I fear your pain is severe?' 'I ought not to speak of suffering; I am borne over it.' Later on he wrote to my sister, the closest friend of the mother he lost in his childhood, and to him a mother ever since, 'I am beginning to find out that the valley is no playground. But I have had a sweet afternoon with the Father and with our Lord Jesus; I have beheld Him in Gethsemane, and have learned His prayer. I have prayed for strengthening by the Spirit, and I am strengthened. My anxious, anticipatory mind tries me, but I believe faith will be given to trust for the day. Thank you for your motto text. Yes, 'His banner over me is love.'"

Rev. Joseph Cook at Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, in London.—After a long succession of platform triumphs in England, the Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, Mass., gave a lecture on May 10th in the Tabernacle to a large audience. Mr. C. H. Spurgeon was to have presided, but was represented by his brother, who read the following letter from the eminent preacher: "I am very sorry to be absent from Mr. Cook's lecture. I believe in him, and greatly admire his attainments and his zeal for the orthodox faith. I wish that we had in England a man so well able to meet the skeptics and heretics of the day upon their own ground. He is loyal to our own old-fashioned Puritanism, and he smites the adversaries with heavy blows. I have the fullest confidence in the man and his communications, and I hope many a wavering mind may be confirmed by his testimony." Mr. Cook then delivered a most eloquent lecture. He has been exceedingly well received in all the towns he has visited, and his popularity is nearly as great in Great Britain as on this side the Atlantic.

William Penn's Remains will Probably Remain undisturbed in their resting-place on English soil. It appears they were interred, in accordance with wishes the distinguished Friend expressed during his lifetime, in the quiet graveyard near the building where he with his brethren conducted their simple worship in those unquiet times. The trustees of the property held a meeting when they became aware of the application of the Philadelphia citizens having been dispatched, and resolutions were passed protesting against the removal of the body. A committee was appointed to take charge of the matter and to see that nothing was done contrary to the resolutions.

Mr. Spurgeon's Pulpit Experience. At a Recent meeting of the Pastor's College Mr. Spurgeon took the young men into his confidence in respect to his difficulties in preparing for his pulpit. He said he often walked up and down, anxious to find something to say to the people on a Sunday. He would sometimes get the outline of a sermon in his mind with a good text, and, after saying to himself, "That will do," he would find in his well-marked Bible how it had been preached before, while what he had thought out closely resembled the printed copy. Time had been when at 10 o'clock on Saturday evening, or even on Sunday morning, he had found himself without a text; but sometimes, when thus driven in a corner, with nothing to say, he did best.

THE banquet given by the Lord Mayor of London to Dr. Robert Moffat, the venerable missionary, has directed public attention anew to his long and successful career and to the distinguished services God has enabled him to perform in His cause. Our readers will, we think, enjoy the perusal of a biography of this devoted man.

Robert Moffat, "the Patriarch of Kuruman," and the "Apostle of the Bechuanas," was born at Ormestone, near Haddington, Scotland, on December 21st, 1795, and is therefore now in the eighty-sixth year of his age. The greater part of his boyhood was spent at Carron Shore, near the great Carron Iron Works, where his father held an appointment in the Customs.

COMMENCES LIFE AS A GARDENER.

When Robert was about twelve years of age, he was ambitious to be a sailor, and at the request of a ship's captain, his father consented that he should have a taste of sea life in a coasting vessel; but not finding much that was pleasant on board ship or during the voyage, he returned to school, and began to study botany and horticulture, in order to qualify himself for the position of a skilled gardener.

Some time after this—the exact period cannot be ascertained—Robert's father removed to Inverkeithing, Fifeshire, and the lad obtained congenial employment near the town in the gardens of the Earl of Moray. Scotch gardeners then, as now, had a good repute in England, and he was invited to a situation in Cheshire, where he continued two or three years pursuing his studies with the greatest avidity.

Robert's parents were pious, God-fearing people. The virtuous and consistent example of his father produced upon him the happiest effect. From his mother he received instruction of a more positively religious nature. The worthy woman had set her heart upon her boy, "knowing from a child the Holy Scriptures, as able to make him wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."

HIS MOTHER'S REQUEST ON HIS GOING TO ENGLAND.

When about to quit his native country for his new situation in England, his mother wished him to promise that he would read his Bible every day, both morning and evening. Sensible of his own weakness, and perhaps also of his boyish disinclination, he tried to evade the request. But as she was about to bid him farewell, she took his hand, and looking into his face with tearful eyes, said, imploringly, "Robert, you will promise me to read the Bible; more particularly the New Testament, and most especially the Gospels—those are the words of Christ Himself; and there you cannot possibly go astray." He could not resist such an appeal, and replied "Yes, mother, I make you the promise." He knew, as he once remarked in relating the circumstance, that the promise once made must be kept. "And oh!" he added, "I am happy that I did make it."

Not long after he went to Cheshire the reading of God's word, and the preaching of the Gospel, were blessed by the Holy Ghost to his conversion to Christ. Though the particulars of this momentous event are nowhere published, it is believed to have been consummated at a Methodist service, conducted in a farm-house, in the Warrington circuit, to which Robert occasionally went, and where the Rev. J. Beaumont frequently ministered. It is a matter of absolute certainty, however, that it was in Warrington that the great change in the life of the now venerable missionary happened.

Moffat's temperament being earnest and vigorous, the new impulse he had received at his conversion was not likely to be dormant in his breast. He must work and work for God, but how and in what sphere he knew not. One of those circumstances the world calls "accidents" determined the course of his future. He was a chosen instrument to bear the Gospel message to the heathen, and the circumstance God employed to turn his steps in that direction was apparently insignificant, but it was sufficient, because God's hand used it. Walking to the neighboring town of High Leigh on business one summer evening he noticed a large poster on a blank wall announcing a meeting in connection with the London Missionary Society, at which the Rev. W. Roby, of Manchester, would speak. A glance at the date told young Moffat that the meeting had already been held, but the word "missionary" sank into his mind, and his thoughts, by an unseen influence, centred upon it, until he seemed to see in it the finger of God directing his steps. His business prospects were encouraging, and he had before him a career which to men of his class seemed an enviable one, but he resolved to abandon all the rewards of the world for this one thing, that he might preach the Gospel to those who dwelt in darkness. His friends and patrons said "his brains were turned." "And so they were," he responded, "but turned the right way."

ACCEPTED AND ORDAINED AS A MISSIONARY.

The same influence that had made the mute placard speak to Robert's heart induced him to resolve upon going to Manchester, and seek out Mr. Roby for the express purpose of offering himself for mission work. Not without much timidity and some sense of misgiving, he knocked at the door. Mr. Roby received him with great kindness, told him to be of good courage, and promised to use what influence he had with the directors of the Society on his behalf. The final consequence was that Robert Moffat was accepted by the Society, and, in October, 1816, was, with eight other young men, ordained in Surrey Chapel, London, as a minister of the Gosple to the heathen.

The youthful missionary sailed on October 31st, 1816, being not quite twenty-one years of age. Like the pioneers of Protestant missions in India, he was tried by a discouraging reception. When he reached the Cape he had to solicit the permission of the British Governor to visit the heathen beyond the boundaries of the colony. This was refused for some time; but while waiting he was not idle. Day after day, with commendable importunity, he repeated and emphasized his application to the agent of the British Government. The post of Resident with one of the Kaffir chiefs was offered to him, where he might act as agent and as Christian instructor at the same time; but the noble-hearted youth declined to be fettered, even though the chains were of gold, and in God's strength was determined to secure the untrammeled liberty of a missionary of the Cross.

FOR THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE

RECEPTION BY A BOER AND HIS WIFE.

Lodging with a godly Hollander, he soon acquired the Dutch language, so as to be able to preach the glad tidings of salvation to the Dutch Boers and their native servants. At length permission was granted him to go up the country. Immediately he set out, and at the end of his first day's journey begged a night's lodging with all the bashfulness of timorous youth. The brusque and burly Boer blustered and bellowed as though the young traveller had petitioned him for the gift of a hundred oxen, and in a stern tone peremptorily refused his request. Fear, however, had not put to flight the mother-wit of Scotia's son, and Mr. Moffat thought to himself, "I'll e'en try the guid wife." The homeless "laddie," far away from his "ain mither," met with a most generous reception, and both bed and board were provided for him.

During the evening meal the question was put to him, "Whither are you bound, and what is your errand?" "Well," replied the grateful guest; "I am bound for Orange River to teach the rude tribes the way of salvation." "What!" said the incredulous hostess, "to Namaqua-land, that hot, inhospitable region! And will the people there, think you, listen to the Gospel, or understand it if they do?" Be that as it might, when asked by the kind-hearted Frau to preach it to her and her gruff husband, he promptly returned, "Oh ay; nought else would give me greater delight." The sermon which Robert Moffat preached on this occasion was in reality—as a part of his congregation were Hottentots—his first publication of the news of redemption to the heathen.

AFRICANER'S CAREER AND CONVERSION.

The path of duty and the scene of action which at length opened to the enthusiastic missionary was on the Northwest border, beyond the Orange River, where a Hottentot family, known as the Africaners, had gathered a fierce body of desperate marauders about them and fixed their abode. Their chief, named "Africaner," had been outlawed from the Colony for the murder of a farmer named Pienaar, who was shot down in the presence of his wife and family. To escape the vengeance of the Dutch for that deed of blood the party hastened to the north of the Orange River, and settled in Great Namaqua-land. Many attempts were made by the colonial authorities to destroy Africaner, but they only excited him to reprisals, and he became the terror of all the farmsteads in the Border Country.

It was to the kraal of this dreaded outlaw and "banditti chief" that Moffat set forth. The farmers at whose houses he was entertained en route assured him that Africaner would think no more of taking his life than he would of slaying a zebra or an antelope. One said the outlaw chieftain would set him up for a mark for his young men to shoot their arrows at; another, that he would strip off his skin and make a drum of it to dance to; another, that he would strike his head from his body and use his skull for a drinking cup; and a motherly old lady, wiping the tears from her eyes as she bade him farewell, said "Had you been an old man, it would have been nothing, for you would soon have died, whether or no; but you are young, and going to be eaten up by that monster!" Undeterred, however, by these reports, with a firm trust in the protecting care of Him in whose service he was engaged, and with a full faith in the all-subduing influence of that Gospel which it was to be his life-work to proclaim, Robert Moffat proceeded onward on his journey.

THE MISSIONARY'S EARLY ORDEAL.

At length Moffat arrived at Africaner's kraal, and found that though the appearance of things was somewhat discouraging, the chief was not so formidable as he had been pictured by the fears of the planters. He received a reluctant welcome, but presently the order was given to make a house for him.

The young missionary's sincerity and fitness for the work which he had undertaken was at the very commencement crucially tested, but his devotion rose as hardships and difficulties increased. Through the day he was fully employed in teaching school; and in the stillness of the evening he silently retired to a pile of rocks in the neighborhood, where he poured out his soul in prayer.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS ARE SEEN.

After a long time those daily prayers and teachings brought forth fruit. The difficulty of learning the dialect was surmounted, the natural dislike of the people to the white man was overcome, and, better than all, Moffat noticed that an increasing interest was manifested in the religious services and in the Bible as he interpreted it to those who would listen to him. The chief Africaner was himself the most marked example of this change. He not only gave intelligent attention to Christian teaching, but he was the subject of converting grace. The Holy Spirit touched his heart, and the fierce savage, the murderer of white men, became gentle and teachable as a little child.
